Fleet [fr. fleot, Sax., an estuary], a place where the tide flows, a creek, an inlet of water, hence Northfleet, Purfleet; also a company of ships or navy; also a prison in London, so called from a river or ditch formerly in its vicinity, now abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22.

Fleet-books. The books of the old Fleet prison are not, it is said, admissible in evidence to prove a marriage, for they are not made under public authority. But perhaps on a question of pedigree, they are evidence to show the name by which a woman passed when she was married there. These books are said to have been purchased by the government, and to be deposited in the Consistory Court of London. They contain the original entries of marriages solemnised in the Fleet prison from 1686 to 1754.—1 Stark. Evid. 244.

Flem [fr. flean, Sax., to kill], an outlaw.

Flemene frit, Flemenes frinthe, Flymena frynthe, the reception or relief of a fugitive or outlaw.

Flemeswite, the possession of the goods of fugitives.—Fleta, lib. 1, c. xlvii.

Flet, house; home.

Fleta, seu Commentarius Juris Anglicani, a treatise upon the whole law, as it stood at the time this author wrote. It is divided into six books; the first whereof treats of the rights of persons, and of pleas of the Crown; the second, of courts and officers; the third, of methods of acquiring titles to things; the fourth and fifth, of actions grounded upon a seisin, and of writs of entry; the sixth, of a writ of right. The author of this work has followed Bracton in the manner and matter of it, having adopted his plan, and in many instances transcribed whole pages from him. He did not, however, confine himself to Bracton as his sole guide, but had also an eye to Glanville. Many obscure passages in those writers are illustrated by Fleta. It seems as if the author wrote with both these treatises, particularly Bracton's, before him; and that his design was to give a concise account of the law, with the alterations which had been made by parliament since Bracton wrote; applying such parts as had been left untouched by him, and dilating upon others that had been passed over with too little attention. Thus Fleta serves as an appendix, and often as a commentary, to Bracton. But if Fleta contains much which is not to be found in Bracton, it is deficient in much more which abounds in that author; most of the subjects so minutely discussed by Bracton being passed over in a very brief manner, so that with all its new matter this volume is not more than one-third of the size of Bracton. The writer of this commentary seems to have followed his master Bracton in his acquaintance with the canon and civil laws; though he is less frequent in the use of them, and then it is in a manner less likely to mislead the reader. The author was wholly an imitator. As he followed Bracton in the design of his work, he has copied the Proœmium from Glanville verbatim; and, after all, the idea was borrowed from that prefixed to the Institutes of Justinian.

This book was written after the thirteenth year of Edward I., and not much later; at least the statutes towards the latter part of this reign are not mentioned, though that of Westminster II. is frequently quoted. The occasion of the title of this book is given by the author himself, who says it was written during his confinement in the Fleet prison. From that circumstance it has been conjectured that he might be one of those lawyers who, for malpractice in their office as judges, were punished with imprisonment and pecuniary penalties. Appended to Fleta is a small French tract entitled Fet Assavoir.—2 Reeves, p. 279.

Fletwit or Flitwit. See FLEDWITE.

Flit, treason.

Flitchwite, a fine on account of brawls and quarrels.

Florin, a coin of the value of two shillings.

Flotages, such things as by accident swim on the top of great rivers.

Flotsam or Floatsam, goods floating upon the sea which belong to the Crown, unless claimed by the true owners thereof within a year and a day.

Flumina et portus publica sunt, ideoque jus piscandi omnibus commune est.—(Rivers and ports are public, therefore the right of fishing is common to all.)

Flyma, a runaway; fugitive; one escaped from justice, or who has no 'hlaford.'—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Flyman-frymth, the offence of harbouring a fugitive, the penalty attached to which was one of the rights of the Crown.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

F. O. B. free on board, a term frequently inserted in contracts for the sale of goods which are to be conveyed by ship, meaning that the cost of shipping them will be paid by the buyer. When goods are so sold in London the buyer is considered as the shipper, and the goods when shipped are at his risk. See Cowas-Jee v. Thompson, 5 Moore P. C. C. 165; Browne v. Hare, 3 H. & N. 484, and 4 Ibid. 822; Green v. Sichel 29, L. J. (C. P.) 213.

Focage, fog, or rank after-grass, not eaten in summer.

Focage, housebote, or firebote.

Focale, a right to take firewood.

Fodder, food for horses or cattle; also, among the Feudists, a prerogative of the prince to be provided with corn and other meat for his horses by his subjects, in his wars or other expeditions.

Fodertorium, provisions to be paid by custom to the royal purveyors.

Fœdus, a league or compact.

Fœmina viro co-operta (a married woman). Fœminæ non sunt capaces de publicis officiis. Jenk. Cent. 237.—(Women are not admissible to public offices.)

But a woman may be elected to the office of sexton, Olive v. Ingram, 7 Mod. 263; Str. 1114, S. C. Or governor of a workhouse, and act by deputy, Anon. 2 Lord Raym. 1014. Or an overseer, Rex v. Stubbs, 2 T. R. 395.

The shrievalty of Westmoreland is hereditary in the family of the Earl of Thanet, and descends as well to females as males.—Harg.; Co. Litt. 326 n.

Fœneration, the act of putting out money to usury.

Fœnus nauticum (nautical usury), a contract for the repayment of money borrowed, not on the ship and goods only, but on the mere hazard of the voyage itself, with a condition to be repaid with extraordinary interest.

Fœsa, grass; herbage.

Fœticide, criminal abortion. It may be said of all the means resorted to in order to effect this abominable crime, that they are uncertain in their operation upon the fœtus, that they always endanger the life of the mother, and that they sometimes destroy the mother without affecting the fœtus. See ABORTION.

Foiterers, vagabonds.

Folc-land, the land of the folk or people. It was the property of the community. It might be occupied in common or possessed in severalty; and in the latter case, it was probably parcelled out to individuals in the folc-gemot or court of the district; and the grant sanctioned by the freemen who were there present. But, while it continued to be folc-land, it could not be alienated in perpetuity; and therefore, on the expiration of the term for which it had been granted, it reverted to the community, and was again distributed by the same authority. Spelman describes folc-land as terra popularis, quæ jure communi possidetur—sine scripto (Gloss. Folcland). In another place he distinguishes it accurately from bocland: Prædia Saxones duplici titulo possidebant: vel scripti authoritate, quod bocland vocabant, vel populi testimonio, quod folcland dixere (Ib. Bocland).

Folcland was subject to many burthens and exactions from which bocland was exempt. The possessors of folcland were bound to assist in the reparation of royal vills, and in other public works. They were liable to have travellers and others quartered on them for subsistence. They were required to give hospitality to kings and great men in their progresses through the country, to furnish them with carriages and relays of horses, and to extend the same assistance to their messengers, followers, and servants, and even to the persons who had charge of their hawks, horses, and hounds. Such at least are the burthens from which lands are liberated, when converted by charter into bocland.

Folcland might be held by freemen of all ranks and conditions. It is a mistake to imagine, with Lambarde, Spelman, and a host of antiquaries, that it was possessed by the common people only. Still less is Blackstone to be credited, when, trusting to Somner, he tells us it was land held in villenage by people in a state of downright servitude, belonging, both they and their children and effects, to the lord of the soil, like the rest of the cattle or stock upon the land (2 Bl. Com. 92). A deed published by Lye shows the incorrectness of these statements (Anglo-Saxon Dict. app. ii. 2). Alfred, a nobleman of the highest rank, possessed of great estates in bocland, beseeches King Alfred in his will to continue his folcland to his son Æthelwald; and if that favor cannot be obtained, he bequeaths in lieu of it to his son, who appears to have been illegitimate, ten hides of bocland at one place, or seven at another. From this document it follows, first, that folcland was held by persons of rank; secondly, that an estate of folcland was of such value that seven or even ten hides of bocland were not considered as more than equivalent for it; and lastly, that it was a life-estate, not devisable by will, but at the disposal of the king upon the death of the holder.

It appears also from this document, that the same person might hold estates both in bocland and in folcland; that is to say he might possess an estate of inheritance, of which he had the complete disposal, except so far as it was limited by settlement; and with it he might possess an estate for life, revertible to the public after his decease. In the latter times of the Anglo-Saxon government, it is probable there were few persons of condition who had not estates of both descriptions. Every one was desirous to have grants of folcland, and to convert as much of it as possible into bocland. Money was given, and favor exhausted for that purpose. In many Saxon wills we find petitions similar to that of Alfred; but in none of them is the character of the land, which could not be disposed of without consent of the king, described with the same precision. In some wills, the testator bequeaths his land as he pleases, without asking leave of anyone (Somner's Gavelkind, 88, 211; Hickes, Pref. xxxii.; Diss. Epist. 29, 54, 55, 59; Madox Formul. 395); in others, he earnestly beseeches the king that his will may stand, and then declares his intentions with respect to the distribution of his property (Lambarde, Kent, 540; Hickes, Diss. Epist. 54; Gale, i. 457; Lye's Appendix, ii. 1, 5; Heming, 40); and, in one instance, he makes an absolute bequest of the greater part of his lands, but solicits the king's consent to the disposal of a small part of his estate (Hickes, Diss. Epist. 62). There can be no doubt that bocland was devisable by will, unless its descent had been determined by settlement; and a presumption therefore arises, that where the consent of the king was necessary, the land devised was not bocland, but folcland. If this inference be admitted, the case of Alfred will not be a solitary instance, but common to many of the principal Saxon nobility.

That folcland was assignable to the thegns, or military servants of the state, as the stipend or reward for their services, is clearly indicated in the celebrated letter of Bede to Archbishop Egbert (Smith's Bede, 305, 312). In that letter, which throws so much light on the internal state of Northumberland, the venerable author complains of the improvident grants to monasteries, which had impoverished the government, and left no lands for the soldiers and retainers of the secular authorities, on whom the defence of the country must necessarily depend. He laments this mistaken prodigality, and expresses his fears that there will be soon a deficiency of military men to repel invasion; no place being left where they can obtain possessions to maintain them suitably to their condition. It is evident from these complaints, that the lands so lavishly bestowed on the church had been formerly the property of the public, and at the disposal of the government. If they had been boclands, it could have made no difference to the state whether they belonged to the church or to individuals, since in both cases they were beyond its control, and in both cases were subject to the usual obligations of military service. But, if they formed part of the folcland, or property of the public, it is easy to conceive how their conversion into bocland must have weakened the state, by lessening the fund out of which its military servants were to be provided.

A charter of the eighth century conveys to the see of Rochester certain lands on the Medway, as they had been formerly possessed by the chiefs and companions of the Kentish kings. (Textus Roffens, 72, Ed. Hearne; Kemble, Cod. Diplom. No. cxi.) In this instance folcland, which had been appropriated to the military service of the state, appears to have been converted into bocland, and given to the church.—Allen's Inquiry into the Rise and Progress of the Royal Prerogative in England, 143–149.

Folc-mote, or Folk-mote [fr. folk, Sax., people, and mote, meeting], a general assembly of the people to consider of and order matters concerning the commonwealth; also any kind of popular or public meeting.—Somner; Spelm.; Brady's Glos. 48; Termes de la Ley.

Folc-right, or Folk-right, the jus commune, or common law, mentioned in the laws of King Edward the Elder, declaring the same equal right, law, or justice to be due to persons of all degrees.

Foldage, and Foldcourse. See FALDAGE.

Folgarii, menial servants.

Folgere, a freeman, who has no house or dwelling of his own, but is the follower or retainer of another (heorthfæst), for whom he performs certain predial services.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Folgoth, official dignity.

Folio (abbrev. fol.), a certain number of words; in conveyances, &c. amounting to seventy-two, and in parliamentary proceedings to ninety; also in printing, the figure at the top or bottom of a page.

Folkland, see FOLCLAND.

Foot, twelve inches.

Foot of a fine, the conclusion of it, including the whole matter, and reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied.

Foot-geld, an amerciament for not expeditating or cutting out the balls of dogs' feet in the forest.—Manw. p. i. p. 86.

Forage, hay and straw for horses, particularly in the army.

Foragium, straw when the corn is thrashed out.

Forbalka, a balk or ridge of land lying forward or next to the highway.—Old Records.

Forbannitus, a pirate.—Leg. Ripuar.

Forbarre, to deprive one of a thing for ever.

Forbatudus, the aggressor slain in combat.

Force, any unlawful violence offered to things or persons. It is either simple, as entering upon another's possession, without doing any other unlawful act; compound, when some other violence is committed, which of itself alone is criminal; or implied, as in every trespass, rescous, or disseisin.

All force is contrary to law; it is, therefore, lawful to repel force by force: quod alias bonum et justum est, si per vim vel fraudem petatur, malum et injustum est.—(That which is otherwise good and just, if it be obtained by force or fraud is bad and unjust.)—3 Rep. 78.

Force and arms [vi et armis, Lat.], words usually inserted in an indictment, though not absolutely necessary.—14 & 15 Vict., c. 100, s. 24. They were also formerly inserted in a declaration for trespass, but are now unnecessary.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 49.

Forces, the military and naval services of the country.

Forcible detainer, refusing to restore another's goods, after sufficient amends tendered, the original taking having been lawful; for which injury the remedy usually resorted to is trover. But if the original taking were unlawful, it is a criminal offence against the public peace, and a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment and ransom at the pleasure of the Crown.—4 Bl. Com. 156.

Forcible entry, a taking possession with a strong hand and with violence, which is both a civil and a criminal injury. The civil injury is remedied by immediate restitution of the ejected possessor, the criminal injury, being a breach of the peace, is punished by a fine.—3 Step. Com. 338.

Ford, a shallow place in a river.

Fordol [fr. fore, Sax., before, and dæle, a portion], a butt or headland, jutting out upon other land.

Forecheapum, præ-emption, forestalling the market.

Fore-cited, quoted before or above.

Foreclosure. A mortgagee, or any person claiming an interest in the mortgage under him, can compel the mortgagor, after breach of the condition, to elect either to redeem the pledge, or that his equity of redemption be extinguished. This is effected by filing a short bill for a foreclosure.

The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 48, enables the court in any suit for the foreclosure of the equity of redemption in any mortgaged property, upon the request of the mortgagee or of any subsequent incumbrancer, or of the mortgagor or any person claiming under them respectively, to direct a sale of such property, instead of a foreclosure of such equity of redemption, on such terms as the court may think fit to direct, and if the court shall so think fit, without previously determining the priorities of incumbrances, or giving the usual or any time to redeem; provided that if such request shall be made by any such subsequent incumbrancer, or by the mortgagor, or by any person claiming under them respectively, the court shall not direct any such sale, without the consent of the mortgagee or the persons claiming under him, unless the party making such request shall deposit in court a reasonable sum of money, to be fixed by the court, for the purpose of securing the performance of such terms as the court may think fit to impose on the party making such request. The court will not make a decree for sale instead of the common foreclosure decree without the mortgagor's consent, unless the mortgagee can make out a case for departing from the usual course.

A mortgagee can come into equity to foreclose although a power of sale is given to him in the mortgage-deed.

A mortgagee of a copyhold estate who is not in possession, may bring his suit against the mortgagor, before admittance, for a foreclosure, and after he has obtained a decree, his course is to proceed by ejectment for possession of the mortgaged premises; if no surrender have been made, and the mortgagor be foreclosed, he will be ordered (at the expense of the mortgagee) to surrender the estate.

The decree in a foreclosure suit as between mortgagee and mortgagor directs a reference to the Chief Clerk, to take an account of the principal and interest due on the mortgage, and to tax the plaintiff's (the mortgagee's) costs of the suit, and upon the defendant (the mortgagor's) paying to the plaintiff what shall be found due to him for principal, interest, and costs, within six calendar months after the Chief Clerk shall have made his report, at such time and place as the Chief Clerk shall fix, the plaintiff is ordered to reconvey the premises, free and clear from incumbrances done by him, or any claiming under him, and to deliver up all deeds, &c. upon oath; but in default of payment at such time and place as aforesaid, it is ordered that the defendant be absolutely foreclosed from all equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises. The order also directs the production of books, upon oath; the usual examination upon interrogatories; and gives the parties liberty to apply.

If the mortgagee is in possession, the decree contains a direction for the Chief Clerk to take an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received by the plaintiff, or by any other person or persons by his order or for his use, or which he, without his wilful default, might have received thereout, and orders that what shall be found due on such account of rents and profits be deducted out of what shall be found due to the plaintiff for principal, interest, and costs.

If the mortgage-money is not paid, the plaintiff or his attorney thereunto lawfully appointed upon an affidavit of having duly attended, and of the nonpayment of the money, is entitled on motion to an order as of course, that the defendant do from henceforth stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all right, title, suit, and equity of redemption of, in, or to the said mortgaged premises.

The utmost indulgence is extended to the mortgagor in enabling him to pay the money, so as to prevent an absolute foreclosure; the time fixed has been extended four times, and that although the third was expressed to be peremptory, there being a fair prospect that the mortgagor would be able to obtain the money within the extended time. Some ground must be assigned for enlarging the time, and it is enlarged only on the terms of first paying the interest and costs already certified, and when these have been paid subsequent interest is to be computed on the principal only.

A decree for foreclosure against an infant defendant gives the infant a day to show cause within six months after attaining majority; but the only cause that can be shown is error in the decree, for he may neither reopen the account nor redeem the mortgage.—2 Tud. L. Cas. 764–767.

Foregift, a premium for a lease.

Foregoers, royal purveyors.

Fore-hand Rents, or Fines, a species of rent, the payment of which is generally stipulated for by a covenant in the lease. It is sometimes called a fore-gift or income, but more commonly a fine. It is a premium given by a lessee at the time of taking his lease, and has been considered as an improved rent.—Woodf. Land. and Tent. 311.

Foreign Attachment, a custom which prevails in the city of London, whereby a debt owing to a defendant sued in the Court of the Mayor or Sheriff, may be attached in the hands of the debtor. The custom was certified by the Recorder of London in the reign of Edw. IV. to be, that if a plaint be affirmed in London before, &c. against any person, and it be returned nihil, if the plaintiff will surmise that another person within the city is a debtor to the defendant in any sum, he shall have garnishment against him to warn him to come in and answer whether he be indebted in the manner alleged; and if he comes and does not deny the debt, it shall be attached in his hands, and after four defaults recorded on the part of the defendant, such person shall find new surety to the plaintiff for the said debt, and judgment shall be that the plaintiff shall have judgment against him, and that he shall be quit against the other after execution sued out by the plaintiff. See Com. Dig., 'Attachment of Privilege;' Turbill's case, 1 Waund. by Williams, 67, and notes; Locke or Ashley on Foreign Attachment; and 1 Chitt. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 699. See GARNISHMENT.

Foreign Bill of Exchange, a bill drawn or payable abroad. Before 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, a bill drawn in one part of the United Kingdom, as England, on a person in another part, as Ireland or Scotland, was deemed a foreign bill; but s. 7 of that act enacts that 'every bill of exchange or promissory note drawn or made in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney and Sark, and the Islands adjacent to any of them, being part of the dominions of Her Majesty, and made payable in, or drawn upon any person resident in, any part of the said United Kingdom and Islands, shall be deemed to be an inland bill; but nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the stamp duty, if any, which but for this enactment would be payable in respect of any such bill or note.' See also 19 & 20 Vict. c. 60 (for Scotland). This statute has an important effect, because by the law of merchants, the holder of a foreign bill is obliged to protest it for non-payment, and also for non-acceptance, whenever notice of such non-acceptance is necessary. By the common law the acceptance of an inland bill must be in writing, whilst that of a foreign bill might be verbal; but now, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 6 (and c. 60, s. 11 for Scotland), no acceptance of any bill of exchange, whether inland or foreign, made after Dec. 31, 1856, shall be sufficient to bind or charge any person, unless the same be in writing on such bill, or if there be more than one part of such bill, on one of the said parts, and signed by the acceptor or some person duly authorized by him. As to the stamp duty on foreign bills drawn, negotiated, or presented for payment in the United Kingdom, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, ss. 3-6. See Chitty, Byles, or Bayley on Bills.

Foreign bought and sold, a custom in London, which, being found prejudicial to sellers of cattle in Smithfield, was abolished.

Foreign Courts, the proceedings of a foreign court are proved by copies under the seal of such court, proof being given that the seal affixed is the seal of such court. If a court have no seal, then proof by an exemplification under the hand of the Chief Judge of the court (his handwriting being proved) will be received. The law of a foreign country, if written, can be proved here only by the production of some authenticated copy; if unwritten, then by the parol evidence of a witness of competent skill. As to taking evidence here in matters pending before foreign tribunals, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 113.

Foreign Enlistment Act, the 59 Geo. III. c. 69, which enacts that, if any natural born subject of Great Britain (without license obtained under the royal sign manual, or by order in council, or by proclamation) shall accept any military commission, or enlist as a soldier or a sailor in any foreign service, or shall go to any foreign country with an intent so to enlist, or shall endeavour to procure any other person so to enlist; and if any person within the realm shall fit out any armed vessel for the service of any foreign state, or shall issue any commission for any such vessel, or shall alter the number of guns of such vessel, or be concerned in augmenting the force of any foreign armed vessel arriving in this country; such offenders shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be punished with fine or imprisonment, or both. A ship having on board such a person may be prevented from proceeding on her voyage; and the master thereof, if he know that such a person is on board, may be fined 50*l.* for every such person. See the proclamation gazetted May 14, 1860, as to the non-interference of British subjects in the war between the States of America.

Foreign Lotteries. See 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 66, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 74.

Foreign plea, a plea objecting to the jurisdiction of a judge, on the ground that he has not cognizance of the subject matter of the suit.

Foreigners, aliens. They are amenable to our laws whilst residing amongst us, and it is no defence for a foreigner charged with a crime committed in England, that he did not know he was doing wrong, the act not being criminal in his own country.—R. v. Esop. 7 C. & P. 456. As to the enlistment of foreigners in Her Majesty's forces, see 18 Vict. c. 2.

Foreign Funds. See FUNDS.

Forejudger [fr. forisjudicatio, Lat.], a judgment whereby a person is deprived of, or put by, the thing in question. To be forejudged the court is when an officer or attorney of any court is expelled the same for some offence, or for not appearing to an action.

Foreman, the presiding member of a jury.

Forensic, belonging to courts of justice.

Forensic Medicine, the science which applies the principles and practice of the different branches of medicine to the elucidation of doubtful questions in a court of justice. It comprehends, in a more extensive sense, medical police, or those medical precepts which may prove useful to the legislature or the magistracy. This science is also termed medical jurisprudence, legal medicine, and state medicine. Consult the works of Taylor, Guy, or Beck, on the subject.

Foreschoke [derelictum, Lat.], forsaken; disavowed.

Forest [fr. foresta, Ital.], an incorporeal hereditament, being the right or franchise of keeping, for the purpose of venary and hunting, the wild beasts and fowls of forest, chase, park, and warren (which means in effect all animals pursued in field sports), in a certain territory or precinct of woody ground and pasture set apart for the purpose, with laws and officers of its own, established for protection of the game. Manw. For. Laws. The Charta de Foresta, confirmed in Parliament 9 Hen. III. disafforested many forests unlawfully made. Some of the royal forests still exist, as New Forest in Hampshire, Windsor, and Richmond.

A forest is, in general, a royal possession, though it is capable of being vested in a subject. A forest is a right which the owner thereof (whether sovereign or subject), may have either in his own lands or the lands of another, differing from other incorporeal hereditaments, which are rights exercised over another's lands. The owner of a forest is also considered (notwithstanding the general rule, that title cannot be made to things feræ naturæ) as having a qualified property in the wild animals of chase and venary there found, as long as they continue therein.—1 Step. Com. 673.

Forest Courts, fallen into absolute desuetude. They were instituted for the government of the royal forests in different parts of the kingdom, and for the punishment of all injuries done to the deer or venison, to the vert or greensward, and to the covert in which such deer were lodged. They consisted of the courts of attachments, regard, sweinmote, and justice-seat. The court of attachments, woodmote, or forty days' court, was held before the verderors of the forest once in every forty days, to inquire into all offences against vert and venison. The court of regard, or survey of dogs, held every third year, for the expeditation of mastiffs. The court of sweinmote, held before the verderors thrice in every year, the sweins or freeholders within the forest composing the jury. It inquired into the oppressions and grievances committed by the officers of the forest, and tried presentments certified from the court of attachments against offences in vert and venison. The court of justice-seat, held before the chief justice in eyre, or chief itinerant judge, or his deputy, to hear and determine all trespasses within the forest, and all claims of franchise, liberties, and privileges, and all pleas and causes whatsoever therein arising. This was a court of record; but since the Revolution, in 1688, the forest laws have fallen into total disuse.—3 Step. Com. 471 n.

Forestalling the market, buying up merchandize on its way to market, or dissuading persons to bring their goods there, or persuading them to enhance the price when there. It was deemed an offence against public trade, but abolished by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24.

Forethought felony, murder.

Forfang, or Forfeng [fr. fore, Sax., before, and fangen, to buy], the taking of provisions from any person in fairs or markets before the royal purveyors were served with necessaries for the sovereign. Also the seizing and rescuing of stolen or strayed cattle from the hands of a thief or of those having illegal possession of it; also the reward fixed for such rescue.

Forfeiture, a penalty for an offence or unlawful act, or for some wilful omission of a tenant of property, whereby he loses it, together with his title, which devolves upon others.

Forfeiture results from the following circumstances:

(1) Treason, misprision of treason, felony, murder, præmunire, and striking or threatening a judge.

By attainder, consequent upon actual sentence in treason, a man forfeits to the crown all his lands and tenements of inheritance of freehold tenure, whether fee-simple or fee-tail, and all his rights of entry on freehold lands and tenements, which he had at the time of the offence committed, or at any time afterwards, to be for ever vested in the crown; and also the profits of all freehold lands and tenements which he had in his own right for life or years, so long as such interest shall subsist.

By misprision or concealment of treason, the profits of lands are forfeited during life.

By attainder for felony, the offender forfeits the profits of all estates of freehold during life; and by attainder for murder, the offender moreover forfeits, after his death, all his freehold lands and tenements in fee simple (but not those in tail), to the crown for a year, day, and waste.

By præmunire, which see.

By striking any person in the Superior Courts at Westminster, or drawing a weapon upon a judge there presiding, the offender forfeits the profits of his lands during his life.

It is to be observed that copyholds, as well for treason as murder, are forfeited to the lord, and not to the crown.

The forfeiture begins from the day of the commission of the treason, so as to nullify all intermediate sales, incumbrances, and transfers. By 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 11, the wife of a man attainted of treason forfeited her dower.

A person sometimes executes a conveyance of his realty in order to avoid a forfeiture; it is almost needless to remark that such a conveyance is fraudulent, and absolutely void.

The royal pardon converts the offender into a new man, freeing him from all penalties and forfeitures relating to the offence forgiven.

(2) Conveyance contrary to law, as transferring a freehold to an alien, who may take lands, but cannot hold them; wherefore upon office found the crown is entitled to the land.

(3) Alienation in mortmain, or to any kind of corporation (which was supposed to hold property in a dead hand locked up from all change or transfer), was prohibited under pain of forfeiture to the lord. The crown may, however, grant a license, which will avoid this forfeiture.—7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 37; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, s. 12.

(4) Disclaimer, which is a tenant's denial of his landlord's title, either by refusing to pay rent, or denying any binding obligation to pay it, or by setting up a title either in himself or any other person. This operates a forfeiture of all interest in such tenant. Before the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, if a tenant of a particular estate attempted to pass by feoffment a larger interest in the property than he possessed, it would have caused a forfeiture of his estate; but this act (s. 4) has converted a feoffment into an innocent conveyance, which only transfers that interest which a tenant may lawfully transfer, so that this kind of forfeiture is altogether exploded.

(5) Breaches of covenants or conditions contained in a lease or other instrument, when it is expressly stipulated that they shall occasion forfeiture; however, a forfeiture, under these circumstances, may be waived by the person entitled to take advantage of it, either by his express declaration, or by any act inconsistent with it, or admitting a continuing tenancy, as by receiving rent accrued due since the breach, or distraining for the same, or by encouraging the tenant to make subsequent improvements; but he must have fully known of the act of forfeiture at the time of waiver, otherwise it will be no waiver. Subsequent breaches are not waived by a prior act of dispensation.

(6) Waste, which is a lasting damage to the freehold and inheritance. Waste is now seldom insisted on as a forfeiture, but is redressed by an action for damages occasioned by it.

(7) Breach of copyhold customs.

(8) Bankruptcy and Insolvency: which shifts the title of the insolvent to his assignees for the the benefit of creditors.

Besides the grounds of forfeiture mentioned above, there are two, which obtain in ecclesiastical property, viz.: (1) lapse; and (2) simony.

As to the power of Courts of Common Law to relieve against forfeiture incurred by non-payment of rent, or breach of covenant to insure against loss or damage by fire, see C. L. P. A. 1860; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126; and Accident, ante, p. 17.

Forfeiture of Marriage, an ancient writ which lay against him who, holding by knight's service, and being under age and unmarried, refused to marry the woman whom the lord offered him without his disparagement, and married another.—F. N. B. 431; Reg. Orig. 163.

Forgabulum, or Forgavel, a quit-rent; a small reserved rent in money.

Forgery [fr. forger, Fr., or fingo, Lat.], the crimen falsi, or the false making or alteration of an instrument, which purports on the face of it to be good and valid for the purposes for which it was created, with a design to defraud.

The offence of forgery was at common law a misdemeanor, but certain forgeries were by statute made felonious. Many of these statutes were consolidated by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 W. IV. c. 66, which is now repealed, and the statute law of England and Ireland has been consolidated and amended by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98. See as to the forgery of the Great Seal, Privy Seal or Privy Signet, the Sign-Manual, the Seals of Scotland or the Great Seal of Ireland (s. 1); transfers of stock, &c., and powers of attorney relating thereto, or attestation to such powers (ss. 2, 4); false entries in books of the public funds (s. 5); clerks of banks making out false dividend warrants (s. 6); forgery of India bonds (s. 7); of Exchequer bills, bonds, debentures, &c. (s. 8); of bank notes, bank bills, &c. (s. 12); of deeds, bonds, wills, bills of exchange or promissory notes, orders or receipts, &c. for money or goods (ss. 20–23); of debentures (s. 26); of proceedings of courts of record, copies of certificates, process of courts not of record, and instruments made evidence by statute (ss. 27, 28, 29); of court rolls (s. 30); of registers of deeds (s. 31); of orders of justices, recognizances, affidavits, &c. (s. 32); of name of accountant-general or of any officer of any court, or of officer of Banks of England and Ireland (s. 33); of marriage licenses or certificates (s. 35); of registers of births, marriages, deaths, or burials (ss. 36, 37). The statute also provides for the punishment of numerous offences which, though not amounting to forgery, facilitate, or are steps towards the commission of, that crime, or are of a somewhat similar nature, e. g.: the false personation of owners of stock, &c., and transferring stock or receiving dividends (s. 3); making plates in imitation of those used for Exchequer bills, &c. (s. 9); making paper in imitation of that used for Exchequer bills (s. 10); having in possession paper, plates, dies, &c., used for Exchequer bills (s. 11); purchasing or receiving forged bank notes, bank bills, &c. (s. 13); making or having in possession moulds for making paper, or paper with certain marks thereon similar to those on the notes of the Banks of England or Ireland, or of other banks (ss. 14, 15, 18); engraving on plates anything purporting to be a note or part of a note of such banks, or any words, figures, &c. resembling the words, figures, &c. upon such notes, or having in possession such plates (ss. 16, 17); engraving on plates, notes, or parts of notes, purporting to be the notes, &c. of foreign states, or having in possession such plates, or uttering or having impressions of such plates (s. 19); drawing, making, accepting, endorsing, or signing bills, notes, and receipts, &c. without authority (s. 24); obliterating crossings on cheques (s. 25); falsely acknowledging recognizances (s. 34); demanding property on forged instruments (s. 38).

The 9 Geo. IV. c. 32, provided (even before the late change of law, by which interested parties are now allowed to be competent witnesses) that the party whose name is forged may be a witness to prove that the writing is not his. But proof of forgery by comparison of handwriting is not admissible.

It is not necessary to set forth a copy or a fac simile of the forged instrument in the indictment, a description of it being sufficient. Nor to allege or prove an intent to defraud a particular person.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, ss. 42, 44. The capital punishment, in all cases of forgery, is abolished, and the punishment is now penal servitude, the length of which varies according to the nature of the offence, from life to three years, or imprisonment for not more than two years. See Roscoe's Crim. Evid. 466, et seq.

The following is a list of statutes, many of which are either specially or virtually repealed, containing provisions against forgery in particular cases:—

Forgery as to Records, &c.: 8 Rich. II. c. 4; 8 Hen. VI. c. 12; 2 & 3 Anne, c. 4; 5 & 6 Anne, c. 18; 7 Anne, c. 20; 8 Geo. II. c. 6; 52 Geo. III. c. 143; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 94; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 17.

Forinsecum manerium, that part of a manor which lies without the town, and is not included within the liberties of it.—Paroch. Antiq. 351.

Forinsecum servitium, the payment of extraordinary aid.—Ken. Glos.

Forinsecus, outlawed, or on the outside.

Forisbanitus, banished.—Mat. Par. 1245. Forisfacere, i. e. extra legem seu consuetudinem facere.—Co. Litt. 59.—(Forisfacere, i. e. to do something beyond law or custom.)

Forisfactura, forfeit.

Forisfamiliation, the putting a person into the possession of land in his father's lifetime.—1 Reeves, 110.

Forler-land, land in the diocese of Hereford, which had a peculiar custom attached to it, but which has been long since disused, although the name is retained.—But. Surv. 56.

Forma legalis forma essentialis.—10 Co. 100. (Legal form is essential form.)

Formâ non observatâ infertur adnullatio actus.—12 Co. 7.—(Form not being observed, a nullity of the act is inferred.)

Formalities, robes worn by the magistrates of a city or corporation, &c., on solemn occasions.—Encyc. Lond.

Formedon, a writ in the nature of a writ of right, which was the remedy for a tenant-in-tail on a discontinuance. It was of three kinds: (1) In descender; (2) in remainder; (3) in reverter.—3 Reeves, 4. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Formella, a certain weight of above 70 lbs., mentioned in 51 Hen. III.

Formulary, a form, a precedent.

Fornagium [fr. fournage, Fr.], the fee taken by a lord of his tenant, who was bound to bake in the lord's common oven (in furno domini); or for a permission to use his own.—Plac. Parl. 18 Edw. I.

Fornication, the act of incontinency in single persons; if either party be married, it is adultery. The Spiritual Court takes cognizance of the offence, and by 27 Geo. III. c. 44, the suit must be instituted within eight months, and not at all after the marriage of the parties offending.

Forprise, an exception or reservation; also an exaction; or a taking beforehand.

Forschel, a strip of land lying next to the highway.

Forschoke, forsaken.

Forses [catatudæ, Lat.], waterfalls.—Cam. Brit.

Forspeaker, an attorney or advocate in a cause.—Blount.

For-speca, For-spreca, prolocutor, paranymphus.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Forstellarius est pauperum depressor, et totius communitatis et patriæ publicus inimicus.—3 Inst. 196.—(A forestaller is an oppressor of the poor, and a public enemy of the whole community and country.)

Fortalice, a fortress or place of strength, which anciently did not pass without a special grant.—11 Hen. VII. c. 18.

Forthcoming, action of, a process in the nature of a foreign attachment.—Scotch Law.

Forthwith, when a defendant is ordered to plead forthwith, he must plead within twenty-four hours. When a statute enacts that an act is to be done 'forthwith,' it means that the act is to be done within a reasonable time.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 161. See INSTANTER.

Fortia, power, dominion, or jurisdiction.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 29.

Fortifications. Acts for defraying the expenses of constructing fortifications for the protection of the Royal Arsenals and Dockyards, and the ports of Dover and Portland, and of erecting a central arsenal.—23 & 24 Vict. c. 109, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 78. See also 23 & 24 Vict. c. 112, 'An act to make better provision for acquiring lands for the defences of the realm.'

Fortility, a fortified place; a castle; a bulwark.

Fortior est custodia legis quam hominis.—2 Rol. Rep. 325.—(The custody of the law is stronger than that of man.)

Fortior et æquior est dispositio legis quam hominis.—Co. Litt. 234.—(The disposition of the law is stronger and more equal than that of man.)

Fortlett, a place or fort of some strength; a little fort.—O. N. B. 45.

Fortuna, treasure-trove.

Fortunam faciunt judicem.—Co. Litt. 167. (They make fortune a judge.)

Fortune-tellers, persons pretending or professing to tell fortunes; are punishable as rogues and vagabonds.—5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 2.

Fortunium, a tournament or fighting with spears; and an appeal to fortune therein.—Mat. Par. 1841.

Forty-days' Court, the court of attachment in forests, or wood-mote court. See FOREST.

Forum, a court; the court to the jurisdiction of which a party is liable. Forum competens, a court having jurisdiction over the suit; forum incompetens, a court not having such jurisdiction.

Forum originis [Lat.], the court of the country of a man's domicile by birth.

Forwarding Merchant, a person who receives and forwards goods, taking upon himself the expenses of transportation, for which he receives a compensation from the owners, but who has no concern in the vessels or wagons by which they are transported, and no interest in the freight, and is not deemed a common carrier; but he is a mere warehouseman and agent.—Story's Bailments, 509.

Fossa, a ditch full of water, wherein women committing felony were drowned; also a grave. See FURCA.

Fossagium, the duty levied on the inhabitants for repairing the moat or ditch round a fortified town.

Fossway [fr. fossus, Lat., digged], one of the four ancient Roman ways through England. Trevisa describes it thus: 'The first and gretest of the foure weyes is called fosse, and stretcheth oute of the south into the north, and begynneth from the corner of Cornewaille, and passeth forth by Devenshyre, by Somersete, and forth besides Tetbury, upon Cotteswold, beside Coventre, unto Leycester, and so forth, by wylde pleynes towards Newerke, and endeth at Lincoln.'—Polychron, l. 1, c. xiv.

Fosterland, lands allotted for the maintenance of a person.

Fosterlean, the remuneration fixed for the rearing of a foster-child.

Foujdar, Fojedar, Phousdar, Fogedar, under the Mogul government a magistrate of the police over a large district, who took cognizance of all criminal matters within his jurisdiction, and sometimes was employed as receiver-general of the revenues.—Indian.

Foujdarry, the office of a Foujdar.

Foujdarry-court, a tribunal for administering criminal law.—Indian.

Foundation, the founding or building of a college or hospital. The incorporation of a college or hospital is the very foundation; and he who endows it with land or other property is the founder.

Foundling-hospitals, charitable institutions which exist in most countries, for taking care of infants forsaken by their parents, such being generally the offspring of illegal connections.

Fourcher, to divide.

Fourching, the act of delaying legal proceedings.

Fourierism. Of all the forms of Socialism, that commonly known as Fourierism, manifests the greatest skill in its construction, and the greatest foresight of objections. This system does not contemplate the abolition of private property, nor even of inheritance; on the contrary, it avowedly takes into consideration, as an element in the distribution of the produce, capital as well as labor. It purposes that the operations of industry should be carried on by associations of about two thousand members, combining their labor on a district of about a square league in extent, under the guidance of chiefs selected by themselves. In the distribution a certain minimum is first assigned for the subsistence of every member of the community whether capable, or not, of labor. The remainder of the produce is shared in certain proportions, to be determined beforehand, among the three elements—labor, capital, and talent. The capital of the community may be owned in unequal shares by different members, who would in that case receive, as in any other joint-stock company, proportional dividends. The claim of each person on the share of the produce apportioned to talent is estimated by the grade or rank which the individual occupies in the several groups of laborers to which he or she belongs; these grades being in all cases conferred by the choice of his or her companions. The remuneration, when received, would not of necessity be expended or enjoyed in common; there would be separate ménages for all who preferred them, and no other community of living is contemplated, than that all the members of the association should reside in the same pile of buildings, for saving of labor and expense, not only in building but in every branch of domestic economy; and in order that, the whole buying and selling operations of the community being performed by a single agent, the enormous portion of the produce of industry, now carried off by the profits of mere distribution, might be reduced to the smallest amount possible.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 260.

Foutgeld. See FOOTGELD.

Fowls of warren. According to Coke they are the partridge, quail, rail, pheasant, woodcock, mallard, heron, &c. According to Manwood they are the pheasant and partridge only. Co. Litt. 233 a; Manw. 95.

Fox's Act, 32 Geo. III. c. 60, which secured to juries, upon the trial of indictments or informations for libel, the important right of pronouncing a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter in issue, and were no longer bound to find a verdict of guilty on proof of the publication of the paper charged to be a libel, and of the sense ascribed to it in the indictment or information.

Foy [fr. foi, Fr.], faith; allegiance.

Fraction of a day, the law makes no fraction of time, but in cases of necessity and for the purposes of justice; when, therefore, a thing is to be done upon one day, all that day is allowed to do it in.

Fractitium, arable land.

Fractura naviun, wreck of shipping at sea.

Frampole, profitable, sed qu.

Franchilanus, a freeman.

Franchise, an incorporeal hereditament, synonymous with liberty. A royal privilege or branch of the Crown's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject. It arises either from royal grants, or from prescription, which presupposes a grant. The kinds are almost infinite, but the principal are bodies-corporate, the right to hold court-leets, fairs, markets, ferries, forests, chases, parks, warrens, fisheries. The remedy for disturbance is an action on the case.

Also, the right of voting at an election for a member of parliament.

Franchise Prisons, abolished by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 22.

Francigena, a foreigner.

Francus bancus; consuetudo est quod uxores maritorum defunctorum habeant francum bancum suum de terris sockmanorum tenentium nomine dotis.—Co. Litt. 110.—(Free-bench; it is a custom that wives of deceased husbands have their free-bench from the lands held in socage in the name of dower.)

Frangenti fidem, fides frangatur eidem.—(Let faith be broken to him who breaketh faith.)

Frank, a letter upon which no postage was payable. Members of parliament, peers, &c., formerly had the privilege of franking their letters. It was abolished upon the introduction of the penny postage by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96.

Frank-almoigne, free alms. A spiritual tenure whereby religious corporations, aggregate or sole, held lands of the donor to them and their successors for ever. They were discharged of all other except religious services, and the trinoda necessitas. It differs from tenure by divine service, in that the latter required the performance of certain divine services, whereas the former, as its name imports, is free. This tenure is expressly excepted in the 12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 7, and therefore subsists, in some few instances, at this day.

Frank-bank. See FREE-BENCH.

Frank-chase, a liberty of free chase.

Frank-fee, freehold lands exempted from all services, but not from homage.

Frank-ferm, lands or tenements changed in the nature of the fee by feoffment, &c., out of knight service, for certain yearly acknowledgments.—Britton, c. lxiv.

Frank-fold. See FOLDAGE.

Frank-law, the benefit of the fee and common law of the land.

Franklin, a steward; a bailiff of land.

Frank-marriage [in libero maritagio, Lat.], a species of entailed estates, now grown out of use, but still capable of subsisting.

When tenements are given by one to another, together with a wife, who is a daughter or cousin of the donor, to hold in frank-marriage, the donees shall have the tenements to them and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, i. e. in special tail. For the word frank-marriage, ex vi termini, both creates and limits an inheritance, not only supplying words of descent, but also terms of procreation. The donees are liable to no service except fealty, and a reserved rent would be void, until the fourth degree of consanguinity be past between the issues of the donor and donee, when they were capable by the law of the church of intermarrying.—Litt. s. 19.

Frank-pledge, a surety to the sovereign for the good behaviour of freemen. Living under frank-pledge has been termed living under law. Fleta, i. 47. See LEET.

Frank-tenement [liberum tenementum, Lat.], a freehold estate.

Frassetum, a wood or wood-ground where ash-trees grow.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Frater consanguineus, a brother by the father's side.

Frater fratri uterino non succedet in hæreditate paternâ.—(A brother shall not succeed an uterine brother in the paternal inheritance.)

This maxim is now superseded; for, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 9, it is enacted that the half-blood shall inherit next after any relation in the same degree of the whole blood and his issue, where the common ancestor is a male, and next after the common ancestor where a female, so that the brother of the half-blood, on the part of the father, shall inherit next after the sisters of the whole blood on the part of the father and their issue, and the brother of the half-blood on the part of the mother, shall inherit next after the mother.

Frater nutricius, a bastard brother.

Frater uterinus, a brother by the mother's side.

Fraternities, bodies corporate.

Fratres conjurati, sworn brothers, or companions for the defence of their sovereign, or for other purposes.

Fratriage, a younger brother's inheritance.

Fratricide, the killing of a brother or sister.

Fraud, all deceitful practices in defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rule of common honesty. It is condemned by the common law, and punishable according to the heinousness of the offence.

Lord Hardwicke has enumerated five species of fraud; 1st, frauds arising from facts and circumstances of imposition, which is the plainest case; 2nd, fraud may be apparent from the intrinsic value, and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses, and not under delusion, would make on the one hand, and as no honest or fair man would accept on the other, which are inequitable and unconscionable bargains, and of such even the common law has taken notice; 3rd, fraud which may be presumed from the circumstances and condition of the parties contracting; and this goes farther than the rule of law, which is, that fraud must be proved, not presumed; but it is wisely established in the Court of Chancery, to prevent taking surreptitious advantages of the weakness or necessity of another, which, knowingly to do, is equally against conscience as to take advantage of his ignorance; 4th, fraud may be collected or inferred in the consideration of a court of equity, from the nature and circumstances of the transaction, as being an imposition and deceit on other persons not parties to the fraudulent agreement; and 5th, fraud in what are called catching bargains with heirs, reversioners, or expectants in the lifetime of the parents, which indeed seem to fall under one or more of the preceding heads.

It is, however, impossible to lay down a general definition that shall completely comprehend fraud, and any rule that may be established cannot, from the very nature of fraud, be invariable. Fraud is infinite. 'Crescit in orbe dolus.' The ingenuity of mankind is ever anxious, ever striving to entangle in its meshes the unwary and the inexperienced, and were courts of equity to prescribe the limits of their relief against fraud, or to define strictly the species of evidence receivable in support of it, their decrees would be ineffectual and continually eluded by man's ever active ingenuity; to afford, therefore, complete protection, new principles must be created to meet new species of fraud.

Equity has concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in most cases of fraud; but there are a few cases of fraud which are not cognizable by Equity:—(1) Fraud in obtaining or suppressing a will, for if the will be of realty the proper tribunal for contesting its validity or establishment is a Common Law Court. If in the course of a suit the validity of a will be impeached, the court will direct an issue devisavit vel non, for its determination by a Common Law judge and jury. But if the will be of personalty, the Probate Court has exclusive jurisdiction. It may be material to remark, however, that though Equity cannot set aside a will for fraud, it will convert the person practising the fraud, if he claim a benefit under the will, into a trustee (at least to the extent of such benefit), for the person injured by the fraud. (2) Criminal fraud, for penal laws are not administrable in the Court of Chancery. (3) The Statute Law, 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 15, appears to have ousted the jurisdiction of Equity in the case of fraudulent awards, for where the submission to arbitration is made a rule of a Common Law Court, such a court has now ample authority to set aside such an award, upon a motion supported by affidavits. And (4) generally where a fraud respects personalty and sounds merely in damages, the remedy is at law only, especially when an adequate and ample reparation can there be made to the injured party, the ascertainment of damages being the peculiar province of a jury.

The following ten general rules govern Equity in redressing a fraud:—

(1) The rule of law as to fraud is considered as a good rule in Equity, i. e. that fraud is never to be presumed; it must be proved either expressly, or by necessary implication from the intrinsic nature of the transaction. Dolum non nisi perspicuis indiciis probari convenit; but in some cases that may be fraud in Equity (where fraud may be established by presumptive evidence) which is not so at law. Equity will, on grounds of public policy, declare void transactions which have taken place under circumstances where, independently of other considerations, from the condition of the parties, and the difficulty which must exist of obtaining positive evidence as to the fairness of the transaction, they are peculiarly open to fraud and undue influence.

(2) An impeached deed cannot be supported by evidence of considerations wholly different from those alleged in it.

(3) A person who enables another to commit a fraud is himself responsible for its consequences.

(4) A married woman who commits a fraud, renders her property liable to its consequences.

(5) If the principal in a fraud be released, parties who would have been secondarily liable cannot be proceeded against.

(6) A deed cannot be set aside partim for fraud; it must be set aside in toto, and a fraudulent deed will thus be set aside, though innocent persons are interested under it.

(7) Wherever a contract is void, either by a positive law or upon principles of public policy, it cannot be confirmed; but where it is voidable only, a deliberate confirmation by the parties who could have avoided it, will establish its validity.

(8) There is no statute of limitations which bars the remedy for a concealed fraud, since no length of time can sanctify it, but its redress should be sought within six years from the knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, or from the time when such knowledge might have been acquired by reasonable diligence; and as to fraud relating to realty, relief will be withheld, if twenty years have been suffered to elapse from the acquisition of its knowledge.

(9) The remedy for fraud does not die with the person, but relief may be obtained against the representative of its deceased perpetrator.

(10) Equity admits parol evidence to vary, alter, or explain written instruments on the ground of accident, mistake, or fraud. It is an exception to the rule excluding the reception of verbal evidence against written agreements. But it is obvious, that the exception and also the rule stand upon the same ground of policy, the suppression of fraud and the promotion of general good faith and confidence.

If an instrument be obtained from persons ignorant of their rights, but whose rights are known to the party obtaining the instrument, a court of equity will relieve, even though no fraud or imposition has been practised.

Suppressio veri (suppression of truth), or suggestio falsi (suggestion of falsehood), in solemn conveyances, releases, or agreements, will afford a sufficient ground for setting them aside.

There are a variety of cases where a person standing by, and by silence contributing to a fraud, has been compelled to remedy the mischief his fraudulent silence has occasioned.

There is no case where mere inadequacy of price, independent of other circumstances, has been held sufficient to set aside a transaction. A bargain may be hard and unconscionable, and yet valid, unless the inadequacy of price is such as 'shocks the conscience,' and amounts in itself to conclusive evidence of fraud in the transaction.

A voluntary conveyance (unless obtained by imposition or fraud, as from a person of weak intellect), is good against the party making it, though cancelled, and against all subsequent acts of the donor, whether by deed or will, though the devise be for the payment of debts, for the court 'will not loose the fetters the party hath put upon himself; but he must lie down under his own folly.' But as against purchasers as well of equitable as legal estates for a valuable consideration, even where the purchase was made with notice of the prior settlement, and also as against those who where creditors at the time of the making of it, a voluntary conveyance is void.—27 Eliz. c. 4.

A settlement, however, though voluntary at first, and therefore bad as against creditors and purchasers, may afterwards become good, even against them; as, where the object of the settlement sells to another, or where a father settles land on a daughter, and a person marries her in confidence of such settlement, in either case the settlement may be enforced.

Although drunkenness is a kind of insanity whilst it lasts, yet as it is caused by a man's voluntary act, it is no excuse for crime, and in strictness of law a man cannot avoid contracts made, or acts done by him, when drunk. Courts of equity, however, will relieve from a contract made or act done by a person when in such a state of drunkenness as to be utterly deprived of the use of his reason and understanding, for then there can be no deliberate consent, without which no contract or act ought to be binding by the law of nature. Indeed such a contract would be held void in a court of law, at all events if the other party to it was aware of the condition of the drunken person.—Gore v. Gibson, 13 M. & W. 623.

When a contract is made or act is done by a person drunk, but the drunkenness is not such as to deprive him entirely of the use of his reason and understanding, courts of equity will not relieve unless the drunkenness was brought about by contrivance or management, or some unfair advantage was taken of the intoxication. Weakness of mind, if it be not such as to render the person non compos, is not per se sufficient ground for setting aside an act or contract, but inasmuch as it renders a person liable to imposition, it is a material ingredient in ascertaining whether there has been fraud or undue influence; and if the nature of the act or contract justify the conclusion that a person of weak mind has not exercised a deliberate judgment, but that he has been imposed upon, circumvented, or overcome by cunning or artifice, or by undue influence, equity will set aside the act or contract. See 1 Fonbl. Eq. 67; Story's Eq. Jurisp. s. 234, et seq.; Butler v. Mulvihill, 1 Bligh, 137.

Where deeds are set aside for fraud, they will generally be permitted to stand as a security for what is really due.—Wharton v. May, 5 Ves. 59; 1 Madd. Prin. of Equity, tit. 'Fraud.'

Fraud, constructive, such acts or contracts as, though not originating in any actual evil design, or contrivance to perpetrate a positive fraud or injury upon other persons, yet, by their tendency to deceive or mislead other persons, or to violate public or private confidence, or to impair or injure the public interests, are deemed equally reprehensible with positive fraud, and therefore are prohibited by law, as within the same reason and mischief, as acts and contracts originating malo animo.

Thus in order to prevent injustice and shut out all inducement to perpetrate a wrong, certain transactions are held to be fraudulent, because they are contrary to some general policy, or to some fixed artificial legal principle, as marriage-brokerage-bonds, and contracts in general restraint of trade. Other transactions again growing out of some special confidential or fiduciary relation between the parties, or some of them, are watched with especial jealousy and solicitude, because they afford the power and the means of taking undue advantage or of exercising undue influence over others: such are transactions between parent and child, attorney and client, principal and agent or surety, guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, partners, &c. Others again are of a mixed character, combining, in some degree, the ingredients of the preceding, with others of a peculiar nature; but they are chiefly prohibited, because they operate substantially as a fraud upon the private rights, interests, duties, or intentions of third parties; or unconscientiously compromise, or injuriously affect the private interests, rights, or duties of the parties themselves, such as secret composition-deeds, voluntary conveyances, &c.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 213.

Frauds and Perjuries, Statute of, 29 Car. II. c. 29, c. 3 (A.D. 1677). This famous statute is said to have been framed by Sir Matthew Hale, Lord Keeper Guilford, and Sir Lincoln Jenkins, an eminent civilian. Lord Nottingham used to say of it that 'every line was worth a subsidy,' and it has been said that at all events the explanation of every line has cost a subsidy, no statute having been the subject of so much litigation. 'This statute,' remarks Mr. Chancellor Kent, 2 Com. 494, n. d., 'carries its influence through the whole body of American civil jurisprudence, and is in many respects the most comprehensive, salutary, and important legislative regulation on record, affecting the security of private rights.'

The main object of the statute was to take away the facilities for the commission of fraud and the temptation to commit perjury which arose from the enforcement of merely verbal obligations, the proof of which depended entirely upon unwritten evidence. Its principal enactments are:—That parol conveyances, leases, &c. of land, unless put in writing and signed by the parties making the same, or their agents lawfully authorised by writing, shall have the effect of leases at will only except in the case of a lease for not more than three years, reserving as rent two-thirds of the annual value (ss. 1 & 2). That grants and surrenders shall be by deed or writing signed by the party granting or surrendering, or his agent authorised by writing (s. 3). That no action shall be brought to charge an executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate; or to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person; or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage; or upon any contract or sale of lands, or any interest in or concerning them; or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing and signed by the party to be charged, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised (s. 4). That all declarations and creations of trust of lands shall be in writing, except trusts arising by implication or construction of law (ss. 7 & 8). That grants and assignments of trusts shall be in writing (s. 9). That lands shall be liable to the judgment, &c. of cestui que trust, and held free from incumbrances of the trustees; and trusts, in fee simple, shall be assets in the hands of the heirs of the cestui que trust (s. 11). That the day of inquiry or judgment shall be entered upon the margin of the roll, and judgments as against purchasers shall only relate to such time (ss. 14 & 15). That writs of execution shall bind the property of goods only from the time of their delivery to the sheriff (s. 16). That 'no contract for the sale of any goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of 10*l.* or upwards shall be good except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part of payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by the contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorised' (s. 17).

The statute also contained important provisions as to the making, revocation, &c. of wills devising land, and as to nuncupative wills, &c., which have been repealed by the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26.

Fraudulent Conveyances, Statutes against, 13 Eliz. c. 5, A.D. 1570, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 5. It enacts that every conveyance of lands, hereditaments, goods, and chattels, or of any lease, rent, common, or other profit or charge, out of lands, &c. by writing or otherwise, and every bond, suit, judgment, and execution to be had or made with the intent to defraud creditors or others of their actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures, heriots, mortuaries, and reliefs, shall be deemed (only as against that person, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, whose actions, &c. are or shall be any way disturbed, delayed, or defrauded) to be utterly void.

The 27 Eliz. c. 4, s. 2, made perpetual by 39 Eliz. c. 18, enacts that every conveyance of lands, tenements, or hereditaments whatsoever, had or made with the intent and purpose to defraud and deceive any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, who shall purchase the same, shall be deemed and taken (only as against that person or persons, body politic or corporate, his and their heirs, successors, executors, administrators, and assigns), to be utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect. Provided that the act shall not extend or be construed to defeat or make void any conveyance, &c. made for good consideration and bonâ fide. See Twyne's case, 1 Smith's L. C. 1.

The deeds which are rendered void by these statutes are of two sorts:—(1) Deeds made with an express intent to defraud creditors or subsequent purchasers. (2) Deeds made upon good but not valuable considerations, which are usually called voluntary conveyances.—Roberts' Essay on Fraud. Conv.

Fred, peace.

Fredstole, or Fridstoll, sanctuaries, seats of peace.—Gibson's Camden.

Fredum, a composition anciently paid by a criminal to be freed from prosecution, of which the third part was lodged in the Exchequer.

Fredwit, a liberty to hold courts and make amerciaments.

Free-bench [sedes libera, Lat.], a widow's dower out of copyholds to which she is entitled by the custom of some manors. It is regarded as an excrescence growing out of the husband's interest, and is indeed a continuance of his estate.

The term freebench is equally applicable to the estate which, by the custom of some manors, a husband takes in his wife's copyhold lands after her death, and anciently it was indiscriminately applied to that and to the widow's dower, but now the estate of the husband is called his curtesy, while the term freebench is confined to that of the widow. The etymology of the word may be thus traced. Upon a wife or husband acceding to the estate, upon the death of a deceased husband or wife, she or he immediately became a tenant of the manor, and entitled to sit on the homage as one of the pares curiæ, and hence was called a bencher.

Since freebench is only claimable by special custom, the estate which a widow is to take, both as to its quantity, quality and duration, must be such as the custom prescribes. It is generally a third for her life, as at common law, but it is sometimes a fourth part only, and sometimes but a portion of the rent. In many manors, the wife takes the whole for her life, in others she takes the inheritance. Frequently the customary right is durante viduitate, and in some cases it is confined to her chaste widowhood. In the manors of East and West Emborne, and the manor of Chadleworth in Berkshire, the widow, if found guilty of incontinency, loses her freebench, unless she comes into court, riding backwards upon a black ram, repeating certain ridiculous words. (See COPYHOLD.) The same custom prevails in the manor of Torre in Devon.

Freebench differs from dower at the common law, in that the former, unless the particular custom declares it to be otherwise, does not attach, even in right, till the actual decease of the husband; whereas the right to dower at the common law attaches immediately on marriage, and the widow is entitled to dower in lands of which the husband was seised at any time during the coverture. As the right of the wife to freebench does not attach till the husband's death, any alienation by him alone, to take effect in his lifetime, though without the concurrence of the wife, whether it be by surrender in court, by forfeiture, or in consequence of enfranchisement, effectually bars the claim of the widow. And even if the husband make a lease for years, though by license of the lord, the widow shall not avoid it. But in this case, it must be remarked that her claim to freebench is not defeated by reason of the husband's not dying seised (though it should seem to be so urged in some of the books), as he would most indisputably die seised in the present instance, he being the copyholder, and not the lessee, and moreover the possession of the lessee at common law should be the possession of the lessor; and, therefore, it should seem that the widow would not in this case be barred only quoad the lease, and consequently be entitled on its expiration. By special custom, however, the widow shall have her freebench, notwithstanding such lease, though without prejudice to it, she receiving the rent, &c. And if the husband contract for the sale of his copyhold, and die without any actual surrender, a court of equity will compel the widow to relinquish her freebench. A fortiori, if the husband actually surrender, and die before the admittance of the surrenderee, she shall be barred: for the subsequent admittance of the surrenderee, though after the death of the husband, relates to the time of the surrender, and so precedes the title of the wife.

So if the husband become a bankrupt, and die after the execution of the bargain and sale by the commissioners, and before the admittance of the vendee, the widow of the bankrupt shall not be entitled to her freebench.

And as it is so repeatedly said that the husband must die seised, at least by relation, in order to enable the widow to claim, it may be proper here to observe, that there can be no disseisin of a copyhold; and, consequently, though a person should enter with strong hand into the copyhold premises, yet the copyholder would continue tenant to the lord; and, therefore, if the husband was, before such entry, seised of the premises, he would, notwithstanding such entry, continue seised; and consequently such entry would not defeat the title of the wife.—2 Wat. Cop. 82, et seq.

The Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, does not affect equitable copyholds, but only freeholds.

The widow of a purchaser or heir at law, who dies before admittance to his copyhold, is nevertheless dowable, since the admittance has reference back to the contract or ancestor's decease.

A jointure before marriage, in lieu of dower and thirds out of any lands of freehold and inheritance, is a bar in equity to freebench, which is a customary right nomine dotis; so is a devise with the same intent.

When a widow is dowable by custom, her estate has all the incidental qualities of dower at common law. Since the wife's estate is a continuation of that of her husband, she holds of the lord, and is not in need of admittance, except by special custom, or, at least, it will be sufficient if she challenge her admittance. Admittance, however, is not dispensed with in gavelkind lands, or where the widow only takes a portion of the husband's copyhold lands, and then the heir must assign her freebench before her entry, and he could be compelled to do so by plaint in the nature of a writ of dower, duly levied in the manor court.

Formerly the remedy for freebench was by a plaint in the manor court, which was unaffected by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, but by the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26, the plaint is abolished, and in lieu thereof an action may be brought by writ of summons issuing out of the Court of Common Pleas, upon which is to be endorsed a notice that the plaintiff intends to declare for freebench.

Free-board, land claimed in some places, more or less, beyond or without the fence, said to be two feet and a half.—Mon. Ang. t. 2, p. 141.

Free-borough men, such great men as did not engage like the frank-pledge men for their decennier.

Free-chapel, a place of worship, so called because not liable to the visitation of the ordinary. It is always of royal foundation, or founded at least by private persons to whom the Crown has granted the privilege.—1 Burn's E. L. 298.

Free-course, having the wind from a favorable quarter.—Mar. Law.

Free-fishery, a royal franchise, being the exclusive right of fishing in a public river. Grants of this description cannot now be made, the Great Charter and its confirmations prohibiting it.

Freehold, one of the two chief tenures known in ancient times by the phrase 'tenure in free socage,' and the only free lay mode of holding property. It is derived from the feudal system, but the services connected with it were always accounted honorable, and of a mild and somewhat independent character. The annihilation of the feudal severities has left this tenure unshackled, and by far the greater part of the real property in this country is, at this day, freehold. Also such an interest in lands of frank-tenement as may endure not only during the owner's life, but which is cast after his death upon the persons who successively represent him, according to certain rules elsewhere explained. Such persons are called heirs, and he whom they thus represent, the ancestor. When the interest extends beyond the ancestor's life, it is called a freehold of inheritance, and when it only endures for the ancestor's life, it is a freehold not of inheritance. An estate to be a freehold, must possess these two qualities: (1) Immobility, that is, the property must be either land or some interest issuing out of or annexed to land; and (2) a sufficient legal indeterminate duration, for if the utmost period of time to which an estate can endure be fixed and determined, it cannot be a freehold.

Free-holder, he who possesses a freehold estate.

Freehold Land Societies, designed for the purpose of enabling mechanics, artisans, and other working-men, to purchase a piece of freehold land at the least possible price, of a sufficient yearly value to entitle the owner to the elective franchise for the county in which the land is situated.—See Stone's Build. Soc., p. 96, et seq.

Free-man [liber homo, Lat.], an allodial proprietor; one born or made free of certain municipal immunities and privileges. As to Freemen in London see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 20.

Free-masons, secret societies formed, as it is supposed, for mutual assistance and the promotion of friendship and good fellowship. They are protected by law. See 39 Geo. III. c. 79, ss. 5, 7; and 57 Geo. III. c. 19, s. 26.

Free-men's roll, a list of all persons admitted burgesses, or freemen of those rights which are reserved by the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76), as distinguished from the burgesses newly created by the act, and entitled to the rights which it confers, who are entered on the burgess-roll. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 35.

Free-services, such as were not unbecoming the character of a soldier or a freeman to perform, as to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, or the like.

Free-ships, neutral ships.

Free-warren, a royal franchise, granted by the Crown to a subject for the preservation or custody of beasts and fowls of warren.

Freight, the sum paid by a merchant or other person chartering a ship or part of a ship, or sending goods in a general ship, for the use of such ship or part, or the conveyance of such goods during a specified voyage or for a specified time. The freight is most commonly fixed by the charter-party, or bill of lading, but in the absence of any formal stipulation on the subject, it would be due according to the custom or usage of trade. In the absence of an express contract to the contrary, the entire freight is not earned until the whole cargo be ready for delivery, or has been delivered to the consignee, according to the contract for its conveyance.—McCull. Comm. Dict.; Maude and Pollock on Shipping.

Freighter, he who loads goods on board a ship.

Frend-wite [fr. freond, Sax., friend, and wite, mulct], a fine exacted of him who harboured an outlawed friend.

Frequentia actûs multum operatur.—4 Co. 78.—(The frequency of an act operates much.)

Fresca, fresh water.

Fresh disseisin, that disseisin which a person might formerly seek to defeat of himself, and by his own power, without resorting to the law; as where it was not above fifteen days old, or of some other short continuance.—Brit. c. v.

Fresh-fine, a fine that had been levied within a year.

Fresh-force, a force newly done in any city, borough, &c.

Fresh suit, or pursuit, such a present and earnest following of a robber as never ceases from the time of the robbery until apprehension. The party pursuing will then have back again his goods, which otherwise are forfeited to the Crown.

Frettum frectum, the freight of a ship; freight-money.

Fretum Britannicum, the straights between Dover and Calais.

Friar [frater, Lat., brother], an order of religious persons, of whom there were four principal branches, viz.: (1) Minors, Grey Friars, or Franciscans; (2) Augustines; (3) Dominicans, or Black Friars; (4) White Friars, or Carmelites, from whom the rest descend.

Fribourgh, or Frithburgh, the Norman term for frank-pledge.

Fribusculum, a temporary separation between husband and wife.—Civil Law.

Friendless man, an outlaw, because he was denied all help of friends.

Friendly Societies, associations supported by subscription for the mutual relief and maintenance of its members or their wives, children, relations, and nominees, against certain casualties, as those of sickness, infancy, advanced age, widowhood, &c. The statute governing them is 18 & 19 Vict. c. 73., amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 58. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, & 23 Vict. c. 13, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 137.

Friendly suit, one brought by a creditor in chancery against an executor or administrator, which is really a suit by the executor or administrator, in the name of a creditor against himself, in order to compel the creditors to take an equal distribution of the assets.—2 Wm. Exs. 1731. Also a suit instituted by agreement between the parties to obtain the opinion of the court upon some doubtful question in which they are interested.

Friling, or Freoling [fr. freoh, Sax., free, and ling, progenies], a freeman born.

Friscus, fresh uncultivated ground.—Mon. Angt. t. 2, p. 56.

Frith-borg, frank-pledge.

Frithbreach, the breaking of the peace.

Frithgar, the year of jubilee, or of meeting for peace and friendship.

Frithgilda guildhall; a company or fraternity for the maintenance of peace and security; also a fine for breach of the peace.

Frithman, a member of a company or fraternity.

Frith-socn, or Frithstol, an asylum; sanctuary.

Frithsoke, Frithsoken, the right of liberty of frank-pledge.

Frith-splot, or Frith-geard, a spot or plot of land, encircling some stone, tree, or well, considered sacred, and therefore affording sanctuary to criminals.

Frodmortel, or Freomortel, an immunity for committing manslaughter.

From excludes the day from which the time is to be reckoned.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 160.

Fructus augent hæreditatem.—D. A. 3, 20, 31.—(Fruits enhance an inheritance.)

Fructus industriales (emblements).

Frumgyld, the first payment made to the kindred of a person slain, the recompense for his murder.

Frumstol, original or paternal dwelling.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Frusca terræ, waste and desert lands.

Frussura, a breaking; ploughing.

Frustrà est potentia quæ nunquam venit in actum.—2 Co. 51.—(The power which never comes into act is in vain.)

Frustrà expectatur eventus cujus effectus nullus sequitur.—5 Co. Eccl. L.—(An event is vainly expected from which no effect follows.)

Frustrà feruntur leges nisi subditis et obedientibus.—7 Co. 13.—(Laws are made in vain unless to those subject and obedient.)

Frustrà fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora.—Jenk. Cent. 68.—(That is done vainly by many things which might be done by less.)

Frustrà legis auxilium quærit qui in legem committit.—(Vainly does he who offends against law seek the help of law.)

Frustrà petis quod statim alteri reddere cogeris.—Jenk. Cent. 256.—(Vainly you beg that which you will be immediately forced to restore to another.)

Frustrà probatur quod probatum non relevat. (That is vainly proved which, being proved, would not aid the matter in question.)

Frustum terræ, a piece or parcel of land. Co. Litt. 5 b.

Frutectum, Frutetum, Fruticetum, a place where shrubs or herbs grow.

Frymith, Fyrmth, the affording harbour and entertainment to any one.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Frythe, a plain between woods.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Fuage. See FUMAGE.

Fuer, flight. It is of two kinds: (1) fuer in fait, or in facto, where a person does apparently and corporally flee; (2) fuer in ley, or in lege, when being called in the county-court he does not appear, which legal interpretation makes flight.

Fuero jurgo, a code of Spanish law, said to be the most ancient in Europe.

Fuga catallorum, a drove of cattle.

Fugacia, a chase.

Fugam fecit (he has made flight), said of a person who is found by inquisition to have fled for felony, &c., upon which forfeiture of goods took place. Obsolete.—7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 5.

In Scotland, when a criminal does not obey the citation to answer, the court pronounces sentence of fugitation against him, which induces a forfeiture of goods and chattels to the Crown.

Fugatio, a privilege to hunt.—Blount.

Fugatores carrucarum, wagoners, who drive oxen without beating or goading.—Fleta, l. 2, c. lxxviii.

Full Age. See AGE.

Fullum aquæ, a fleam or stream of water.

Fumage, Fuage, or Fouage (vulgarly called smoke-farthings), a tax paid to the sovereign for every house that had a chimney. It is probable that the hearth-money, imposed by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 10, took its origin hence. This hearth-money was declared a great oppression, and abolished by 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 10; but a tax was afterwards laid upon all houses, except cottages, and upon all windows, by 7 Wm. III. c. 18.

Function [fr. fungor, Lat., to perform], employment; discharge of office.

Functus officio (having discharged a duty).

Fundatio est quasi fundi datio; et appellatione fundi ædificium et ager continentur.—10 Co. 33.—(Foundation is, as it were, a giving of revenue or fund; and under the term 'fundus,' building and land are comprised.)

Fundi patrimoniales (lands of inheritance).

Funditores, pioneers.

Funds, public, the name given to the public funded debt due by government.

The practice of borrowing money in order to defray a part of the war expenditure began, in this country, in the reign of William III. In the infancy of the practice, it was customary to borrow upon the security of some tax, or portion of a tax, set apart as a fund for discharging the principal and interest of the sum borrowed. This discharge was, however, very rarely effected. The public exigencies still continuing, the loans were, in most cases, either continued, or the taxes were again mortgaged for fresh ones. At length the practice of borrowing for a fixed period, or, as it is commonly termed, upon terminable annuities, was almost entirely abandoned, and most loans were made upon interminable annuities, or until such time as it might be convenient for government to pay off the principal.

In the beginning of the funding system, the term 'fund' meant the taxes or funds appropriated to the discharge of the principal and interest of loans; those who held government securities, and sold them to others, selling, of course, a corresponding claim upon such fund. But after the debt began to grow large, and the practice of borrowing upon interminable annuities had been introduced, the meaning attached to the term 'fund' was gradually changed, and instead of signifying the security upon which loans were advanced, it has, for a long time, signified the principal of the loans themselves.

The different funds or stocks constituting the public debt are the following:—

(I.) Funds bearing interest at three per cent.

(a) Three per Cent. Consols, or Consolidated Annuities.—This stock forms by far the largest portion of the public debt. It had its origin in 1751, when an act was passed consolidating (hence its name) several separate stocks bearing an interest of three per cent. into one general stock.

(b) Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities.—This fund was established in 1757. It consisted, as the name implies, of several funds which had previously been borrowed at a higher rate of interest; but by an act passed in 1749, it was declared that such holders of the funds in question as did not choose to accept in future a reduced interest of three per cent. should be paid off, an alternative which comparatively few embraced.

(c) New Three per Cent. Annuities.—This fund, which came into existence in 1854, in pursuance of an arrangement made in 1844, consists of several funds which had previously paid a higher rate of interest, viz.: (1) The Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities of 1818. (2) The Reduced Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities of 1824. (3) The New Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities, arising from the reduction and conversion of other stock in 1830 and 1834.

(d) Debt due to the Bank of England.—This consists of the sum of 11,015,100*l.* lent by the Bank to the public at three per cent. This must not be confounded with Bank capital, on which the shareholders receive dividends.

(II.) Funds bearing other than three per cent. interest.

(a) New Five per Cent. Annuities, created in 1830, redeemable in 1873, amounting to 423,603*l.*

(c) New Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities, amounting to 2,981,038*l.* Funds (b) and (c) were created in the year 1854, when Government paid off the holders of the South Sea Old and New Three per Cent. Annuities, and the Three per Cent. Annuities of 1726 and 1751, giving the holders the option of being paid off or taking stock in either of these two funds upon certain terms.

Dividends on Consols, New Two-and-a-Half per Cents., New Three-and-a-Half per Cents., and New Five per Cents., are payable January 5th and July 5th. Dividends on the Reduced Three per Cents. and New Three per Cents. are payable April 5th and October 10th.

(III.) Annuities:

(a) Long Annuities.—These annuities were created at different periods, but they all expired together in 1860. They were chiefly granted by way of premia or douceurs to the subscribers to loans. Payable on April 5th and October 10th.

(b) Annuities per 4 Geo. IV. c. 22.—This annuity is payable to the Bank of England, and is commonly known by the name of the 'Dead Weight' annuity. It expires in 1867. It is equivalent to a perpetual annuity of 470,319*l.* 10*s.*

(c) Annuities per 48 Geo. III., 10 Geo. IV. c. 24, and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 14.—These acts authorized the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt to grant annuities for terms of years, and life annuities, accepting in payment either money or stock, according to rates specified in tables to be approved by the lords of the treasury. No annuities are granted on the life of any nominee under fifteen years of age, nor in any case not approved by the commissioners. Annuities for terms of years not granted for any period less than ten years. These annuities are transferable, but not in parts or shares. They are payable January 5th and July 5th, or April 5th and October 10th, according to the date of their purchase.

Foreign Funds.—Exclusive of the funded and unfunded debt due by the British Government, more than nineteen-twentieths of which is held by British subjects, our countrymen are also large creditors of foreign states.

Fundus. The primary signification of this word appears to be, the bottom or foundation of a thing; and its elementary part (fud) seems to be the same as that of βυθ-ός, and πυθ-μήν, the n in fundus being used to strengthen the syllable. The conjectures of the Latin writers as to the etymology of fundus may be safely neglected. Fundus is often used as applied to land, the solid substratum of all man's labors.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Funeral charges. An executor or administrator should bury the deceased testator or intestate in a manner suitable to the estate he has left, and the expense of the burial will be allowed before all other debts and charges; but if the personal representative be extravagant, he commits a devastavit, for which he will be answerable to the creditors or legatees.

Fungibiles res, a term applied in the civil law to things of such a nature as that they could be replaced by equal quantities and qualities, because mutuâ vice funguntur, they replace and represent each other, thus a bushel of wheat. A particular horse would not be fungibilis res.—Sand. Just. 425.

Fungibles, moveable goods, which may be estimated by weight, number, or measure; such as corn, wine, or money.

Furandi, animus (an intent of stealing).

Furca [fr. farkah, Heb., to divide], the gallows.

Furcam et flagellum (the gallows and whip), the meanest of all servile tenures, when the bondman was at his lord's disposal, both life and limb.

Furigeldum, a mulct paid for theft.

Furiosity, madness, as distinguished from fatuity or idiotcy.

Furiosus absentis loco est. Non multùm distant à brutis qui ratione carent.—4 Co. 126.—(A madman is like a man who is absent. Those who want reason are not far removed from brutes.)

Furiosus solo furore punitur.—Co. Litt. 247.—(A madman is punished by his madness alone.)

Furiosus stipulare non potest nec aliquid negotium agere, qui non intelligit quid agit.—4 Co. 126.—(A madman who knows not what he does cannot make a bargain, nor transact any business.)

Furlong [fr. furlang, A.S.; furlongus, ferlingus, ferlingum, low Lat.], quasi a furrow long, that is bounded or terminated by the length of a furrow; i.e. quod uno progressu aratrum describit antequam regreditur; this equals 40 perches (or poles), each equal to 217½ feet, or the eighth part of a mile.—Spelman Gloss., Arch. Also, as Mins. says, the eighth part of an acre. Stadium and quarentena terræ are sometimes used for a furlong.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Furnagium. See FORNAGIUM.

Furst and Fondung, time to advise or take counsel.

Further Advance, or Charge, a second or subsequent loan of money to a mortgagor by a mortgagee, either upon the same security as the original loan was advanced upon, or an additional security. Equity considers the arrears of interest on a mortgage security converted into principal, by agreement between the parties, as a further advance.

Further Assurance, Covenant for, one of the usual agreements entered into by a vendor for the protection of the vendee's interest in the subject of purchase. It seems to be confined to an assurance by way of conveyance, and not to extend to further obligations to be imposed on the covenantor by way of covenant.—St. Leon. V. and P. 500; Woodfall's Land. and Ten. 515.

Further consideration, as to setting down a cause for. See Smi. Ch. Pr. 629, et seq.

Further directions, when a Master ordinary in Chancery has made a report in pursuance of a decree or decretal order, the cause is again set down before the judge who made the decree or order, that it may be proceeded with and completed. Where a Master makes a separate report, or one not in pursuance of a decree or decretal order, a petition for consequential directions should be presented, since the cause cannot be set down for further directions under such circumstances.

Further maintenance of the action, plea to the. See PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE.

Furtum [fr. furvum, Lat., black, or fraus or ferre, taking away; or φῶρ, Gk., a thief, fr. φερεῖν, to carry away], theft; robbery. It is manifestum et nec manifestum.—Sand. Just. 501, et seq., where other kinds are enumerated; and see 2 Reeves, 40.

Furtum est contrectatio rei alienæ fraudulenta, cum animo furandi, invito illo domino cujus res illa fuerat.—3 Inst. 107.—(Theft is the fraudulent handling of another's property, with an intention of stealing, against the will of the proprietor, whose property it was.)

Furtum non est ubi initium habet detentionis per dominum rei.—3 Inst. 107.—(It is not theft where the commencement of the detention arises through the owner of the thing.)

Future Estates, expectancies, which are, at the common law, of two kinds: reversions and remainders.

Future Uses. See CONTINGENT USES.

Fuz, or Fust [Celt.], a wood or forest.

Fyht-wite, one of the fines incurred for homicide.

Fyrd, Fyrdung, the military array or land force of the whole country. Contribution to the fyrd was one of the imposts forming the trinoda necessitas.

Fyrd-wite, the fine incurred by neglecting to join the fyrd; one of the rights of the Crown. Anc. Inst. Eng.

G.

Gabel [fr. gabelle, Fr.; gabella, Ital.; gafel, Sax.], an excise, a tax on moveables; a rent, custom, or service.—Co. Litt. 213.

Gabulus denariorum, rent paid in money.—Seld. Tit. 321.

Gaffoldgild, the payment of custom or tribute.—Scott.

Gaffoldland, property subject to the gaffoldgild, or liable to be taxed.—Ibid.

Gafol, rent.

Gage [fr. gage, Fr.], a pledge, pawn, or caution; anything given in security.

Gage, Estates in, those held in vadio or pledge. They are of two kinds: (1) vivum vadium, or living pledge, or vifgage; (2) mortuum vadium, or dead pledge, better known as mortgage.

Gager de deliverance, when he who has distrained, being sued, has not delivered the cattle distrained; then he shall not only avow the distress, but gager deliverance, i. e. put in surety or pledge that he will deliver them.—F. N. B. 67.

Gager del ley (wager of law).

Gainage [fr. gainagium, Lat.], the gain or profit of tilled or planted land, raised by cultivating it; and the draught, plough, and furniture for carrying on the work of tillage by the baser kind of sokemen or villeins.—Bract. l. 1, c. ix.

Gainery [fr. gaignerie, Fr.], tillage or the profit arising from it, or from the beasts employed therein.—Stat. West. 1, cc. 16, 17.

Gale [fr. gavel, Sax., a rent or duty], a periodical payment of rent.—Spelm. voce 'gabellum.'

Galli-halfpence, a kind of coin which, with suskins and doitkins, were forbidden by 3 Hen. V. c. 1.

Gallivolatium [fr. gallus, Lat., cock], a cock-shoot, or cock-glade.

Gallon, a liquid measure, containing 231 cubic inches, or 4 quarts.

Gallows [it is used by some in the singular, but more generally in the plural. Golgo, Goth; gealga, Sax.; galge, Dut.; fr. agælwan, Sax., to fright], a beam laid over either one or two posts, on which malefactors are hanged.—Encyc. Lond.

Game [fr. gaman, Sax.], all sorts of birds and beasts that are objects of the chase. The term is defined by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32, as including hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath or moor-game, black-game, and bustards; but some of its provisions are also directed to woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, and conies.

This act repeals the Qualification Act of 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 25, and many others relating to game, and provides that the right to kill game upon any land shall be vested in the owners of such land (mere occupiers for short terms excepted), or in any person who may have their grant or permission for the purpose. But it requires all persons killing or taking game to take out a yearly certificate, and all uncertificated persons selling it, a yearly license; and it contains penal provisions for the better preservation of game, and for the protection of land from unlawful trespasses in sporting.

As to the certificate, see 52 Geo. III. c. 93; 54 Geo. III. c. 141; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 49; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 35, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90. As to the killing of hares by the occupiers of enclosed lands, without a certificate, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 29, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90. As to taking or killing hares or rabbits in a warren in the night, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17. See generally Locke on the Game Laws; 1 Step. Com. 164, 674; ii. 19, et seq.; iv. 366, 577. See also POACHING, post.

Gamekeepers. As to their appointment and authority, see 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32, s. 13.

Gaming, or Gambling, the art or practice of playing and following up any game, particularly those of chance, as cards, dice, &c.

The 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, s. 11, prohibits the keeping of any common house for dice, cards, or any unlawful games, under penalties of 40*s.* for every day of so keeping the house, and 6*s.* 8*d.* for every time of playing therein; and the 30 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 14, inflicts punishment of the same kind, as well upon the master of any public house wherein laborers or servants are permitted to game, as upon the laborers and servants themselves. As to the forfeiture of public-house licenses, see 9 Geo. II. c. 61. By 12 Geo. II. c. 28; 13 Geo. II. c. 19; and 18 Geo. II. c. 34, the games of faro, basset, ace of hearts, hazard, passage, roly-poly, and roulette, and all other games with dice, except backgammon, are prohibited under a penalty of 200*l.* for him that shall erect the same, and 50*l.* a time for the players. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, repeals so much of the 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, as prohibits bowling, tennis, or other games of mere skill. It also provides that the owner or keeper of any common gaming-house, and every person having the care or management thereof, and also every banker, croupier, and other person in any manner conducting the business of any common gaming-house, shall, on conviction by the oath of one witness, before two justices of the peace, be liable, in addition to the penalties of the act of Hen. VIII. to pay such penalty (not more than 100*l.*) as shall be adjudged by such justices, or, in their discretion, may be committed to the house of correction, with or without hard labor, for not more than six calendar months, with a proviso that nothing therein contained shall prevent any proceeding by indictment; but that, on the other hand, no person who shall be so summarily convicted shall be liable to be proceeded against by indictment for the same offence. Also, that every person who shall have been concerned in any unlawful gaming, and who shall be examined as a witness before any justice of the peace, or on the trial of any indictment or information against the owner, or keeper, or person having the care of any common gaming-house, touching such unlawful gaming, and who shall make true discovery thereof to the best of his knowledge, and receive from the court a certificate of his having done so, shall be freed from all criminal prosecutions, forfeitures, and disabilities for anything done in respect of such unlawful gaming. With respect to the game of billiards, in particular, it is provided that the justices of the peace at the special sessions, called the general annual licensing meeting, may grant annual billiard licenses to such persons as in their discretion they may deem fit to keep public billiard tables and bagatelle boards, or instruments used in any game of the like kind. Severe penalties are imposed on persons keeping such tables or boards without being duly licensed, or allowing play between one and eight o'clock in the morning on any day, or at any time on Sunday, Christmas-day, or Good Friday, or on any day of public fast or thanksgiving. Every person who shall, by fraud, or unlawful device, or ill practice in play, betting, or wagering at any game, win any sum of money or valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of obtaining the same by a false pretence, and be punished accordingly; and all contracts, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and no suit at law or in equity shall be brought to recover from a stakeholder a deposit on a wager, provided that such enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription towards a plate or prize at any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise. See also 17 & 18 Vict. c. 38, 'An Act for the Suppression of Gaming Houses.'

The 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 41 (amending 9 Anne, c. 14), enacts that all notes, bills, or mortgages given for money won at play, shall be deemed to be given on an illegal consideration, and are consequently void between the original parties, but they are not void in the hands of indorsees or purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice.

Gaming was forbidden by the Roman laws, both during the times of the republic and under the emperors.—Cic. Philip, ii. 23; Cod. 3, tit. 33. Hence Horace (Carm. iii. 24), alluding to the progress of effeminate and licentious manners, says, that boys of rank, instead of riding and hunting, now showed their skill in playing with the hoop, or even at games of chance, although they were illegal (vetita legibus alea). Gaming was also condemned by public opinion. In his gregibus, says Cicero (in Cat. ii. 10), omnes aleatores, omnes adulteri, omnes impuri impudicique versantur. To detect and punish excesses of this description belonged to the office of the ædiles (Martial, xiv. 1).

Games of chance were, however, tolerated in the month of December at the Saturnalia, which was a period of general relaxation (Martial, iv. 14; Gellius, xviii. 13), and among the Greeks, as well as the Romans, old men were allowed to amuse themselves in this manner.—Eurip. Med. 67; Civ. Senect. 16; Juv. xiv. 4.

Ganancial [Sp.], a species of community in property enjoyed by husband and wife, the property being divisible between them equally on a dissolution of the marriage.—1 Burge, Confl. Laws, 418.

Gangiatori, officers whose business it is to examine weights and measures.—Scotch term.

Gang-week [fr. gangan, Sax., to go], the time when the bounds of the parishes are lustrated or gone over by the parish officers—rogation-week.—Encyc. Lond.

Gantelope [fr. gant, Dut., all; and loopen, to run], a military punishment, in which the criminal running between the ranks receives a lash from each man.—Encyc. Lond.

Gaol [fr. gaola, Lat.; geole, Fr., a cage for birds], a prison; a strong place for the confinement of offenders against the law.

There must be maintained one common gaol at the expense of every county of England and Wales; and at the expense of every county and division having a distinct commission of the peace, at least one house of correction.

Every prison (subject to a few exceptions to which the prison acts do not extend) must have a resident keeper, and resident matron to superintend the female prisoners, as also a visiting chaplain and surgeon, and must be visited three times a-year by two or more justices of the peace appointed at the quarter sessions for that purpose. These visitors are to make reports to every session as to the state of the prison and prisoners within their jurisdiction, which are to be the basis of a general report from the quarter-sessions, to be drawn up and transmitted annually by the chairman to a principal Secretary of State, and to be afterwards laid before both Houses of Parliament.

Besides the ordinary gaols and houses of correction in counties and boroughs, the following are particular, subject to separate and specific regulations, viz. the Queen's Prison, the Millbank Prison, the Parkhurst Prison, and the Pentonville Prison.—3 Step. Com. 240.

As to gaol fees, see 14 Geo. III. c. 20; 55 Geo. III. c. 50; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 114.

Gaol delivery, a commission to the Judges, &c. empowering them to try and deliver every prisoner who may be in gaol when they arrive at the assize town, whenever or before whomsoever indicted, or for whatever crime committed. See ASSISE.

Gaoler, the master or keeper of a prison; one who has the custody of a place where prisoners are confined; the servant of the sheriff, who is responsible for his conduct.

Garb, a bundle or sheaf of corn; a handful. Fleta, l. 2, c. xii.

Garbales decimæ, tithes of corn.

Garbler of spices, an ancient officer in the city of London, who may enter into any shop, warehouse, &c. to view and search drugs and spices, and garble and make clean the same; or see that it be done.—6 Anne, c. 16.

Garcio stolæ (groom of the stole).

Garciones, servants who follow a camp.—Wals. 242.

Gard [fr. garde, Fr.], wardship, care, custody.

Gardia, custody.—Lib. Feud.

Garlanda, a chaplet, coronet, or garland.

Garnestura, victuals, arms, and other implements of war, necessary for the defence of a town or castle.—Mat. Par. 1250.

Garnish, money paid by a prisoner on his going to prison. Forbidden by 4 Geo. IV. c. 43, s. 12, r. 23. Also, warning an heir; repealed by 6 Geo. IV. c. 105, s. 13.

Garnishee, a person warned not to pay money which he owes to another person, when the latter is indebted to the person warning or giving notice.

Garnishment, warning not to pay money, &c. to a defendant, but to appear and answer to a plaintiff-creditor's suit. It usually arose in cases of detinue thus:—If a defendant alleged that certain deeds were delivered to him by the plaintiff and another person upon condition, such defendant prayed that the other person might be warned to plead with the plaintiff, as to whether the conditions were performed or not, he the defendant being willing to deliver the property to the person entitled to it; thereupon a process of garnishment, monition, or notice issued, and all parties were brought before the court, that the cause might be thoroughly and justly determined. It was nearly allied to the proceedings in interpleader.—3 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law, 448. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

By the C. L. P. A. 1854, it is enacted, that it shall be lawful for any creditor who has obtained a judgment in any of the superior courts to apply to the court or a judge for a rule or order that the judgment-debtor should be orally examined as to any and what debts are owing to him, before a master of the court, or such other person as the court or judge shall appoint; and the court or judge may make such rule or order for the examination of such judgment-debtor, and for the production of any books or documents; and the examination shall be conducted in the same manner as in the case of an oral examination of an opposite party before a master under this act (s. 60).

It shall be lawful for a judge, upon the ex parte application of such judgment-creditor, either before or after such oral examination, and upon affidavit by himself or his attorney stating that judgment has been recovered, and that it is still unsatisfied, and to what amount, and that any other person is indebted to the judgment-debtor and is within the jurisdiction, to order that all debts owing or accruing from such third person (hereinafter called the garnishee) to the judgment-debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment-debt; and by the same or any subsequent order it may be ordered that the garnishee shall appear before the judge or a master of the court, as such judge shall appoint, to show cause why he should not pay the judgment-creditor the debt due from him to the judgment-debtor, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the judgment-debt (s. 61).

Service of an order that debts due or accruing to the judgment-debtor shall be attached, or notice thereof to the garnishee, in such manner as the judge shall direct, shall bind such debts in his hands (s. 62).

If the garnishee does not forthwith pay into court the amount due from him to the judgment-debtor, or an amount equal to the judgment debt, and does not dispute the debt due or claimed to be due from him to the judgment-debtor, or if he does not appear upon summons, then the judge may order execution to issue, and it may be sued forth accordingly, without any previous writ or process, to levy the amount due from such garnishee towards satisfaction of the judgment-debt (s. 63).

If the garnishee disputes his liability, the judge, instead of making an order that execution shall issue, may order that the judgment-creditor shall be at liberty to proceed against the garnishee by writ, calling upon him to show cause why there should not be execution against him for the alleged debt, or for the amount due to the judgment-debtor if less than the judgment-debt, and for costs of suit; and the proceedings upon such suit shall be the same, as nearly as may be, as upon a writ of revivor issued under 'The Common Law Procedure Act 1852' (s. 64).

Payment made by or execution levied upon the garnishee under any such proceeding as aforesaid shall be a valid discharge to him as against the judgment-debtor to the amount paid or levied, although such proceeding may be set aside or the judgment reversed (s. 65).

In each of the superior courts there shall be kept at the masters' office a debt-attachment-book, and in such book entries shall be made of the attachments and proceedings thereon, with names, dates, and statements of the amount recovered, and otherwise; and the mode of keeping such books shall be the same in all the courts, and copies of any entries made therein may be taken by any person, upon application to any master (s. 66).

The costs of any application for an attachment of debt under this act, and of any proceedings arising from or incidental to such application, shall be in the discretion of the court or a judge (s. 67).—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 699.

Garnisture, a furnishing or providing.

Garranty. See GUARANTY.

Garson, a menial servant.—Toland.

Garsummune, a fine or amerciament.

Garter [fr. gardus, Wel.; jartier, Fr., from gar, the binding of the knee], a string or ribbon by which the stocking is held upon the leg; the mark of the highest order of knighthood, ranking next after the nobility.

This military order of knighthood is said to have been first instituted by Richard I. at the siege of Acre, where he caused twenty-six knights who firmly stood by him to wear thongs of blue leather about their legs. It is also said to have been perfected by Edward III. and to have received some alterations, which were afterwards laid aside, from Edward VI. The badge of the order is the image of St. George, called the George, and the motto is Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Garth [same as girth, fr. gyrdan, A. S., to surround, to enclose], an enclosure about a house, church, &c.; a backside; a close; a dam or wear.

Gas, for regulating measures used in sale of, see 10 & 12 Vict. c. 11; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 66; 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 125 & 146; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 79.

Gastaldus, a temporary governor of the country.—Blount.

Gaudies, double commons.—University term.

Gaudy [fr. gaudium, Lat.], a feast, a festival, a day of plenty.—Ibid.

Gauge, railway. See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 57.

Gauger, a surveying officer under the Board of Excise.

Gaugetum, a gauge or gauging; a measure of the contents of any vessel.

Gavel. See GABEL.

Gavelcester [sextarius vectigalis, Lat.], a certain measure of rent-ale. See OAKGAVEL; TOLCHESTER.

Gavelet [fr. gaveletum, Lat.], an ancient and special kind of cessavit, used in Kent and London for the recovery of rent. Obsolete. The statute of Gavelet is 10 Edw. II.—2 Reeves, c. xii., p. 298.

Gavelgeld, payment of tribute or toll.

Gavelkind. No legal term (not excepting the words 'session' or 'parliament') has more engaged the attention of legal antiquaries, or produced more learned discussion, than the derivation of the word 'gavelkind.' It has been treated of by Camden, Spelman, Lambarde, Coke, Somner, and Robinson, and has also received the deep consideration of many other profound and learned men, whose opinions upon the subject are divisible into two classes:—First, those which are founded on the nature of the land in point of descent; and, secondly, those founded on the nature of the services yielded by the land. But without entering into a detailed disquisition on the merits of each opinion, which would only tend to confuse, we shall be content, as to the first division, with stating the opinion of Lord Coke (1 Inst.

140 a), where he says: 'Gavelkinde, that is, "Gave all kinde," for this custom giveth to all the sons alike.' This interpretation is clearly founded on the partibility of its descent, and in this opinion Coke is followed by many. But the derivation which is generally received, and which is supported by most of the names already mentioned, is drawn from the nature of the services, and supposes that the term 'gavelkind' is derived from the Saxon word 'gafol,' or, as it is otherwise written, 'gavel,' which signifies 'rent,' or a 'customary performance of husbandry works,' and therefore the land which yielded this kind of service, in contradistinction to knight-service land, was called 'GAVELKIND,' that is, 'land of the kind that yields rent.' Lambarde (Perambulations of Kent, ed. 1656, p. 585) first advanced and promulgated this supposition, in opposition to the opinion of Lord Coke, which, until then, was generally received.

Gavelkind land descends in the right line to all the sons equally, being an exception to the law of primogeniture. In default of sons, it descends to the daughters in the ordinary manner.

It is to be remarked, that though females, claiming in their own right, are postponed to males, yet they may inherit together with males by representation. If, therefore, a man have three sons, and purchase lands held in gavelkind, and one of the sons dies in the lifetime of his father, leaving a daughter, she will inherit the share of her father; yet she is not within the words of the custom, inter hæredes masculos partibilis; for she is no male, but the daughter of a male coming in his stead jure representationis.

This custom extends also to the collateral line, for it has been resolved that where one brother dies without issue, all the other brothers shall inherit from him; and in default of brothers, their respective issue shall take jure representationis. But where the nephews succeed with an uncle, the descent is per stirpes and not per capita; and so from the nature of the thing it must be, where the sons of several brothers succeed, no uncle surviving, for though in equal degree, they stand in the place of their respective fathers.

The partible quality of gavelkind extends also to estates-tail, for if a person die seised in tail of lands held in gavelkind, all his sons shall inherit together as heirs of his body.

Since the 1st January, A.D. 1834, the half-blood shall inherit, the Inheritance Act, s. 9, extending to this custom; for it applies to land of every tenure (s. 1).

The other special customs of this tenure are: (1) that a wife is dowable of one-half, instead of one-third of the land; (2) that a husband will be tenant by the courtesy, whether there be issue born or not, but only of one-half so long as he remains unmarried; (3) that gavelkind lands are not liable to escheat for felony, the maxim being, 'The father to the bough, the son to the plough,' although they are for treason or want of heirs; and (4) that an heir in gavelkind at fifteen years may make a contract and sell his estate for money; but the livery upon the feoffment (the only deed which can be adopted) must be made by the heir in person; for, being under age, he cannot, by the common law, appoint an attorney.

Gavelkind, before A.D. 1066, was the general custom of the realm; the feudal law of primogeniture superseded it. It was retained in Kent, because, according to the historical legend, the Kentish men surrounded William I. with a moving wood of boughs, just after the slaughter at Hastings, and for that service obtained a confirmation of their ancient rights.

By 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 26, all gavelkind lands in Wales were made descendible to the heir according to the common law; from which it would appear that the tenure likewise obtained in that principality.

And even in Kent, lands belonging to various persons have been disgavelled by statute, especially the 31 Hen. VIII. c. 3, and made descendible according to the course of the common law. This can be only effected by Act of Parliament. Gavelkind is met with occasionally in a modified form in copyholds.

Primâ facie all land in Kent is gavelkind, except such as is disgavelled by particular statutes (which should always be noticed in transactions relating to Kentish property); and as to such land the custom is never pleaded, but is presumed, and the courts are bound to take judicial notice of it.—1 Mod. 98.

Gavelman, a tenant liable to tribute.—Blount.

Gavelmed, the duty or work of mowing grass or cutting meadow-land, required by the lord from his customary tenants.—Somn.

Gavelwerk, the personal labor of customary tenants.

Gazette [fr. gaza, treasure; or gazza, a magpie, typical of its gossiping nature; or gazetta, the name of a coin, about a farthing, for which it was sold], the official newspaper of the government, said to have been first published at Oxford in 1665; on the removal of the court to London, the title was changed to the London Gazette. It is published on Tuesdays and Fridays, and contains all the acts of state, and proclamations; also dissolutions of partnership, and notices of proceedings in bankruptcy. It is evidence of such governmental proceedings as it contains.—5 T. R. 436.

Gazetteer, an officer appointed to publish news by authority, whom Steele calls the lowest minister of state.

Gebocced [Ang.-Sax.], conveyed.

Geburscrip, neighbourhood or adjoining district.

Geburus [fr. gebure, Sax., a farmer], an inhabitant of the same gebureship or village.

Geld, a mulct, compensation, value, price. Angeld is the single value of a thing; twigeld, double value, &c.

Geldable, taxable.

Gemot, a mote or moot, meeting, public assembly. The various kinds were—

(1) The folc-gemot, or general assembly of the people, whether it was held in a city or town, or consisted of the whole shire. It was sometimes summoned by the ringing of the moot-bell. Its regular meetings were annual.

(2) The shire-gemot, or county court which met twice during the year.

(3) The burg-gemot, which met thrice in the year.

(4) The hundred-gemot, or hundred court, which met twelve times a year in the Saxon ages; but afterwards a full, perhaps an extraordinary, meeting of every hundred was ordered to be held twice a year. This was the sheriff's tourn, or view of frank-pledge.

(5) The halle-gemot, or the court-baron.

(6) The wardemotus.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Genealogy [fr. γενεά, Gk., and λόγός], history of the succession of families; enumeration of descent in order of succession; pedigree.—Encyc. Lond.

Genearch [fr. γενεά, Gk., and ἀρχός], the head of a family.

Geneath, a hind or farmer.

Gener, a son-in-law.

General agent, a person who is authorised by his principal to execute all deeds, sign all contracts, or purchase all goods required in a particular trade, business, or employment.

General Council, the assembly of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

General demurrer, a pleading at common law, which excepts to the sufficiency of a pleading in general terms, without showing specifically the nature of the objection. It is resorted to when the objection is to matter of substance.—Step. Plead. 152.

General Gaol Delivery. See GAOL DELIVERY.

General Inclosure Act. The 41 Geo. III. c. 109, which consolidates a number of regulations as to the enclosure of common fields and waste lands. See INCLOSURE ACTS.

General issue, a plea simply traversing modo et formâ the allegations in the declaration.

By r. 21 H. T. 1853, in every case in which a defendant shall plead the general issue, intending to give the special matter in evidence, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, he shall insert in the margin of the plea the words 'by statute,' together with the year or years of the reign in which the act or acts of Parliament upon which he relies for that purpose were passed, and also the chapter and section of each of such acts, and shall specify whether such acts are public or otherwise, otherwise such plea shall be taken not to have been pleaded by virtue of any Act of Parliament, and such memorandum shall be inserted in the margin of the issue, and of the nisi prius record. But see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 97, s. 3; Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 254–274, 1262, 1266, 1267, 1270, 1292.

In criminal proceedings, the general issue is 'not guilty,' which is pleaded vivâ voce by the prisoner at the bar.

General lien, a right to detain a chattel, &c. until payment be made, not only of any debt due in respect of the particular chattel, but of any balance that may be due on general account in the same line of business. A general lien being against the ordinary rule of law, depends entirely upon contract, either express or implied, from the special usage of the particular trade, or the previous course of dealing between the parties. See LIEN.

General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, the Courts of, tribunals held in every county before two or more justices of the peace, one of whom must be of the quorum, once in every quarter of a year, which, by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 85, is appointed to be in the first week after the 11th of October, the first week after the 28th of December, the first week after the 31st of March, and the first week after the 24th of June. When holden otherwise than quarterly, they are called 'The General Sessions of the Peace.' To prevent, however, the interference of the spring assizes with the April quarter sessions, the justices of the Epiphany sessions may, if they see occasion, name two of their body to fix some day for holding the next general quarter sessions, not earlier than the 7th of March, nor later than the 22nd of April.—4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 47. By virtue of 34 Edw. III. c. 1, they had jurisdiction to try all felonies and misdemeanors within their respective counties, but their jurisdiction has been narrowed by subsequent statutes, and is now confined to the trial of the smaller felonies and misdemeanors, and especially offences relating to game, highways, ale houses, bastard children, the settlement and provision for the poor, servants' wages, and apprentices. They also hear appeals from the decisions of justices of the peace not made in sessions. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, defines the jurisdiction of justices in general and quarter sessions. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71., amended by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 4., provides for the general sessions of the peace in Middlesex.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 25. See 4 Step. Com. 397.

General ship, a ship employed by the owners on a particular voyage in the conveyance of the goods of a number of persons unconnected with each other.

General tail, an estate-tail where one parent only is specified, whence the issue must be derived, as to A. and the heirs of his body. See TAIL.

General verdict, the decision of the jury, when they find the point in issue generally. A general verdict is sometimes found for the plaintiff, subject to a special case, stating the facts for the opinion of the court above.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 448, 453.

General warrant, a process which used to issue from the office of the secretary of state, to arrest (without naming any persons in particular) the author, printer, and publisher of such obscene and seditious libels as were particularly specified in it. It was declared illegal and void for uncertainty by a vote of the House of Commons.—Com. Jour. 22nd April, 1766.

Generale, the usual commons in a religious house, distinguished from pietantiæ, which on extraordinary occasions were allowed beyond the commons.

Generale dictum generaliter est interpretandum. Generalia verba sunt generaliter intelligenda.—3 Inst. 76.—(A general saying is to be interpreted generally. General words are to be understood generally.)

Generale nihil certum implicat.—2 Co. 33.—(A general expression implies nothing certain.)

Generale tantum valet in generalibus quantum singulare in singulis.—11 Co. 59.—What is general prevails as much amongst things general as what is particular amongst things particular.

Generalia præcedunt, specialia sequuntur. Reg. Br.—(Things general precede, things special follow.)

Generalia specialibus non derogant.—Jenk. Cent. 120.—(Things general do not take from things special.)

Generalia sunt præponenda singularibus.—(General are to be placed before particular things.)

Generalibus specialia derogant.—(Things special take from things general.)

Generalis clausula non porrigitur ad ea quæ antea specialiter sunt comprehensa.—8 Co. 154.—(A general clause does not extend to those things which are before specially provided.)

Generals of Orders, chiefs of the several orders of monks, friars, and other religious societies.

Generatio, the issue or offspring of a mother-monastery.

Gens, race, nation, great family.

Gentleman [fr. gentilhomme, Fr.; gentilhuomo, Ital., i. e. homo gentilis, Lat.; a man of ancestry, however high his rank]. All persons above yeomen: whereby noblemen are truly called gentlemen.—Smith de Rep. Ang. l. 1, cc. xx., xxi. Consult the Origin of Gentlemen, from Leyden's Complaynt of Scotland, repub. 1801.

The word was not employed as a legal addition until about the time of Henry V.

The gentry may be divided into three classes:

(I.) They who derive their stock with arms from their ancestors, are gentlemen of blood and coat armour. They are of course the most noble who can prove the longest uninterrupted continuance of nobility in the families of both their parents.

(II.) They who are ennobled, by knighthood or otherwise, with the grant of a coat-of-arms, are gentlemen of coat-armour, and give gentility to their posterity. Such have been scornfully designated 'gentlemen of paper and wax.'

(III.) They who by the exercise of a liberal profession or by holding some office, are gentlemen by reputation, although their ancestors were ignoble, as their posterity remains after them. These are not really gentlemen, though commonly accounted such.—2 Step. Com. 636 638.

Gentleman Usher, one who holds a post at Court to usher others to the presence, &c.

Gentlewoman, a woman of birth above the common; an addition of a woman's state or degree.

Genus, in logic, the first of the universal ideas, and is when the idea is so common that it extends to other ideas which are also universal: as incorporeal hereditament is genus with respect to a rent, which is species. Genus summum is that which holds the uppermost class in its predicament; or it is that which may be divided into several species, each whereof is a genus in respect to other species placed below.—Woolley's Introd. to Logic, 45; and 1 Mill's Log. 133.

Geoponics [fr. γῆ, Gk., land, and πόνος, labor], the science of cultivating the ground; agriculture.

George-Noble, a gold coin of Hen. VIII. value 6*s.* 8*d.*—Leake.

George, St., Knight of. See GARTER.

Germ, a generation.

German [fr. germain, Fr.; germanus, Lat.], brother; one approaching to a brother in proximity of blood: thus the children of brothers and sisters are called cousins-german.

Gerontocomium [fr. γέρων, Gk., an old man, and κομέω, to take care of], an almshouse or hospital for old people.—Encyc. Lond. Their managers are called gerontocomi.

Gersumarius, finable; liable to be amerced at the discretion of the lord of a manor.

Gestation. See BIRTH.

Gestio pro hærede (behaviour as heir), conduct by which the heir renders himself liable for his ancestor's debts, as by taking possession of title-deeds, receiving rents, &c.—Scotch phrase.

Gestu et Fama, an ancient and obsolete writ, resorted to when a person's good behaviour was impeached.

Gewineda, the ancient convention of the people to decide a cause.—LL. Æthel. c. i.

Gewitnessa, the giving of evidence in our ancient British law.—Brompton.

Gewrite, writings, deeds, or charters.

Ghirdawar, Girdwar, an overseer of police, under whom the goyendas or informers act.—Indian.

Gibbet [fr. gibet, Fr.], a gallows; the post on which malefactors are hanged, or on which their bodies are exposed. It differs from a common gallows in that it consists of one perpendicular post, from the top of which proceeds one arm; except it be a double gibbet, which is formed in the shape of the Roman capital T.—Encyc. Lond.

Gift. The old text-writers make a gift (donatio) a distinct species of deed, and describe it as a conveyance applicable to the creation of an estate-tail; while a feoffment they strictly confine to the creation of a fee-simple estate. The operative verb is 'give,' which no longer implies any covenant in law (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4), and the deed requires living of seisin. It was in consequence of entails being thus originally created that the grantor was called the donor, the grantee in tail the donee, and the entail the gift or donation, the issue taking per formam doni. It is almost obsolete.

A gift is now understood to be a voluntary conveyance, without binding consideration, and therefore void in certain cases. A gift is likewise applied to gratuitous transfers of personalty and donationes mortis causâ.

Gifta aquæ, the stream of water to a mill.

Giftoman [Swed.], the right to dispose of a woman in marriage.

Gilbert's Acts, the 17 Geo. III. c. 53, and the 22 Geo. III. c. 83, which empower parishes, with the consent of two-thirds in number and value of the owners or occupiers, and with the approbation of two justices of the peace, to appoint guardians to act in lieu of overseers, in all matters relative to the relief and management of the poor, and also to enter into voluntary unions with each other for the more convenient accommodation, maintenance, and employment of paupers.

Gild, a tax, tribute, or contribution; a society or fraternity constituted for mutual protection and benefit. Consult Das Gildenwesen im Mittelalter, von Dr. W. E. Wilda.

Gilda mercatoria, a mercantile meeting or assembly.

Gildable, liable to pay a gild.

Gildmerchant, merchants who have privilege to hold pleas of land among themselves.—Scott.

Gildrent, certain payments to the Crown from any gild or fraternity.

Gill, one-fourth of a pint measure.

Girantem [fr. girare, Ital.], the drawer.—Merc. Law.

Gisement, cattle taken in to graze at a certain price; also the money received for grazing cattle.

Gisetaker, a person who takes cattle to graze.

Gisle, a pledge. Fredgisle, a pledge of peace. Gislebert, an illustrious pledge.—Gibs. Camden.

Gist of Action [fr. giste, Fr., gesir, to lie; jaceo, Lat.], the cause for which an action lies; the ground and foundation of a suit, without which it is not maintainable.

Gladiolum, a little sword or dagger; also a kind of sedge.

Gladius [jus gladii, Lat.], a supreme jurisdiction.

Glaive, a sword, lance, or horseman's staff, one of the weapons allowed in a trial by combat.

Glanville, the author of a book entitled Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ, which is supposed to have been the first undertaking of the kind in any country of Europe. Though perhaps it was not written by that Ranulphus de Glanvillâ who was justitiarius Angliæ under Henry II., yet it seems to be wholly written about the year 1181. It is little more than a sketch, as far as the plan of it goes, and is confined to proceedings in the King's Court. A translation of Glanville, with notes, was published in 1812, by Mr. Beames. See Hale's Hist. 168, and n. a; and 1 Reeves, p. 221.

Glass, Excise on, repealed by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 6.

Glass-men, wandering rogues or vagrants.—1 Jac. I. c. 7.

Glavea, a hand dart.

Gleaning, Leasing, or Lesing. It is decided that no right exists at common law for the poor to enter on a person's land and glean after harvest.—Steel v. Houghton, 1 H. Bl. 51.

Glebæ ascriptitii, villein-socmen, who could not be removed from the land while they did the service due.—Bract. c. 7; 1 Reeves, p. 269.

Glebariæ, turfs dug out of the ground.

Gliscywa, a fraternity.

Glebe, the land possessed as a part of the revenue of an ecclesiastical benefice. By s. 5 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 54, it is provided that the commissioners appointed to carry into effect the commutation of tithes shall have power to ascertain and define the boundaries of the glebe-lands of any benefice, or, with consent of the ordinary and patron, to exchange the glebe-lands for other lands within the same or any adjoining parish, or otherwise conveniently situated.—See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 84.

Glomerells, commissioners appointed to determine differences between scholars in a school or university, and the townsmen of the place.

Glossa viperina est quæ corrodit viscera textus. 11 Co. 34.—(It is a poisonous gloss which corrupts the essence of the text.)

Gloucester, Statute of, 6 Edw. I. c. 1, A.D. 1278.

Glove Silver, extraordinary rewards given to officers of courts, &c.; money given by the sheriff of a county in which no offenders are left for execution to the clerk of assize and judges' officers.

Gloves. It is an ancient custom on a maiden assize, when there is no offender to be tried, for the sheriff to present the judge with a pair of white gloves.

Glyn [fr. glyn, Erse; gleen, Scot.], a hollow between two mountains; a valley.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

God-bote, an ecclesiastical or church fine paid for crimes and offences committed against God.

God-gild, that which is offered to God or his service.

God-penny, earnest money given to a servant when hired.

Golda, a mine.

Gold-mines, a branch of the ordinary revenue of the kingdom. By 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 30, and 5 W. & M. c. 6, amended by 55 Geo. III. c. 134, it is enacted, that no mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead, shall be looked upon as royal mines, notwithstanding gold or silver may be extracted from them in any quantities; but that the sovereign or persons claiming royal mines under his authority may have the ore (other than tin ore in the counties of Devon and Cornwall), paying for the same a price stated in the act.—2 Step. Com. 569.

Goldsmith's Notes, bankers' cash notes (i. e. promissory notes given by a banker to his customers as acknowledgments of the receipt of money), were originally called in London goldsmiths' notes, from the circumstance that all the banking business in England was originally transacted by goldsmiths. Such notes are now seldom issued except by country bankers, their use having been superseded by the introduction of cheques.—Chitty on Bills, 351.

Goldwit, or Goldwich, a golden mulct.

Goliardus, a jester or buffoon.—Mat. Par. 1229.

Gomashtah, a factor, commissioner, or agent. Indian.

Good abearing. See ABEARANCE.

Good behaviour, Security for. The exercise of preventive justice, which consists in being bound with one or more sureties in a recognizance or obligation to the Crown, and taken in some court, or by some judicial officer; whereby the parties acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the Crown in the sum required, with the condition to be void and of none effect if the party shall demean and behave himself well, or be of good behaviour, either generally or specially for the time therein limited; as for one or more years, or for life; and if the condition of such recognizance be broken, by any misbehaviour, the recognizances become forfeited or absolute; and the party and his sureties become the Crown's absolute debtors, for the several sums in which they are respectively bound.—4 Step. Com. 371. See ABEARANCE.

Good consideration, as distinguished from valuable consideration—a consideration founded on motives of generosity, prudence, and natural duty; such as natural love and affection.

Goods and Chattels, the generic denomination of things personal, as distinguished from things real, or lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

Goodwill, the advantage or benefit which is acquired by a business, beyond the mere value of the capital, stock, funds or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers, on account of its local position or reputation for skill or affluence, or punctuality, or from other accidental circumstances, or even from ancient partialities or prejudices.

Goole, a breach in a seawall or bank; a passage worn by the flux and reflux of the sea.

Gooroo guru, a spiritual guide.—Indian.

Gorce, or Gors, a wear, pool, or pit of water. Termes de la Ley.

Gore, a narrow slip of land.

Gossipred, compaternity, spiritual affinity.—Canon Law.

Gote, a ditch, sluice, or gutter.

Government, that form of fundamental rules and principles by which a nation or state is governed.—Locke on Government; Paley's Polit. Phi.; Smith's Wealth of Nations; Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws.

Government Annuity Societies, formed under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 14. Their purpose is to enable the industrious classes to make provisions for themselves by purchasing, on advantageous terms, a government annuity for life or term of years. Societies regularly constituted under this act are empowered to be the medium for such contracts, in favor of any persons whom they deem to be proper objects of the intended benefit. The trustees or managers of the society act as the agents of the Commissioners for reduction of the national debt in this transaction, and the expense of the purchaser (who is relieved from all stamp duties) is limited to a very trivial amount. The annuity is charged on the consolidated fund, and made payable half-yearly upon the draft of the trustees, supported (in the case of life annuity) by proof of the existence and identity of the nominee. It may either be immediate or deferred, so as to commence at any future period to be named by the purchaser. If deferred, it may be purchased either by a single sum paid in the first instance, or by annual payments; and supposing the purchaser to live until its commencement, he becomes entitled to an annuity equivalent to the value of all his payments, with the accumulation of compound interest. If, on the other hand, in the case of a deferred life-annuity, he dies before its commencement, or (having agreed to pay by annual instalments) becomes incapable before that time of continuing the payments, the whole money that has been actually paid is returned, exclusive of interest, to his representatives or to himself, as the case may be. In the case of a life-annuity, whether immediate or deferred, which has come into possession, this advantage is also given to a purchaser—that on the death of the person on whose life the annuity depended, the purchaser or his representatives become entitled, over and above the arrears, to a sum equal to one-fourth of the annuity, provided it be claimed within two years after the decease. All annuities under this act are declared to be personal estate, are exempt from taxes and other charges, and are incapable of being sold or assigned, so as to pass the interest of the party entitled during his lifetime, unless in the case of his bankruptcy or insolvency; but where that happens, they are to be repurchased by government at a valuation, and the value paid over for the benefit of the creditors. The annual amount of annuity to be granted to any one person is not to be less than 4*l.* nor more than 30*l.*, and no purchase can be made for the life of a person under the age of fifteen. Inhabitants of a parish forming themselves into a society for the purposes contemplated by the act are entitled to claim its benefits, provided that the rector, vicar, or minister of the parish for the time being, or a resident justice of the peace, be one of the trustees, and provided that there be no savings' bank legally established in the parish, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 92. But if there be a savings' bank there of that description, a separate society for the purpose is unnecessary, and not authorised by the act; for in that case any two of the trustees or managers of the savings' bank may contract for government annuities, in favor of any person to whom they may think proper to extend the benefit, who is either a depositor in the savings' bank, or entitled in their opinion to become a depositor therein. Through whichever of these media annuities are purchased, all transactions relative to them are to be subject in either case (as far as possible) to the regulations made by 9 Geo. IV. c. 92, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 83, as to savings' banks.

Government, Offences against. They are treason; misprision of treason; discharging fire-arms or missiles, &c., at the queen; scandal against the sovereign; præmunire; contempts against the title of the sovereign, or the crown's ecclesiastical supremacy; contempts against the royal palaces; mal-administration in high offices; selling public offices; offences relating to the coin; embezzling or destroying royal stores or ships of war; serving foreign states; desertion or seducing to desert; refusing or neglecting to take the requisite oaths upon appointment by the crown to an office; administering unlawful oaths, or being engaged in illegal societies; and contempts against the prerogative.—4 Step. Com. 232–283.

Grace, a faculty, license, or dispensation; also general and free pardon by act of parliament.

Grace, Days of, time of indulgence and respite granted to an acceptor for the payment of his bill of exchange. It was originally a gratuitous favor (hence the name), but custom has rendered it a legal right.

The number of these days varies according to the ancient custom or express law prevailing in each particular country, as follows:—

	Days
Altona. Sundays and holydays included, and bills falling due on a Sunday or holyday, must be paid, or in default thereof, protested on the day previous	12

Petersburg. Bills drawn after date are entitled to 10 days' grace; those drawn at sight, to only 3 days; and those at any number of days after sight, none whatever. But bills received and presented after they are due, are, nevertheless, entitled to 10 days' grace. In these days of grace are included Sundays and holydays, as also the day when the bill falls due, on which days they cannot be protested for non-payment; but, on the morning of the last day of grace, payment must be demanded, and, if not complied with, the bill must be protested before sunset . . . . 10, 3, &c.

Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, and other parts of Brazil. Days of grace on foreign bills are 15, including holydays and Sundays, and if due on any such day must be paid, or in default thereof protested on the previous day 15

Rotterdam. Abolished by the Code Napoleon . . . . . none

Scotland 3

Spain. Vary in different parts of Spain, generally 14 days on foreign, and 8 on inland bills; at Cadiz only 6 days' grace. When bills are drawn at a certain date, fixed or precise, no days of grace are allowed. Bills drawn at sight are not entitled to any days of grace; nor are any bills, unless accepted prior to their maturity . . . (but vary) 14

Sweden 6

Trieste. Three days on bills drawn after date, or any term after sight, not less than 7 days, or payable on a particular day; but bills presented after maturity must be paid within twenty-four hours. Sundays and holydays are included in the days of grace, and if the last day of grace fall on such a day, payment must be made, or the bill protested on the first following open day 3

Chitty on Bills, p. 258.

The law of the place where the bill is payable governs the allowance or non-allowance of the days of grace. They are to be calculated exclusive of the day when the bill would otherwise become due. They are counted consecutively and in direct succession, without any deduction or allowance, on account of Sundays or holydays or other non-secular days intermediate between the first and the last; and whenever the last day of grace occurs on a Sunday or other holyday, the bill becomes due and payable, not on the succeeding, but on the preceding day. In England, days of grace are allowed on all bills, whether they are payable at a certain time after date, or after sight, or even at sight. But bills payable on demand are immediately payable on presentment, without any grace days; and so are bills not expressing the time of payment; for then, in legal contemplation, they are payable on demand.—Story on Bills, 385.

Gradient, moving by steps; the deviation of railways from a level surface to an inclined plane.

Graduates, scholars who have taken degrees in an university.

Gradus [Lat.] (a step or degree).

Gradus Parentelæ, a pedigree; a table of relationship.

Graffer, a notary, or scrivener.

Graffio gravio, a land-grave or earl.

Graffium, a writing-book, register, or cartulary of deeds and evidences.

Grail, a gradual or book containing some of the offices of the Romish Church.

Grain, the twenty-fourth part of a penny-weight.—Troyweight.

Grain, poisoned, Act prohibiting the use of, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 113.

Grainage, an ancient duty in London under which the twentieth part of salt imported by aliens was taken.

Grammar Schools, Endowed. See 3 & 4 Vict., c. 77.

Grammatica falsa non vitiat chartam.—9 Co. 48.—(False grammar does not vitiate a deed.)

Granatarius, an officer who kept the corn-chamber in a religious house.

Grand Assize, a peculiar species of trial by jury introduced in the time of Henry II. giving the tenant or defendant in a writ of right the alternative of a trial by battle, or by his peers. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 13.

Grand Cape. See CAPE.

Grand Coustumier of Normandy, an ancient book of great authority, containing the ducal customs of Normandy, probably compiled since the time of Richard I.—Hale's Hist. Com. Law, c. vi.

Grand days, those days in the terms which are solemnly kept in the Inns of Court and Chancery, i. e. Candlemas Day in Hilary; Ascension Day in Easter; St. John Baptist's Day in Trinity; and All Saints' Day in Michaelmas; which are dies non juridici.

Grand distress, Writ of, formerly issued in the real action of quare impedit, when no appearance had been entered after the attachment; it commanded the sheriff to distrain the defendant's lands and chattels in order to compel appearance (3 Step. Com., 4th edit. 675). It is no longer used, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26 having abolished the action of quare impedit, and substituted for it the procedure in an ordinary action.

Grand Jury, an inquisition composed of not less than twelve nor more than twenty-three good and lawful men of a county, returned by the sheriff to every session of the peace, and every commission of oyer and terminer and of general gaol delivery, who inquire, present, do and execute all those things which on the part of our lady the queen shall then and there be commanded them. Grand jurymen ought to be freeholders, but to what amount is uncertain.

The grand jury are previously instructed in the articles of their inquiry, by a charge from the judge who presides upon the bench. They then withdraw to sit, and receive indictments, which are preferred to them in the name of the queen, but at the suit of any private prosecutor, and they are only to hear evidence on the part of the prosecution: for the finding of an indictment is only in the nature of an inquiry or accusation, which is afterwards to be tried and determined; and the grand jury are only to inquire upon their oaths whether there be sufficient cause to call upon the party accused to answer it.

When the grand jury have heard the evidence, if they think it a groundless accusation, they endorse upon the bill of indictment, 'not a true bill' or 'not found;' the bill is then thrown out, and the party accused discharged without further answer. But a fresh bill may afterwards be preferred to a subsequent grand jury. If, however, they are satisfied of the truth of the accusation, they then endorse 'a true bill;' the indictment is then said to be found, and the party stands indicted. A majority of the grand jury must agree, i. e. not less than twelve.—4 Step. Com. 439.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 54, the foreman of a grand jury is empowered to administer the oath to witnesses who need not be sworn in open court.

Grand larceny, stealing to above the value of twelve pence. Abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 2.

Grand serjeanty, an ancient holding by military service. See TENURE.

Grange [Fr.], a farm furnished with barns, granaries, stables, and all conveniences for husbandry.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Grangearius, a keeper of a grange or farm.

Grangia [low Lat.], a grange.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Grant [fr. garantir, Fr., Junius and Skinner; but Minshew thinks gratuito, or perhaps gratia, gratificor, Lat.], a common law conveyance, operating by transmutation of possession.

This deed was originally confined to the transfer of incorporeal hereditaments and expectant estates, of which livery of seisin could not be given. But the distinction between property lying in livery and property lying in grant, so far as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold of it, is abolished by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 2, which provides that real property, of what kind soever, shall be transferable as well by grant as by livery. The operative verb is 'grant,' which, by s. 4 of the same statute, is not to imply any covenant in law in respect of any hereditaments except by force of any Act of Parliament. Railway Acts provide that the operative word 'grant' in conveyances to and by the company shall imply the usual covenants for title; and under the Acts 6 Anne, c. 35, s. 30, and 8 Geo. II. c. 6, s. 35, relating to the registration of deeds in the East and North Riding of Yorkshire, the verbs 'grant,' 'bargain,' and 'sell,' will amount to express covenants for title, unless especially restrained by particular words. This provision is extended by 6 Anne, c. 35, s. 34, to the West Riding, where the consideration-money exceeds 50*l.*

This conveyance has become the usual mode of transferring realty. It is the better opinion that a corporation can convey by grant.

The stamp duty on the old bargain and sale, or lease for a year, preserved by 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, was repealed by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, s. 6.

A grant of personalty is more properly termed an assignment or a bill of sale.

The Queen's grants are matters of record, and are either letters-patent or writs close.

Grantee, he to whom any grant is made.

Grantor, he by whom a grant is made.

Grant to uses, this is the common grant with uses superadded, and has become the favorite mode of transferring realty.

Grantz, grandees.

Grass-hearth, the feudal service of turning up the earth with a plough.

Grasson, or Grassum, a fine paid upon the transfer of a copyhold estate.

Grass-week, rogation-week, so called in the Inns of Court and Chancery.

Gratis, without reward.

Gratis dictum, a voluntary statement.

Gratuitous deeds, instruments made without binding consideration.

Gratuitous Trustees, Act to amend the law in Scotland relative to the resignation, powers, and liabilities of, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 114, explained by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 115.

Grava, a little wood or grove.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Gravamen, the substantial grievance or complaint.

Gravare et gravatio, an accusation or impeachment.—Leg. Ethel. c. xix.

Gravius est divinam quam temporalem lædere majestatem.—11 Co. 29.—(It is more serious to hurt divine than temporal majesty.)

Great Bedford Level. See BEDFORD LEVEL.

Great Cattle, all manner of beasts except sheep and yearlings.

Great Charter, Magna Charta, which see.

Great Seal [clavis regni, Lat.], the emblem of sovereignty, introduced by Edward the Confessor. By Art. 34 of the Union between England and Scotland (5 Anne, c. 8), it is provided that there should be one Great Seal for the United Kingdom of Great Britain, which should be used for sealing writs to summon the Parliament, and for sealing all treaties with foreign states, and all public acts of state which concern the United Kingdom, and in all other matters relating to England, as the Great Seal of England was then used; and that a seal in Scotland should be kept and made use of in all things relating to private rights or grants, which had usually passed the Great Seal of Scotland, and which only concern offices, grants, commissions, and private rights within Scotland. On the Union between Great Britain and Ireland no express provision was made by any of the Articles of Union as to the establishing one Great Seal for the United Kingdom; but various acts as to the summoning Parliament, &c. are required to be done under the Great Seal of Ireland; and by s. 3 of the Acts of Union, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 67 (British), and 40 Geo. III. c. 38 (Irish), it is enacted that the Great Seal of Ireland may, if his majesty shall so think fit, after the Union, be used in like manner as before the Union (except where it is otherwise provided by the Articles of Union), within that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland. As to forging these seals, see FORGERY.

Great Tithes, so called to distinguish them from tithes often granted by the name of small tithes to a vicar. It is difficult to define them with certainty. Thus much, however, is clear, that of the three kinds of tithes, mixed, personal, and predial, the two former are small tithes; and of the latter, it seems that tithes of corn, hay, wood, and of other herbs which are sown in large quantities, such as flax, hemp, &c., are great tithes. See Bac. Abr. Tythes; Com. Dig., Dismes (G); 3 Step. Com. 84.

Gree, satisfaction for an offence committed or injury done.

Green Cloth. The counting house of the king's household was commonly called the Green Cloth, in respect of the green cloth upon the table whereat the lord steward, the treasurer of the king's house, and other inferior officers sat:—(1) For daily taking the accounts for all expenses of the household. (2) For making provisions for the household according to the laws and statutes of the realm. (3) For making of payments for the same. (4) For the good government of the king's servants. (5) For payment of the wages of the king's servants. The officers of the counting house never held plea of anything.—4 Instit. 131.

Greenhew, or Greenhue, vert in forests, &c.—Manw. p. 2, c. vi., n. 5.

Green Silver, a feudal custom in the manor of Writtel in Essex, where every tenant whose front-door opens to Greenbury shall pay a halfpenny yearly to the lord, by the name of green silver or rent.

Grenville Act, 10 Geo. III. c. 16.

Gretna-Green Marriage, a marriage celebrated at Gretna in Dumfries, in Scotland. By the law of Scotland a valid marriage may be contracted by consent alone, without any other formality. When the Marriage Act, 26 Geo. II. c. 33, rendered the publication of banns or a license necessary to the validity of a marriage in England, it became usual for persons resident in England who wished to marry clandestinely to go to Gretna Green, the nearest part of Scotland, and there marry according to the Scotch law. In consequence of the frequency of such marriages, a sort of chapel was built at Gretna Green, in which the English marriage service was performed by the village blacksmith. The facility of contracting such marriages is at an end, for by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, it is enacted that after the 31st day of December, 1856, no irregular marriage contracted in Scotland by declaration, acknowledgment, or ceremony shall be valid, unless one of the parties had at the date thereof his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for twenty-one days next preceding such marriage, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Greve [fr. gerefa, or, rather, reve, Sax.], power, authority.

Grimgribber [fr. Grimoire, Fr., a conjuring book in the old French romances, or perhaps the art of necromancy itself], the jargon used as a cover for legal sophistry.—Div. of Purk. 36, and notes.

Grith, peace, protection.

Grithbreche, breach of the peace.

Grithstole, a place of sanctuary.

Gronna, a deep pit or bituminous place where turfs are dug to burn.

Groom porter, an officer belonging to the royal household.

Groom of the stole [fr. στολή, Gk., a robe], an officer of the royal household, who has charge of the king's wardrobe.

Gross, absolute, entire; not depending on another.

Grosse bois, timber.

Grossement enceinte, pregnancy in its latter stages.

Gross weight, the whole weight of goods and merchandize, including the dust and dross, and also the chest or bag, &c., upon which tare and trett are allowed.

Ground-annual, a ground-rent payable before a tenement in a burgh is built; contradistinguished from feu-annual.

Ground-rent, a periodical payment for the privilege of building on another's land.

Ground-writ. By the C. L. P. A. 1852, c. 121, 'It shall not be necessary to issue any writ directed to the sheriff of the county in which the venue is laid, but writs of execution may issue at once into any county and be directed to and executed by the sheriff of any county, whether a county palatine or not, without reference to the county in which the venue is laid, and without any suggestion of the issuing of a prior writ into such county.'

Before this enactment a ca. sa. or fi. fa. could not be issued into a county different from that in which the venue in the action was laid, without first issuing a writ called a ground-writ into the latter county, and then another writ, which was called a testatum writ, into the former. The above enactment abolished this useless process.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 595.

Groundage, a custom or tribute paid for the standing of a ship in a port.

Growth halfpenny, a rate paid in some places for the tithe of every fat beast, ox, or other unfruitful cattle.—Clay. Rep. 92.

Gruarii, the principal officers of a forest.

Guarantee, he to whom a guaranty is made.

Guarantor, he who makes a guaranty.

Guaranty, or Guarantee, a promise to a person to be answerable for the payment of a debt or the performance of a duty by another, in case he should fail to perform his engagement. An offer to guarantee until it be accepted is not binding. At the common law a guarantee need not have been in writing, but the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 4, enacts that 'No action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised.' This provision has been held not to apply to a promise made to the person who is liable, nor to a case in which that person's liability ceases upon the making of the promise. Guarantees, as other contracts, will not be binding, unless founded on a valid consideration. See CONSIDERATION, ante. Where the original debt and guaranty are contemporaneous, no other consideration is necessary than that which moves between the creditor and the original debtor; but if a guaranty be made in respect of a debt already incurred, there must be a new consideration to support it, but the consideration need not move directly between the person giving and the person receiving the guaranty. It is sufficient if the person for whom it is given receive a benefit, or if the person for whom it is given receive, or may receive, a detriment. A consideration need not be expressed, for if it can be fairly implied from the language used, it will ordinarily be sufficient. In the case of guarantees great inconvenience had resulted from the construction put upon the above section, viz., that the consideration for the promise of the guarantor must appear upon the written instrument. To remedy this was passed 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, which enacts, that no special promise to be made by any person, after the passing of the Act, (29th July, 1856), to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, being in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him thereunto lawfully authorized, shall be deemed invalid to support an action, suit or other proceeding to charge the person by whom such promise shall have been made, by reason only that the consideration for such promise does not appear in writing or by necessary inference from a written document (s. 3). The consideration must, however, exist. No promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another made to a firm consisting of two or more persons, or to a single person trading under the name of a firm, and no promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of a firm consisting of two or more persons, or of a single person trading under the name of a firm, shall be binding on the person making such promise in respect of anything done or omitted to be done, after a change shall have taken place in any one or more of the persons constituting the firm, or in the person trading under the name of a firm, unless the intention of the parties, that such promise shall continue to be binding notwithstanding such change, shall appear either by express stipulation or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise (s. 4). See SURETY.

Guardage, state of wardship.

Guardian, or Warden of the Cinque Ports, a magistrate who has the jurisdiction of the ports or havens, which are called the Cinque Ports. This office was first created amongst us, in imitation of the Roman policy, to strengthen the sea-coasts against enemies, &c.—Camb. Br. 238.

Guardian de l'eglise, a churchwarden.

Guardian de l'estemary, the warden of the stannaries or mines in Cornwall, &c.

Guardian of the peace, a warden or conservator of the peace.

Guardian of the poor. By 22 Geo. III. c. 83 (commonly called Gilbert's Act), parishes are authorized, with the consent of two-thirds in number and value of the owners and occupiers, and with the approbation of two justices of the peace, to appoint guardians to act in lieu of overseers, in all matters relative to the relief and management of the poor. As to their appointment under the Poor Law Amendment Act, see 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76. Guardians have, by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 31, the power of directing a pauper to be buried at the expense of the parish.

Guardian of the spiritualities, the person to whom the spiritual jurisdiction of any diocese is committed during the vacancy of the see.

Guardian of the temporalities, the person to whose custody a vacant see or abbey was committed by the Crown.

Guardianship. The custody of infants involves the voluminous subject of guardianship, or temporary parentage, which arises at the death of the father, or when the infant is taken away from its parents.

In modern times, guardians may be said to be of five kinds.

By the 12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 8, where any person has at the time of his death a child under the age of twenty-one years, and unmarried, the father, whether such child be born at the time of his decease, or in ventre sa mère, or whether such father be within the age of twenty-one, or of full age, may by deed executed [or if such father be of full age, by last will in writing, executed in the presence of two witnesses (7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26 s. 7)], dispose of the custody and tuition of such child until he attain twenty-one years, or any lesser time, to any person in possession or remainder, and such disposition shall be good against all persons claiming the custody or tuition of such child, as guardian in socage or otherwise; and such person to whom the custody of such child shall be so disposed or devised may maintain an action of trespass against any who shall wrongfully take away or detain him, and recover damages for the use and benefit of such child.

By ss. 9 & 10, persons to whom the custody of such children shall be so disposed are to have the custody of their lands and personal estate till twenty-one, and may bring such actions as guardians in socage may. But the act is not to alter or prejudice the custom of London, or of any other city or town corporate, or of the town of Berwick, concerning orphans, nor to operate to discharge any apprentice from his apprenticeship.

This guardianship, which supersedes all others, being a continuation of the parental authority, and a mere private office of personal trust, is not assignable, but determines at the guardian's death. If the guardian, being an unmarried woman, afterwards marry, the office is not transferred to her husband, but she nevertheless continues to act herself. The mother cannot appoint a guardian to her children under this act, though she be a widow at the time, for the statute is wholly confined to fathers; but she has the first claim upon the attention of the Court of Chancery in the selection of a guardian.

This guardianship is entirely local, and depends altogether upon the law of the particular place where it exists. It is found in copyhold manors, ancient corporations, and gavelkind lands. The father's authority of appointing a guardian under the 12 Car. II. c. 24, does not extend to copyhold property.

(3) Ad litem.

Every Court in which an infant is one of the suitors has power to appoint a guardian for the purpose of protecting such infant's interest in the proceedings instituted. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1234, and Smi. Ch. Pr. 57.

(4) By appointment of Chancery,

The Court has power to appoint a guardian, as its instrument, to protect the general interests of an infant-ward, where there is no guardian already selected. The person appointed must usually be of the same religious persuasion as the infant's parents, and of a moral, solvent, capable, and humane character, residing, moreover, in England.

The Court will, if practicable, and not disadvantageous to the infant, give the preference to the father, who is primâ facie and naturally entitled to the custody of his children, even as against their mother, provided the children be seven years old.

Next to the father's right is recognised that of the testamentary or statute-guardian, whose authority is hardly to be distinguished from that of the father, deriving his title, as he does, from the right of the parent by virtue of the Act of Parliament already quoted. It is, in fact, a continuation of the same trust under the same control and jurisdiction.

(5) Guardian in tort, or by intrusion (tutor alienus).

This is an implied, indirect kind of guardianship, arising from a person intruding himself into an infant's property: if he receive the profits belonging to the wronged infant, as its guardian, he must account for them in Chancery, being, by this Court, regarded as such infant's trustee.

There are five other species of guardians recognised by our law, but which have now become obsolete or comparatively rare:—

(1) Guardian by nature (jure naturæ).—To this guardianship the father has the first title, and should he not appoint one, pursuant to 12 Car. II. c. 24, then the mother, and afterwards the other ancestors, can claim it. Only an heir apparent, either male or female, can be the subject of this guardianship, which merely extends to the infant's person, and endures until majority.

(2) Guardian in socage, or, by the common law (jure gentium).—This guardianship occurs only when an infant is legally entitled in possession to socage land by descent, and is in such of the infant's next of blood, as cannot possibly become entitled to the land upon the infant's death.

There are two kinds: Guardian by right (tutor proprius); and (2) Guardian by possession and claim (tutor alienus).

It is a personal trust for the infant's benefit, both as to his person and estate, and cannot be devised or assigned or transmitted by succession, or forfeited by outlawry or attainder. On the guardian dying or becoming incapacitated, it devolves upon the next relation in blood, who can never become entitled to the land; he cannot be removed. It determines when the infant, male or female, attains fourteen (or fifteen in gavelkind land). Such guardian is superseded by the father's testamentary guardian.

A guardian per cause de ward exists only in socage land; it occurs where an infant in ward is guardian to another, in which case the wardship of the first infant draws after it that of the second.

(3) Guardian for nurture arises when the infant has neither land nor guardian, the father or mother possessing the right, for its education and governance. It cannot be assigned. It certainly continues until the age of fourteen (Reg. v. Clarke, 7 E. & B. 186); and, in the case of a female infant, has been held to continue until the age of sixteen.—Reg. v. Howes, 30 L. J. (M. C.) 47. As to the infant's property, this guardian is very much on the same footing as a stranger.

(4) Guardian by the election of the infant.—In the absence of a guardian the infant may, after fourteen, choose one for himself. The election is frequently made before a judge in equity, or on circuit, but this is not absolutely necessary. The infant's election does not supersede the power of Chancery to appoint another, if it should be considered more advantageous.

The advisable course is always to apply to the Court of Chancery to appoint a guardian.

(5) Guardianship by appointment of the Ecclesiastical Court.—The ecclesiastical courts claim the right of appointing a guardian to protect the personalty of an infant; and also to take care of the infant if there be no other guardian; but this latter claim seems not to be well founded, their authority being simply to appoint a guardian ad litem.—Cham. on Inf. pp. 72, 73.

There is no trace, in modern times, of any appointment by these courts of a guardian of the person and estate, but the name is given to those who are appointed administrators durante minore ætate of one who would be entitled, if of full age, to act. For further details, see Co. Litt. 86 b, with Mr. Hargrave's notes. The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in testamentary matters has been transferred to the Court of Probate.—20 & 21 Vict. cc. 77, 85.

By the Roman law, guardianship was of two sorts: (1) Tutela, and (2) Cura: the first lasted in males until they arrived at fourteen years of age, and in females until they arrived at twelve years of age, which were called the ages of puberty of the sexes respectively. From the time of puberty until they were twenty-five years of age, which was their full majority, they were deemed minors, and subject to curatorship. During the first period of tutelage their guardian was called tutor, and they were called pupils; during the second period, their guardian was called curator, and they were called minors. In England, the guardian performs the offices both of a tutor and a curator, under the Roman law. In France, the tutorship lasts until the full age of majority.

In treating of guardianship, two questions naturally arise: (1) Whether the authority of a guardian over the person of his ward is local, and confined to the place of his domicile, or extends everywhere? (2) Whether the authority of the guardian over the property of his ward is local, or extends everywhere? The better opinion seems to be, that the guardian's authority extends everywhere, in both cases.—Story's Confl. of Laws, c. xiii.

Guastald, one who has the custody of the royal mansions.

Gubernator [Lat.], a pilot or steersman.

Guest-taker, an agistor; one who took cattle into feed in the royal forests.

Guidage, a reward for safe conduct through a strange land or unknown country.

Guidon de la Mer, a treatise on maritime law, written in Rouen, then Normandy, in 1671.

Guild [fr. gildan, Sax., to pay or contribute], a company, fraternity, or corporation, associated for some commercial purpose.

Guildhall, the chief hall of a city or borough-town, for holding courts, and for the meeting of the corporation in order to make laws for the regulation of the city or town, and to administer summary justice.

Guildrents. See GILDRENT.

Guilt [fr. wiglian, bewiglian, gewiglian, A.S., to conjure, to divine, and hence to practice cheat, imposture, and enchantment; the past participle of gewiglian is gewigled, guiled, guilt. Tooke. Others say it is derived from gildan, A.S., to pay a tax, and originally signified the fine or mulct paid for an offence, and afterwards the offence itself], sin, wickedness, crime, criminality.

Guilty, having committed a crime.

Gules, the heraldic name of the color usually called red. The word is derived either from the Latin gula, a throat, or the Arabic gule, a rose. If the latter supposition be correct, the word was probably introduced by the Crusaders. Gules is denoted in engravings by numerous perpendicular lines. Heralds who blazoned by planets and jewels called it Mars, and ruby.

Gules of August [fr. gula, Lat., a throat], the entrance into, or the first day of that month.

Gultwit, or Guiltwit, amends for a trespass.

Gunge, a granary, a depôt, chiefly of grain for sale. Wholesale markets held on particular days. Commercial depôts.—Indian.

Gunpowder. As to the making, keeping, and carriage of gunpowder, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 130; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 98.

Gurgites, wears.

Guti and Gotti, Goths, Jutæ or Getæ, who left Germany and came to inhabit this island.

Gwabr merched, a payment or fine made to the lords of some manors, upon the marriage of their tenants' daughters, or otherwise on their committing incontinency. See MERCHETA MULIERUM.—Welsh term.

Gwalstow, a place of execution.

Gwayf, that which had been stolen and afterwards dropped in the highway for fear of a discovery.

Gylput, the name of a court held every three weeks in the liberty or hundred of Pathbew in Warwick.

Gyltwite. See GULTWIT.

Gynarcy, or Gynæcocracy, government by a woman; a state in which women are legally capable of the supreme command, e. g. Great Britain and Spain.

Gypsies. The first of the laws against gypsies, 22 Hen. VIII., c. 10, describes this people, who were then new-comers in this country, as 'outlandish persons calling themselves Egyptians, using no craft or feat of merchandise, who have come into this realm and go from shire to shire and place to place in great company, and used great subtle and crafty means to deceive the people, bearing them in hand, that they by palmestry could tell men's and women's fortunes; and so many times by craft and subtilty have deceived the people of their money, and also have committed many heinous felonies and robberies.' This was the description given of these wanderers. It was now enacted, that if any such persons came within the realm, they should forfeit all their goods and chattels, and should leave the kingdom within fifteen days after command so to do, upon pain of imprisonment. All sheriffs and justices of the peace were empowered to seize their property for the king's use. If they were to be tried for any felony, they were not to be entitled to the privilege of stat. 8, Hen. VI., which gave a jury de medietate linguæ. As to all those then within the realm, they had sixteen days to depart; and if they overstaid that time they were to be imprisoned, and forfeit all their goods and chattels. 4 Reeves, c. xxix., p. 290.

This statute was found not strict enough to restrain these people from coming into the kingdom; but they still resorted hither, using, as 1 & 2 Ph. & Ma. c. 4, states, 'their old accustomed devilish and naughty practices and devices, with such abominable living as it is not in any Christian realm to be permitted, named, or known.' It is therefore enacted by this last statute, that any one conveying such person into the realm shall forfeit 40*l.*; and the Egyptian so conveyed, and continuing here one month, shall be adjudged a felon without benefit of clergy or sanctuary. As to those within the realm, such as do not depart within twenty days after proclamation of that Act, shall forfeit all their goods, to be seized by any one; half to the king and half to the party seizing them: and if they do not depart in fifty days after the proclamation, it is made felony, without clergy or sanctuary. Persons who leave that way of life within the twenty days above-mentioned are to be discharged of the penalties of the act.—4 Reeves, c. xxx., p. 490. See VAGRANTS, and 5 Hen. VIII. c. 34, p. 126.

Gyves [fr. gevyn, Wel.], fetters or shackles for the legs.

Habeas corpora juratorum (that you have the bodies of the jurors), a process which issued out of the Court of Common Pleas, commanding the sheriff to summon a jury. The practice was similar to the distringas from the Queen's Bench and Exchequer for the same purpose. It is abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 104.

Habeas Corpus Act, the 31 Car. II. c. 2, providing the great remedy for the violation of personal liberty by the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, which see below.

Habeas corpus ad faciendum et recipiendum (that you have the body to do and receive), a common law writ which issues out of any of the courts at Westminster, when a person is sued in some inferior jurisdiction, and is desirous to remove the action into the superior court. It commands the inferior judges to produce the body of the defendant, together with the day and cause of his caption and detainer, to do and receive whatever the Queen's Court shall consider in that behalf.—3 Bl. Com. 130.

Habeas corpus ad prosequendum (that you have the body to prosecute), a writ that issues when it is necessary to remove a prisoner, in order that he may be tried in the proper jurisdiction.—Ibid.

Habeas corpus ad respondendum (that you have the body to answer), a writ which formerly issued when one had a cause of action against another, who was confined by the process of some inferior court, in order to remove the prisoner, and charge him with the new cause of action in the court above.—Ibid. No longer used.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1307.

Habeas corpus ad satisfaciendum (that you have the body to satisfy), when a plaintiff has obtained judgment in one of the superior courts against a defendant, who is in the prison of an inferior court at the suit of another, he may, by this writ, bring up the prisoner to the superior court, in order to charge him in execution.—Ibid. See C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 127.

Habeas corpus ad subjiciendum (that you have the body to answer). This, the most celebrated prerogative writ in the English law, is a remedy for a person illegally deprived of his liberty. It is addressed to any person who detains another in custody, and commands him to produce the body of the prisoner, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, and to do, submit to, and receive whatever the judge or court awarding such writ shall consider in that behalf. It issues out of any of the superior courts of law and equity, both in term and vacation, and runs into all parts of the Queen's dominions. The writ is applied for either by motion to a court or application to a judge, supported by an affidavit of the facts. If a probable ground be shown that the party is imprisoned without just cause, and therefore has a right to be delivered, then this writ ought of right to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison or otherwise restrained, though it be by command of the Sovereign, the Privy Council, or any other power in the country. And therefore there is an absolute necessity of expressing upon every commitment the reason for which it is made, that a court upon a habeas corpus may examine into its validity, and, according to the circumstances of the case, may discharge, admit to bail, or remand the prisoner.

The Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. II. c. 2, enacts: (1) That on complaint and request in writing, by or on behalf of any person committed and charged with any crime (unless committed for treason or felony expressed in the warrant; or as accessory, or on suspicion of being accessory before the fact, to any felony, or upon suspicion of such felony, plainly expressed in the warrant; or unless he is committed or charged in execution by legal process), the Lord Chancellor, or any of the judges in vacation, upon viewing a copy of the warrant or affidavit that a copy is denied, shall (unless the party has neglected, for two terms, to apply to any court for his enlargement) award a habeas corpus for such prisoner, returnable immediately, before himself or any other of the judges; and upon the return made shall discharge the party, if bailable, upon giving security to appear and answer to the accusation in the proper court of judicature. (2) That such writs shall be endorsed, as granted in pursuance of this act, and signed by the party awarding them. (3) That the writ shall be returned and the prisoner brought up within a limited time according to the distance, not exceeding in any case twenty days. (4) That officers and keepers neglecting to make due returns, or not delivering to the prisoner or his agent, within six hours after demand, a copy of the warrant of commitment, on shifting the custody of a prisoner from one to another, without sufficient reason or authority (specified in the act), shall for the first offence forfeit 100*l.* and for the second offence 200*l.* to the party grieved, and be disabled to hold his office. (5) That no person once delivered by habeas corpus shall be recommitted for the same offence, on penalty of 500*l.* (6) That every person committed for treason or felony shall, if he require it, the first week of the next term, or the first day of the next session of oyer and terminer, be indicted in that term or session, or else admitted to bail; unless the witnesses for the Crown cannot be produced at that time; and if acquitted, or if not indicted and tried in the second term or session, he shall be discharged from imprisonment for such imputed offence; but that no person, after the assizes shall be opened for the county in which he is detained, shall be removed by habeas corpus till after the assizes are ended; but shall be left to the justice of the judges of assize. (7) That any prisoner may move for and obtain his habeas corpus as well out of the Chancery and Exchequer as out of the Queen's Bench or Common Pleas, and the Lord Chancellor or judges denying the same, on sight of the warrant, or oath that the same is refused, shall forfeit severally to the party grieved the sum of 500*l*. (8) That this writ of habeas corpus shall run into the counties palatines, cinque ports, and other privileged places, and the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. (9) That no inhabitant of England (except persons contracting, or convicts praying, to be transported, or having committed some capital offence in the place to which they are sent) shall be sent prisoner to Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, or any place beyond the seas, within or without the king's dominions, on pain that the party committing, his advisers, aiders, and assistants, shall forfeit to the party grieved a sum not less than 500*l*.; shall be disabled to bear any office of trust or profit; shall incur the penalties of præmunire; and shall be incapable of the royal pardon.

The writ of habeas corpus was rendered more actively remedial by the statute of Charles II., but it is founded on the broad basis of magna charta, and is the principal bulwark of English liberty; and if even temporary circumstances, or the doubtful plea of political necessity, should lead men to look upon its denial with apathy, the most distinguished characteristic of our constitution will be effaced.

This statute extends only to the case of commitments for such criminal charges as can produce no inconvenience to public justice by a temporary enlargement of the prisoner; all other cases of unjust imprisonment being left to the habeas corpus at common law, now regulated by 56 Geo. III. c. 100, which provides:—(1) That where any person shall be restrained of his liberty (otherwise than from some criminal or supposed criminal matter, and except persons imprisoned for debt, or by process in any civil suit), any of the barons of the Exchequer of the degree of the coif, or any of the justices of either bench, shall upon affidavit showing a probable and reasonable ground for such complaint, award in vacation time a writ of habeas corpus, under the seal of the court whereof he is a judge, directed to the person in whose custody the party is confined, which shall be returnable immediately before himself or any other judge of the court. (2) That upon disobedience to the writ the judge before whom it is returnable may issue a warrant to arrest the party guilty of such contempt. (3) That if the writ be awarded so late in vacation that it cannot be conveniently obeyed during vacation, the same may be made returnable in the court to which the judge by whom it is awarded belongs, on a certain day in the next term. (4) That if such writ shall be awarded by the court itself of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, so late that it cannot be conveniently obeyed during the term, the same may be made returnable in the then next vacation before any of the judges. (5) That though the return to the writ may be good in law, it shall be lawful for the judge before whom it is returnable to proceed to examine into the truth of the facts, and if it appear doubtful to him whether they be true or not, it shall be lawful for such judge to let to bail the person so confined, upon his entering into a recognizance to appear in the court to which the judge belongs in the term following, which court may proceed to examine into the truth of the facts, in a summary way by affidavit, and to order and determine as to the discharge, bailing, or remanding of the party. (6) That the like proceeding for controverting the truth of the return may be had in the case where the writ shall be awarded by the court itself, or be returnable therein. (7) That the several provisions aforesaid shall extend to all writs of habeas corpus awarded in pursuance of the 31 Car. II. c. 2. Lastly, that the habeas corpus, according to this 56 Geo. III. c. 100, may run into any county palatine, or cinque port, or other privileged place, or the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, or Man, or any port, harbour, road, creek or bay upon the coast of England or Wales, lying out of the body of any county.

Besides the efficacy of the writ of habeas corpus, in liberating the subject from illegal confinement in a public prison, it also extends its influence to remove every unjust restraint of personal freedom in private life, though imposed by a husband or a father; but when women and infants are brought before the court by a habeas corpus, the court will only set them free from an unmerited or unreasonable confinement, and will not determine the validity of a marriage, or the right to the guardianship, but will hold them at liberty to choose whither they will go; and if there be any reason to apprehend that they will be seized in returning from the court, they will be sent home under the protection of an officer. But if a child is too young to have any discretion of its own, then the court will deliver it into the custody of its parent, or the person who appears to be its legal guardian.—See 3 Bl. Com. 131; 4 Step. Com. 20; and 3 Burr. 1434. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 20, enacts that no writ of habeas corpus shall issue out of any of the courts in England into any colony or foreign dominion of the Crown where her Majesty has a lawfully established court of justice, having authority to grant and issue the said writ and to ensure the due execution thereof throughout such colony or dominion.

Habeas corpus ad testificandum (that you have the body to testify), a writ to bring a witness into court, when he is in custody at the time of a trial. He must be a material witness, and willing to attend. The court will not grant this writ to bring up a prisoner at war; an application must be made to the Secretary of State.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 9; 1 Chit Arch. Prac. by Pren. 354. By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 31, a similar power of compelling the attendance of a person in custody, in order that he may be examined, is given to a judge of a county court.

Habeas corpus cum causâ (that you have the body with the cause), a writ which a defendant may have to remove himself from one prison to another; also a writ to remove a cause from an inferior court into a superior court, when the defendant is in custody in the court below.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1306, 1309. As to habeas corpus in Chancery, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 119.

Habendum of a deed, that part of a conveyance, &c., which determines the quantity of interest conveyed; but should the quantity be expressed in the premises, then the habendum may lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify, but not contradict, or be repugnant to the estate granted in the premises. See DEED.

Habentia, riches.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, p. 100.

Habere facias possessionem (that you cause to have possession), abbreviated thus, ha. fa. po., a writ that issues for a successful plaintiff in ejectment, to put him in possession of the premises recovered. If the first writ be not executed, an alias, &c. may be sued out. The officer, if necessary, may break open outer doors, in order to give possession, or he may take the posse comitatus with him if he fear violence.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1034.

Habere facias seisinam (that you cause to have possession), a writ addressed to the sheriff to give seisin of a freehold estate recovered by ejectione firmæ or other action.—O. N. B. 154.

Habere facias visum (that you cause to have view), a writ that lay in divers cases in real actions, as in formedon, &c. where a view was required to be taken of the lands in controversy. See FORMEDON.

Habergeon, a diminutive of hauberk, a short coat of mail without sleeves.

Habit and repute, held and reputed.—Scotch phrase.

Habitatio. The nature of this personal servitude is not obvious. Some jurists confound it with the right to use a house; but Justinian declares it to be quite distinct, both from the jus utendi and the jus fruendi. For whilst the jus utendi is one and entire, the habitatio is a series of rights arising from day to day, so that in bequeathing it you make a separate bequest, in fact, for each day; hence, also, it was not extinguished by non-user. Justinian added the further distinction, that it might be let.—Cum. C. L. 95, and Saund. Justin. 224.

Habitations, offences against. They are arson; negligently setting fire to houses and buildings by servants; and burglary.

Hachia, a hack, pick, or instrument for digging.

Hackney Coaches. The provisions relating to these vehicles in the metropolis are embodied in the 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 22, amended by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, which repeals all previous acts on the subject. See also 13 & 14 Vict. c. 7, and 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 33, 127, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 113.

Hadbote, a recompense for an affront offered to a priest.

Haderunga [fr. had, Sax., person, and arung, honored], respect of persons; partiality.

Hadgovel, a tax, or mulct.

Hæc fuit candida illius ætatis fides et simplicitas, quæ pauculis lineis omnia fidei firmamenta posuit.—Co. Litt. 6.—(Such was the candid faith and simplicity of that age, which included all the guarantees of faith in a very few lines.)

Hæreda [Goth.], court-leet.

Hærede abducto, an ancient writ that lay for the lord, who having by right the wardship of his tenant under age, could not obtain his person; the same being carried away by another person.—O. N. B. 93.

Hærede deliberando alteri qui habet custodiam terræ, an ancient writ, directed to the sheriff to require one that had the body of an heir being in ward, to deliver him to the person whose ward he was by reason of his land. Reg. Orig. 161.

Hærede rapto, an ancient writ that lay for the ravishment of the lord's ward.—Reg. Orig. 163.

Hæredem Deus facit, non homo.—Co. Litt. 7 b.—(God makes the heir, not man.)

Hæredes proximi, heirs begotten; children.

Hæredes remotiores, heirs not begotten as grandchildren, great grandchildren, &c. descending in a direct line in infinitum.

Hæredipeta, the next heir to lands.

Hæredipetæ suo propinquo vel extraneo, periculoso sane custodi, nullus committatur.—Co. Litt. 88 b.—(To the next heir as guardian, whether a relation or a stranger [certainly a dangerous guardian], let no one be committed.)

Hæreditas, alia corporalis, alia incorporalis; corporalis est, quæ tangi potest et videri; incorporalis quæ tangi non potest nec videri.—Co. Litt. 9.—(An inheritance is either corporeal or incorporeal: corporeal, is that which can be touched and seen: incorporeal, that which can neither be touched nor seen.) As to the division of the hæreditas in the Civil Law, see Sand. Just. 285. Hæreditas, sensu objectivo, comprehends the entire estate left by a deceased person, or complexus bonorum defuncti; sensu subjectivo, it is the jus hæreditarium, or right attaching thereupon.

Hæreditas est successio in universum jus quod defunctus habuerat.—Co. Litt. 237.—(Inheritance is the succession to every right which the deceased had.)

Hæreditas jacens, an estate in abeyance, in the interim between the ancestor's death and the assumption of the heir.

Hæreditas nunquam ascendit.—Glan. l. 7, c. i.—(Inheritance never ascends.)

This feudal maxim was exploded by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 6. See CANONS OF INHERITANCE.

Hæreditas, n'est pas tant solement entendue lou home ad terres ou tenements per discent d'enharitage, mes auxi chescun fee simple ou tail que home ad per son purchase puit estre dit, enheritance, pur ceo que ses heirs luy purront enheriter.—Co. Litt. 26.—(Inheritance does not only comprehend all the lands and tenements which a man has by descent from his ancestors, but, also, every fee-simple or fee-tail which he has by purchase is called inheritance, because his heir can inherit it from him.)

Hæredum appellatione veniunt hæredes hæredum in infinitum.—Co. Litt. 9.—(By the title of heirs come the heirs of heirs, to infinity.)

Hæres est alter ipse, et filius est pars patris.—3 Co. 12.—(An heir is a second self, and a son is part of his father.)

Hæres est aut jure proprietatis, aut jure representationis.—3 Co. 40.—An heir is so by right of property, or by right of representation.)

Hæres est eadem persona cum antecessore—pars antecessoris.—Co. Litt. 22.—(The heir is the same person with his ancestor—a part of his ancestor.)

Hæres est nomen collectivum.—1 Vent. 215. (Heir is a collective name.)

Hæres est nomen juris, filius est nomen naturæ. Bacon.—(Heir is a name of law, son is a name of nature.)

Hæres factus, an heir appointed; a devisee.

Hæres hæredis mei est meus hæres.—(The heir of my heir is my heir.)

Hæres hæredis succedit in universum jus quod defunctus habuit.—(An heir of an heir succeeds to the whole right which the deceased had.)

Hæres legitimus est quem nuptiæ demonstrant. Co. Litt. 7 b.—(He is a lawful heir whom wedlock declares.)

Hæres minor uno et viginti annis non respondebit, nisi in casu dotis.—Moor. 348.—(An heir under twenty-one years of age is not answerable, except in the matter of dower.)

Hæres natus, an heir born; an heir by descent.

Hæres non tenetur in Angliâ ad debita antecessoris reddenda, nisi per antecessorem ad hoc fuerit obligatus præterquam debita regis tantum. Co. Litt. 386.—(In England the heir is not bound to pay his ancestor's debts, unless he be bound to it by the ancestor, except debts due to the king.)

But now, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV., c. 104, he is liable.

Hæretico comburendo, an ancient writ against a heretic, who having been convicted of heresy by the bishop, abjured it, and afterwards fell into the same again, and some other, and was thereupon delivered over to the secular power in order that he might be burnt. F. N. B. 69.

Hafne, a haven or port.

Haga, a house in a city or borough.—Scott.

Hagia, a hedge.

Haia, a park enclosed.

Hailworkfolk (i. e. holyworkfolk), those who formerly held lands by the service of defending or repairing a church or monument.—Bailey.

Hainault, Forest of, as to its disafforesting, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 43.

Haketon, a military coat of defence.

Half-blood, one not born of the same father and mother, who can now inherit by virtue of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106.

Half-brother, a brother by the father or mother's side.

Half-endeal, a moiety, or half of a thing.

Half-mark, a noble, or 6*s.* 8*d.* in money.

Half-seal, that which is used in the Chancery for sealing of commissions to delegates, upon any appeal to the Court of Delegates, either in ecclesiastical or marine causes. Abolished.

Half-tongue, a jury de medietate linguæ, empannelled to try foreigners.

Half-a-year, 182 days, and not six lunar months.—Cro. Jac. 166.

Halimass, the feast of All Saints, on the 1st of November; and one of the cross quarters of the year was computed from Halimass to Candlemas.

Halke, a hole.

Hallage, tolls paid for goods or mechandize vended in a hall.

Hallamshire, a part of the county of York, anciently so called, in which the town of Sheffield stands.

Hallmote, or Hallimote, a court among the Saxons answering to our court-baron; also the court held by each of the city companies in London.

Halymote, a holy or ecclesiastical court.

Halywercfolk. See HAILWORKFOLK.

Ham, a place of dwelling; a home close; a little narrow meadow.

Hambling, or Hammelling of dogs, expeditation.

Hamesecken, or Homesoken, burglary; assaulting a man in his own house.—Scotch law.

Hamfare, breach of the peace in a house.

Hamlet, Hemel, Hampsel, a vill or little village.

Hamma, a close joining to a house; a croft; a little meadow.

Hamsoca, or Hamsóken. See HAMESECKEN.

Hanaper [fr. hanaperium, low Lat., a hamper], a treasury, answering to our modern term, exchequer.

Hanaper-office, an office belonging to the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, so called, because all writs relating to the business of a subject, and their returns, were formerly kept in a hamper, in hanaperio.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Hand-borrow, a surety; a manual pledge.

Hand-fasting, betrothment.

Hand-grith, peace or protection given by the king with his own hand.

Hand-habend, a thief caught in the very fact, having the thing stolen in his hand.

Hand-sale, a custom among the northern nations of shaking hands to bind a bargain or contract.

Handsel, earnest-money.

Hanging, the mode of capital punishment which has been used in this country from time immemorial. See CAPITAL FELONIES.

The manner in which death occurs in cases of hanging is far from being perfectly understood. There is, however, considerable variety in the physiological phenomena:—(1) Apoplexy, not necessarily accompanied with rupture or extravasation, produced by pressure on the large blood-vessels leading to the head. (2) Another immediate cause of death, and about which there is hardly any dispute, is suffocation, or exclusion of air from the lungs. In many instances, it is thought that apoplexy and suffocation unite in producing the fatal termination. (3) A laceration of the trachea or larynx, or a luxation or fracture of the cervical vertebræ, from a rupture of the ligaments of the neck. The deductions drawn by Dr. Remer from actual examinations, are:—(1) The presence of ecchymosis on the neck is to be deemed a proof of death by hanging. (2) As it occasionally is wanting, its absence cannot be considered a positive proof of the contrary supposition; but (3) when it is thus wanting, death has probably been suddenly caused by apoplexy.

In every suspected case, two questions may present themselves for solution by the medical witness:—

(1) Was the individual suspended before or after death, or, in other words, had he been previously killed in some other way, and then placed in this situation to avoid suspicion?

(2) Whether the individual hanged himself, or was hanged by others.

The presumption in all these cases is favorable to the idea of suicide, since hanging is a difficult mode of perpetrating murder, unless the strength of the parties be greatly disproportionate, or the assailants be numerous and powerful. In a great majority of cases, it is proved to have been suicidal. An opinion is sometimes extremely difficult to be arrived at, as the marks left, either from homicide or suicide, may be precisely similar.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. 616.

Hanging in chains. In atrocious cases it was frequently usual for the court to direct a murderer, after execution, to be hanged upon a gibbet in chains near the place where the murder was committed, a practice quite contrary to the Mosaic law.—Deut. xxi. 23. Abolished by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 26.

Hangwite, or Hangwit, a liberty to be quit of a felon or thief hanged without judgment, or escaped out of custody.—Rastal.

Hanig, customary labor.

Hanseatic, pertaining to the Hanse Towns, or to their confederacy. The Hanse Towns in Germany were certain commercial cities which associated for the protection of commerce as early as the twelfth century. To this confederacy acceded certain commercial cities in Holland, England, France, Spain, and Italy, until they amounted to seventy-two; which for centuries commanded the respect and defied the power of kings. From the middle of the fifteenth century, the power of the confederacy, though still very formidable, began to decline. This, however, was not owing to any misconduct on the part of its leaders, but to the progress of that improvement it had done so much to promote. The civilisation, which had been at first confined to the cities, gradually extended over the contiguous country; and feudal anarchy was everywhere superseded by a system of subordination and the progress of the arts. At present it only consists of Hamburgh, Lubeck, and Bremen; and they, indeed, possess merely the shadow of their former state.

Hansgrave, the chief of a company; the head man of a corporation.

Hantelode, an arrest.

Hap, to catch.

Harbinger, an officer of the royal household.

Harbours. See PORTS. As to the improvement of harbours, docks, and piers, see 10 Vict. c. 27; 25 Vict. c. 19; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 69; 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 45, 47, 80; and 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 30, 81, 86 & 104.

Hard labor, a punishment said to have been introduced by 5 Anne, c. 6. It may be added in most cases to the sentence of imprisonment.

Hare, a beast of warren. As to the sale of hares in Ireland, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 19.

Harness, all warlike instruments; the tackle or furniture of a ship.

Haro, Harron, an outcry after felons and malefactors.

Hasp and Staple, the form of the entry of an heir into premises situate in a royal borough in Scotland. The bailie, the town clerk, and the claimant, appear on the premises whereupon the claimant alleges his title, and proves it by witnesses, the bailie then declares him to be heir, and directs him to take hold of the hasp and staple of the door as a symbol of possession, and the heir then enters the house and bolts himself in. On his coming out, the transaction is noted and registered.—Scotch Acts, 1681, c. 11.

Hat-money, a small duty paid to the captain and mariners of a ship, called primage.

Havens [fr. havn, Dan.; haven, Du., fr. hæfen, A. S. from habban, to have or hold], that which holds or contains ships, a port or harbour. In order to secure the marine revenue, the Sovereign has the prerogative of appointing ports and havens, for persons and merchandise to pass into and out of the realm. By the feudal law all navigable rivers and havens were computed among the regalia, and were subject to the sovereign of the state. The English sovereign is lord of the whole shore, and the guardian of the ports and havens, which are the inlets and gates of the realm. Legal ports were undoubtedly, at first, assigned by the Crown; since to each of them a court of portmote is incident, the jurisdiction of which must flow from the royal authority; the great ports of the sea are referred to as well known and established by 4 Hen. IV. c. 20, which prohibits the landing elsewhere under pain of confiscation; and the 1 Eliz. c. 11, recites that the franchise of landing and discharging had been frequently granted by the Crown.

But though the sovereign had a power of granting the franchise of havens and ports, yet he had not a power of resumption, or of narrowing and confining their limits when once established: but any person had a right to load or discharge his merchandise in any part of the haven; whereby the revenue of the customs was much impaired and diminished, by fraudulent landings in obscure and private corners. This occasioned the 1 Eliz. c. 11; and 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 11, s. 14 (both abolished by 6 Geo. IV. c. 105), which enabled the Crown by commission, to ascertain the limits of all ports, and to assign proper wharfs and quays in each port for the exclusive landing and loading of merchandise. And by 46 Geo. III. c. 153, no pier, quay, wharf, jetty, breast, or embankment, shall be erected in or near to any public harbour without giving one month's notice to the admiralty, with a saving, however, of the privileges of the city of London.—2 Step. Com. 521. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107.

Haugh, or Howgh, a green plot in a valley.

Haur, hatred.—Leg. W. 1, c. 16.

Hauthoner, a man armed with a coat of mail.

Haw, a small parcel of land so called in Kent; houses.—Co. Litt. 5.

Haward. See HAYWARD.

Hawberk, or Hawbert, he who held land in France, by finding a coat or shirt of mail, with which he was to be ready when called upon. See FIEF D'HAUBERT.

Hawgh, a valley.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Hay, a hedge or enclosure; a net to take game.

Hay-bote, a liberty to take thorns and other wood to make and repair hedges, gates, fences, &c. either by tenant for life or years; also wood for the making of rakes and forks. See BOTE.

Hayward, one who keeps a common herd of cattle of a town, and the reason of his being so called may be, because one part of his office is to see that they neither break nor cross the hedges of enclosed lands; or because he keeps the grass from hurt and destruction. He is an officer appointed in the lord's court, to look to the fields and impound cattle trespassing thereon; to see that no pound breaches be made, and if any be, to present them to the leet, &c.—Kitch. 46.

Hazard, an unlawful game.—4 Step. Com. 353.

Head-borough, the head of a borough; a high constable. King Alfred instituted tithings, so called from the Saxon, because ten freeholders and their families composed one. These all dwelt together, and were sureties or free pledges to the king for the good behaviour of each other. One of the tithing is annually appointed to preside over the rest, and is called the tithing-man or head-borough.

Under the feodal law, he was an officer who had a principal government within his own pledge. He was also styled borowhead, borsholder, third-borough, tithingman, &c. according to the usage and diversity of speech in several places. The head-boroughs were the chiefs of the ten pledges, the other nine being denominated hand-borows, or inferior pledges.—Encyc. Lond. See CONSTABLE.

Head-courts, certain tribunals in Scotland, abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Head-land, the upper part of land left for the turning of the plough, whence the head-way. Paroch. Antiq. 587.

Head-pence, an exaction of a certain sum collected by the Sheriff of Northumberland from the inhabitants of that county, without any account thereof to be made to the Crown. Abolished by 23 Hen. VII. c. 7.

Head-silver, dues paid to lords of leets; also a fine of 40*l.* which the Sheriff of Northumberland heretofore exacted of the inhabitants twice in seven years.

Heafod-weard, one of the services to be rendered by a thane and a geneat or villainus, but in what it consisted seems uncertain.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Healfang, or Halsfang [fr. hals, Sax., neck, and fang, to seize], the pillory;* also a pecuniary mulct, to commute for standing in the pillory.

Healgemote, a court-baron; an ecclesiastical court.

Health, the faculty of performing all actions proper to a human body in the most perfect manner.

Injuries affecting a person's health are, where by any unwholesome practices of another, a man sustains any damage in his vigor or constitution, as by selling him bad provisions or wine, by the exercise of a noisome trade, which infects the air in his neighbourhood, or by the neglect or unskilful management of a surgeon, apothecary, or general practitioner who attends him. The remedy is by an action on the case for damages, and in cases of gross misconduct the wrong doer may be indicted.

The two principal offences against the public health are, those against the Quarantine and Vaccination Acts, and selling unwholesome provisions.—4 Bl. Com. c. xiii. See OFFENCE AND PUBLIC HEALTH ACT.

Hearing, the trial of a suit before a court of equity; an investigation of a controversy.

Hearsay evidence. It is a general principle in the law of evidence, that if any fact is to be substantiated against a person, it ought to be proved in his presence by the testimony of a witness sworn to speak the truth; and the reason of the rule is, because evidence ought to be given under the sanction of an oath, and the person who is to be affected by the evidence ought to have an opportunity of interrogating the witness as to his means of knowledge, and concerning all the particulars of his statement. Hearsay evidence (whether spoken or written) of a fact, therefore, is not admissible.

The following cases, however, are clearly distinguishable from hearsay evidence:—

(1) The testimony of a deceased witness, who has been examined upon oath, on the trial of a former action between the same parties, and where the point at issue was the same, is admissible on the trial of the second action, and may be proved by one who heard him give evidence; for such evidence on the former trial was not given in an extra-judicial manner, but upon oath; the parties to the suit were the same, and an opportunity was given for cross-examination. The person called to prove what a deceased witness said must undertake to repeat precisely his very words, and not merely to swear to their effect.

(2) Hearsay is often admitted in evidence, as part of the res gesta or transaction, which becomes the subject of inquiry; the meaning of which seems to be, that where it is necessary in the course of a cause to inquire into the nature of a particular act, or the intention of the party who did the act, proof of what the person said at the time of doing it is admissible in evidence, for the purpose of showing its true character.

The exceptions to the general rule as to the inadmissibility of hearsay evidence are the following: (1) dying declarations; (2) hearsay in questions of pedigree; (3) hearsay on questions of public right, customs, boundaries, &c.; (4) admissibility of old leases, rent-rolls, surveys, &c.; (5) admissibility of declarations against interest; (6) admissibility of rectors and vicars' books; (7) admissibility of books of tradesmen.—1 Stark. Evid. 24; 1 Phil. Evid. 229; and Taylor Evid.

Hearth-money, a tax levied by 14 Car. II. c. 2. It was productive of great discontent, and therefore abolished by 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 10.

Hebbermen, fishermen or poachers below London Bridge, who fish for whitings, flounders, smelts, &c. commonly at ebbing water. Punishable by 4 Hen. VII. c. 15.

Hebberthef, the privilege of claiming the goods and trial of a thief within a certain liberty.

Hebbing-wears, a device for catching fish in ebbing water.

Hebdomad, a week; a space of seven days.

Hebdomadius, a week's man, canon, or prebendary in a cathedral church, who has the care of the choir and the officers belonging to it, for his own week.—Reg. Episc. Hereford MSS.

Heccagium, rent paid to a lord of the fee for a liberty to use the engines called hecks.

Heck, an engine to take fish in the river Ouse.—23 Hen. VIII. c. 18.

Heda, a small haven, wharf, or landing-place. Old Records.

Hedagium, toll or customary dues at the hithe or wharf, for landing goods, &c. from which exemption was granted by the Crown to some particular persons and societies.

Hedge-bote, materials to make hedges, which a lessee for years, &c. may of common right take from the land leased. See BOTE.

Hegira, the epoch or account of time used by the Arabians and the Turks, who begin their computation from the day that Mahomet was compelled to escape from Mecca, which happened on Friday, July 16, A.D. 622, under the reign of the Emperor Heraclius. As the years of the Hegira consist of only 354 days, it is found by subtracting 622 from our year, and then multiplying by 365·52, and dividing by 354.

Hegumenos, the leader of the monks in the Greek Church.

Heir [fr. heire, old Fr.; hæres, Lat.], a person who succeeds by descent to an estate of inheritance. It is nomen collectivum, and extends to all heirs; and under heirs, the heirs of heirs are comprehended in infinitum.

The different kinds of heirs may be thus classed, and defined:—

(α) Heir apparent. He whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided he outlive the ancestor: as the eldest son, who must by the course of the common law be heir to his father on his death.—3 Prest. Abst. 5.

(β) Heir by custom. He who is heir by a particular and local custom, as in borough-English lands, the youngest son succeeds his father, while in gavelkind lands, all the sons inherit as parceners, and make but one heir.—Co. Litt. 140.

(γ) Heir by devise, or hæres factus. He who is made, by will, the testator's heir or devisee, and has no other right or interest than the will gives him.

(δ) Heir general, or heir at law. He who, after his father or ancestor's death, has a right to inherit all his lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

(ε) Heir presumptive. He who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would be his heir, but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born; as a brother or nephew, whose presumptive succession may be destroyed by the birth of a child; or a daughter, whose present hopes may be hereafter cut off by the birth of a son.

(ζ) Hæres sanguinis et hæreditatis.—(Heir of the blood and inheritance.) A son who may be defeated of his inheritance by his father's displeasure.

(η) Heir special. An heir who is not heir at Common Law, e. g. heir by the custom of gavelkind, borough-English, or heir-in-tail.—See Co. Litt. 376 b, 386 b.

(θ) Ultimus hæres. He to whom lands come by escheat or forfeiture, for want of proper heirs, or on account of treason or felony. He is either the lord of the manor or the Crown.

In the Scotch law, heir has a more extended significance, comprehending not only those who succeed to lands, but also successors to personal property also. It distributes heirs into the following classes:—

(α) Heir active. He who is served heir, and has the right of action.

(β) Heir by conquest. He who succeeds to the deceased in lands and other heritable rights, to which the deceased did not himself succeed as heir to his predecessors; as where a father leaves an estate purchased to his second son.

(γ) Heir of line. He who succeeds lineally by right of blood.

(δ) Heir male. The nearest heir male who can succeed.

(ε) Heir passive. He whom the law makes liable to be heir.

(ζ) Heirs portioners. When women succeed, they have all equal portions.

(η) Heirs of provision, or heirs by destination. Those who succeed by virtue of a particular provision in a deed or instrument.

(θ) Heir of tailzie. He on whom an estate is entailed.

(ι) Heir whatsomever. An heir-at-law.

Heirdom, succession by inheritance.

Heiress, a female heir. Where there are several, they are called co-heiresses.

Heirloom [fr. hæres, Lat., heir, and geloma, Sax., goods], personal chattels, such as carriages, utensils, and other household implements, which go by the special custom of a particular place to the heir, together with the inheritance. Heirlooms, though mere chattels, cannot be devised away from the heir by will; but such devise is void, even by a tenant in fee-simple. For though the owner might during his life have sold or disposed of them, as he might of the timber on the estate, since as the inheritance was his own, he might mangle or dismember it as he pleased; yet they being at his death instantly vested in the heir by the custom, the devise (which is subsequent, and not to take effect till after his death) shall be postponed to the custom whereby they have already descended.

The term 'heirlooms' is often applied in practice to the case where certain chattels—for example, pictures, plate, or furniture—are directed by will or settlement to follow the limitations thereby made of some family mansion or estate. But the word is not then employed in its strict and proper sense, nor is the disposition itself beyond a certain point effectual; for the articles will in such case belong absolutely to the first person who, under the limitations, would take a vested estate of inheritance in them, supposing they had been real estate; and if he die intestate, will pass to his personal representative, and not to his heir.—Co. Litt. 18 b. 185 b.; 2 Step. Com. 238.

Heirship Moveables, those things which the law withholds from the executors and next of kin, and gives to the heir, that he may not succeed to a house and lands completely dismantled. They consist of the best of everything; furniture, horses, cows, oxen, farming utensils, &c., but do not include fungibles.—Scotch Law.

Hell, a place under the Exchequer chamber, where the king's debtors were confined.—Richard. Dict.

Helm, thatch or straw; a covering for the head in war; a coat of arms bearing a crest; the tiller or handle of the rudder of a ship.

Helowe-wall [fr. hælan, Sax., to cover], the end-wall covering and defending the rest of the building.

Helsing, a Saxon brass coin, of the value of a halfpenny.

Hemoldborh, or Heimelborch [fr. heimilld, O. N.; hjemmel, Dan., just claim to a thing; and bohr], a title to possession.

The admission of this old Norse term into the laws of the Conqueror it is difficult to account for; it is not found in any Anglo-Saxon law extant.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Henchman, a page; an attendant; a herald.

Henedpenny, a customary payment of money instead of hens at Christmas; a composition for eggs.

Henfare, a fine for flight on account of murder.—Domesday Book.

Hengen, a prison for persons condemned to hard labor.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hengham (de) Radulph, author of a law-treatise composed in the reign of Edward I. It consists of two parts; one called Summa Magna, and the other Summa Parva. It seems to be a collection of notes relating to proceedings in actions.

This man had been Chief Justice, and was, for misconduct, degraded from his office, with many others of his fellow-justices. It is related that his offence was altering a record of a fine on a poor man from 13*s.* 4*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.* This unseasonable act of humanity was punished with the penalty of 7,000 marks—a punishment which struck a terror into all future judges, made every iota of a record be thenceforward most religiously preserved, and, perhaps, contributed not a little to encourage the scruples which prevailed afterwards with regard to the minutest errors in judicial proceedings.—2 Reeves, 277, 281.

Lord Coke calls him Radulphus de Ingham, and says that 'he for his fine made the clock, to be heard into Westminster Hall, and the clock-house in Westminster, which cost him 800 marks.'—4 Inst. 255. See also 3 Bl. Com. 410 n.

Henghen, a prison; a house of correction.

Hengwite. See HANGWIT.

Heordfæte, or Hudefæst, a master of a family keeping house, distinguished from a lower class of freemen—viz. folgeras (folgarii), who had no habitations of their own, but were house-retainers of their lords.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Heordpenny, Peter-pence.

Heordwerch, the service of herdsmen, done at the will of their lord.

Heptarchy [fr. ἑπτά, Gk., and ἀρχή], a government exercised by seven persons, or a nation divided into seven governments.

In the year 560, seven different monarchies had been formed in England by the German tribes, namely, that of Kent by the Jutes; those of Sussex, Wessex, and Essex by the Saxons; and those of East Anglia, Bernicia, and Deira, by the Angles. To these were added, about the year 586, an eighth, called the kingdom of Mercia, also founded by the Angles, and comprehending nearly the whole of the heart of the kingdom. These states formed together what has been designated the Anglo-Saxon Octarchy, or more commonly, though not so correctly, the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchy, from the custom of speaking of Deira and Bernicia under the single appellation of the kingdom of Northumberland.

Herald [fr. here, Sax., an army, and heald, a champion; hérault, héraut, Fr.; herald, Ger.; araldo, Ital.; because it was part of his office to charge or challenge unto battle or combat], an officer whose business it is to register genealogies, adjust ensigns armorial, regulate funerals, and anciently to carry messages between princes, and proclaim war and peace.

Heralds were anciently called dukes at arms, probably from the Latin ducere ad arma; because the conducting of affairs concerning peace and war devolved upon them, their office being to carry messages to the enemy, and to proclaim war or peace. Hence the persons of heralds were deemed sacred by the law of nations, and were received and protected by belligerent powers, as flags of truce are in the present day.

The three chief heralds are called Kings of Arms; of whom (1) Garter is the principal, instituted by Henry V. His office is to attend the knights of the Garter at their solemnities, and to marshal the funerals of the nobility. (2)

Clarenceux, King of Arms, ordained by Edward IV. so called from the Duke of Clarence. He is to marshal and dispose the funerals of the inferior nobility on the south side of the Trent. (3) Norroy (North Roy), King of Arms, holds a similar department on the north side of the river Trent. These two last are denominated provincial heralds, because they divide the kingdom between them into provinces.

Besides the kings of arms, there are six subordinate heralds, according to their original, as they were created to attend dukes and great lords in martial expeditions, i. e. York, Lancaster, Chester, Windsor, Richmond, and Somerset; the four former were instituted by Edward III. and the two latter by Edward IV. and Henry VIII. To these, upon the accession of George I. to the crown on account of his Hanoverian dominions, a new herald was added, called Hanover herald; and another styled Gloucester King of Arms.

To the superior and inferior heralds are added four others, called marshals or pursuivants of arms, who commonly succeed in the places of such heralds as die or are promoted; they are denominated blue-mantle, rouge-croix, rouge-dragon, and portcullis.

Lord Lyon's Office in Scotland, and Ulster King of Arms in Ireland, are distinct and independent.—Encyc. Lond.

Heraldry, an old and obsolete abuse of buying and selling precedence in the paper of causes for hearing. See North's Life of Lord Keeper Guildford, vol. i., p. 435.

Heralds' College, an ancient royal corporation, first instituted by Richard III. in 1483, situated on St. Bennet's Hill, near St. Paul's, in the city of London. The above-named heralds, together with the earl marshal and a secretary, are the members of this corporation; in all thirteen persons.

The heralds' books, compiled when progresses were solemnly and regularly made into every part of the kingdom, to inquire into the state of families, and to register such marriages and descents as were verified to them upon oath, are allowed to be good evidence of pedigrees.—3 Stark. Evid. 843.

Herbagium anterius, the first crop of grass or hay, in opposition to after-math and second cutting.—Paroch. Antiq. 459.

Herbenger, or Harbinger, an officer in the royal house, who goes before, and allots the noblemen and those of the household their lodgings; also, an innkeeper.

Herbergagium, lodgings to receive guests in the way of hospitality.—Cowel.

Herbergare, to harbour; to entertain.

Herbergatus, spent in an inn.

Herbery, or Herbury, an inn.—Cowel.

Herce, Hercia, a harrow.—Fleta, l. 2, c. lxxvii.

Herciare, to harrow.

Herdewich, or Herdewic, a grange or place for cattle or husbandry.

Herdwerch, Heordwerch, herdsmen's work, or customary labor, done by shepherds and inferior tenants, at the will of the lord.

Herebannum, a mulct for not going armed into the field when summoned.—Spelm.

Herebote, the royal edict, summoning the people to the field.

Hereditaments, every kind of property that can be inherited; i. e. not only property which a person has by descent from his ancestors, but also that which he has by purchase, because his heir can inherit it from him. The two kinds of hereditaments are corporeal, which are tangible (in fact, they mean the same thing as land), and incorporeal, which are not tangible and are the rights and profits annexed to, or issuing out of land.

The enumeration of incorporeal hereditaments in Hale's Analysis (p. 48) is the following:—Rents, services, tithes, commons, and other profits in alieno solo, pensions, offices, franchises, liberties, villeins, dignities. But Blackstone enumerates ten principal kinds: advowsons, tithes, commons, ways, offices, dignities, franchises, corodies or pensions, annuities, and rents.—Com. i. 21.

Although the word 'hereditament' applies both to realty and personalty, yet it is in a different mode of relation. When applied to realty it generally denotes the subject of property, apart from its nature and extent; but when applied to personalty, it does not then denote the subject, but signifies some inheritable right, of which the subject is susceptible.

There is a third application of this word—it is used to denote inheritable rights relating to land, or something issuing therefrom or exercisable therein, or having some local connection or relation distinct from the enjoyment of the land itself. In this view of the description, hereditaments divide themselves into real, personal, and mixed, and therefore, as was said before, they are applicable to all the kinds of property.—Fearne's Reading on the Stat. of Inrolments.

Hereditary right to the Crown. The Crown of England, by the positive constitution of the kingdom, has ever been descendible, and so continues, in a course peculiar to itself, yet subject to limitation by Parliament; but, notwithstanding such limitation, the Crown retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the prince to whom it is limited.—1 Bl. Com. chap. iii.

Herefare, a military expedition; a going to war.

Heregeld, a tribute or tax levied for the maintenance of an army.

Heremitorium, a solitary place of retirement for hermits.

Heremones, or Hereteams, followers of an army.

Herenach, an archdeacon.

Hereslita, Heressa, Heressiz, a hired soldier who departs without license.

Heresy [fr. αἵρεσις, Gk.], an opinion of private men different from that of the orthodox church.

1 Eliz. c. 1, repealed all former statutes relating to heresy, leaving the jurisdiction of heresy as it stood at common law; that is, it left the simple offence to be visited by spiritual punishment in the ecclesiastical courts. Heresy now consists only of such tenets as have been heretofore so declared:—(1) By the words of the canonical Scriptures; (2) by the first four General Councils, or such others as have only used the words of the Holy Scriptures; or (3) which shall hereafter be so declared by Parliament, with the assent of the clergy in convocation.

By 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 32, if any person, having been educated in, or made profession of Christianity, shall, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, maintain that there are more Gods than one, or deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, and be thereof convicted by two witnesses, he shall, unless he recant, incur such civil disabilities as therein mentioned, and, on a second conviction, shall also suffer imprisonment for the term of three years.

Heretic, one that adheres to and is convicted of heresy.

Heretoch [fr. here, an army, and teohan, to draw or lead], a general, leader, or commander; also a baron of the realm.

Heretum, a court or yard.

Herge [fr. exercitus, Lat.], offenders who joined in a body of more than thirty-five to commit depredations. Ang.-Sax.

Herigalds, a sort of garment.—Cowel.

Heriot [supposed by some to be derived fr. here, Sax., an army, and geat, provision.—Willis, 194. Coke derives it fr. here, lord, and geat, beste, i. e. the lord's beste.—Co. Litt. 185 b.], originally a tribute to the lord of a manor of the horse or habiliments of the deceased tenants, in order that the militiæ apparatus might continue to be used for the purpose of national defence by each succeeding tenant. On the decline of the military tenures, the heriot was commuted for a money payment, or for the tenant's best beast (averium) or dead chattel, which is most commonly compounded for.

We are told by Bracton, Fleta, and Britton (who, by the way, scarcely differ in their description), that the heriot was originally a voluntary or gratuitous bequest of the tenant. But I apprehend that this must be understood merely of the heriot of the husbandman, and not of the military heriot, since we find the latter fixed as a right, and a legal duty, at least so early as the time of Canute the Great, confirmed in that of the Conqueror, and acknowledged in the charters of Henry I., John, and Henry III. In some Saxon wills, indeed, we find express bequests of a heriot to the lord; but such instances seem only from abundant caution, that the testators might not appear unmindful of their lord, and so prevent their chattels from passing into other hands, and especially into those of the church; since it is evident, from the very bequests referred to, that, though the heriot was expressly directed to be paid, it was considered as the lord's 'right.'—2 Wat. Cop. p. 36; 1 Scri. Cop. 369.

Heriots are divided into (1) heriot service, (2) heriot custom, and (3) suit-heriot, reserved on a grant of freehold lands.

Heriot service is an express reservation by the lord in the original grant, claimable by prescription. It arises from ancient tenure, is in the nature of a rent, and lies in render as well as in prender; it is recoverable by distress. The heriot service being due by reservation, goes with the reversion to the heir or grantee, and follows the seigniory if the grant be in fee. It is said to be due upon the death of the tenant in fee-simple only, but Mr. Serjeant Scriven (1 Cop. 372, and the cases there quoted) thinks that this heriot may be reserved on a lease for life, and on the death of every particular tenant, whether for life or years, or even at will.

Heriot custom is due by virtue of an immemorial usage of a manor, generally upon the death of the tenant, but sometimes on alienation also, or on alienation only. A heriot on alienation is in the nature of a fine. It lies in prender only, therefore the lord cannot distrain for it, except, perhaps, by special custom. A heriot is only due upon the death of a legal tenant, and not upon the death of one entitled only to an equitable interest in the copyhold. No heriot is due upon the death of a wife, because she cannot have any chattels. A heriot is not due on the death of a person having only an interesse termini. It will be due on the death of the surrenderor of copyholds, if he die before the surrenderee's admission, the latter not becoming the lord's tenant until admittance. A heriot is due only on the death of the survivor of joint tenants, for it is payable on the death of a person who dies solely seised, and such is the rule respecting coparceners. Tenants in common being solely seised, a heriot is due to the lord on the death of each of them. When a female copyholder marries, the husband and wife are seised in her right, and the seisin continues in the wife, if she survive; and as there is no change of tenancy on the husband's death, no heriot will accrue to the lord. Heriots are due on the death of tenants by the curtesy and in freebench, and when a widow has her freebench of a portion of the land, a heriot will be due on the death of both the heir and widow. The heriot is due in respect of the land, so that when a person dies seised of several heriot-able tenements, a heriot must be paid for each, unless a special custom exist to the contrary. The death of a bankrupt copyholder, after assignees are chosen, will not entitle the lord to a heriot.

The lord should seize immediately after the heriot accrues, as his right would be concluded by a bonâ fide and legal sale by the executors in market overt, whereby the property in goods so sold is effectually transferred. The lord's claim cannot be defeated by a will or gift (13 Eliz. c. 5). If a seizure cannot be effected, an action of trover or detinue is the remedy.

If the tenant have no beast for a heriot, the lord is defeated; but a bill in equity lies to discover the best beast of a tenant.

If the lord seize when no heriot is due, the remedy against him is replevin, trover, or trespass.

Herischild, military service, or knight's fee.

Heriscindium, a division of household goods.

Herislit, laying down of arms.

Heristall, a castle.

Heritable bond, a bond for money, joined with a conveyance of land or heritage, to be held by a creditor as security for his debt.—Scotch term.

Heritable jurisdiction, grants of criminal jurisdiction, anciently bestowed on great families in Scotland, with a view to the more easy administration of justice. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 43.

Heritable rights, all rights to land, or whatever is connected with land, as mills, fishings, tithes, &c.—Scotch phrase.

Heritable securities in Scotland. See 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 15 and 80.

Heritor, a landholder in a parish.—Scotch term.

Hermaphrodite. See DOUBTFUL SEX.

Hermaphroditus tam masculo quam fœminæ comparatur secundum prævalentiam sexus incalescentis.—Co. Litt. 8.—(An hermaphrodite is to be considered male or female, according to the predominancy of the prevailing sex.)

Hermeneutics, the art of interpretation and construction.

Hermer, a great lord.

Hermitage, a solitary place.

Hermitorium, the chapel or place of prayer belonging to a hermitage.

Hermogenian Code. See CODEX HERMOGENIANUS.

Hernescus, a heron.—Cowel.

Hernesium, household goods; implements of trade or husbandry.

Herondes, heralds.

Herring Silver, a composition in money for the custom of supplying herrings for the provision of a religious house.

Hership, the illegally driving off cattle from the grounds of a proprietor.—Scotch term.

Hesia, an easement.

Hesta, Hestha, a little loaf of bread.

Hestcorn, vowed or devoted corn.

Hetærarcha [fr. ἑταίρος, Gk., friend, and ἀρχή, government], the head of a religious house; the head of a college; the warden of a corporation.

Heuvelborgh, a surety for debt.

Hexham, a very ancient town in the county of Northumberland, celebrated as the Axelodunum of the Romans. It was made a county palatine in the reign of Henry VIII. but it is now united to Northumberland.—14 Eliz. c. 13.

Heybote. See HAYBOTE.

Heyloed, a customary burden laid upon inferior tenants for mending or repairing the heys or hedges.—Cowel.

Heymectus, a hay-net.

Hibernagium, season for sowing winter corn.

Hibrid, or Hibris, a mongrel or mule; also one born of parents of different countries.

Hidage, an extraordinary tax formerly payable to the Crown for every hide of land. This taxation was levied, not in money, but provision of armour, &c.

Hide and Gain, arable land.—Co. Litt. 856.

Hide of land, such a space as might be ploughed with one plough, or as much as would maintain the family of a hide or mansion-house. According to some, it was sixty acres; others make it eighty; and others, again, a hundred. The quantity probably was always determined by local usage. See Co. Litt. 69 a.

Hidel, a place of protection or sanctuary.

Hidgild, Hidegild [fr. hide, A. S., skin, and gild, A. S., a contribution], a sum of money paid by a villein or servant to save himself from a whipping.

Hierarchy [fr. ἱερός, Gk., sacred, and ἀρχή, government], direction in religious concerns and things sacred.

Of whatever denomination may be the persons who take the lead in conducting religious rites, whether they be styled presbyters, elders, ministers, priests, or bishops, they virtually, and according to the true and real meaning of the term, constitute a hierarchy. It is only by limitation of its true sense, and by partial application of it under such restriction, that hierarchy is taken to mean 'episcopal direction,' to the exclusion of other 'direction in things sacred.' If we would speak correctly, and if we would follow the true import of the word, hierarchy subsists as much among the chief ministers in the Church of Geneva and Scotland as in the Church of Rome or of England. For wherever there is regular form and order of sacred things, there is hierarchy; the very essence of which is conducting that regular form and order.—Encyc. Lond.

Hierloom. See HEIRLOOM.

High Commission Court, established by 1 Eliz. c. 1. It was instituted to vindicate the dignity and peace of the church, by reforming, ordering, and correcting the ecclesiastical state and persons, and all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities. The powers of this tribunal were directed to tyrannical and unconstitutional purposes; it was therefore abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 11.—5 Reeves, 215.

High Constable. See CONSTABLE.

High Constable of England, Lord. His office has been disused, except only upon great and solemn occasions, as the coronation or the like, since the attainder of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Henry VIII. See CHIVALRY, COURT OF.

High misdemeanors, misprisions.

High Steward, Court of the Lord, a tribunal instituted for the trial of peers indicted for treason or felony, or for misprision of either, but not for any other offence. The office of this great magistrate is very ancient, and was formerly hereditary, or at least held for life, or dum benè se gesserit; but now it is usually, and has been for many centuries past, granted pro hâc vice only, and it has been the constant practice (and therefore seems now to have become necessary) to grant it to a lord of Parliament. When, therefore, such an indictment is found by a grand jury of freeholders in the Queen's Bench, or at the assizes before a judge of oyer and terminer, it is to be removed by a writ of certiorari into the Court of the Lord High Steward, which only has power to determine it. A peer may plead a pardon before the Queen's Bench, in order to prevent the trouble of appointing a high steward, merely for the purpose of receiving such plea, but he cannot plead any other plea, because it is possible that, in consequence of such a plea, judgment of death might be pronounced upon him.

The Sovereign, in case a peer be indicted for treason, felony, or misprision, appoints a Lord High Steward pro hâc vice, by commission under the Great Seal, which, reciting the indictment so found, gives him power to receive and try it secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ. When the indictment is regularly removed by certiorari, the Lord High Steward addresses a precept to a serjeant-at-arms, to summon the lords to attend and try the indicted peer. All the peers who have a right to sit and vote in Parliament are summoned, at least twenty days before such trial, to appear and vote thereon, and every lord appearing and taking the proper oaths may vote upon the trial. The decision is by the majority, but a majority cannot convict, unless it consist of twelve or more.

During a session of Parliament, the trial is not properly in the court of the Lord High Steward, but before the High Court of Parliament. A Lord High Steward is, however, always appointed to regulate the proceedings; but he is rather in the nature of a speaker or chairman than a judge, for the collective body of the peers are the judges, both of law and fact, and the High Steward has a vote with the rest, in right of his peerage. But in the Court of the Lord High Steward, which is held in the recess of Parliament, he is the sole judge of matters of law, as the lords triers are in matters of fact, and he may vote upon the trial and regulate all the proceedings.

The lords spiritual have a right to stay and sit in court in capital cases, till the court proceeds to the vote of guilty or not guilty. But this extends only to trials in full Parliament, for to the Court of the Lord High Steward (in which no vote can be given but that of guilty or not guilty) no bishop, as such, ever was or could be summoned. They have no right to be tried themselves in this court, and therefore ought not to be judges thereof.

The method and regulation of proceeding differs little from trial by jury, except that no special verdict can be given, because the judges are sufficiently competent to deal with the law as it arises out of the facts.—4 Bl. Com. 261.

High Steward of the Royal Household, Lord, Court of, a tribunal long since fallen into disuse.—9 Geo. IV. c. 31; 4 Step. Com. 405; 4 Inst. 133.

High Steward of the Universities, Court of the Lord. By the charter of 7 June, 2 Hen. IV. confirmed by 13 Eliz. c. 29, conusance is granted to the University of Oxford, of all indictments of treasons, insurrections, felonies, and mayhem, which shall be found in any of the Queen's courts against a scholar or privileged person; and they are to be tried before the Lord High Steward or his deputy, who is nominated by the Chancellor of the University, and approved of by the Lord High Chancellor of England. A special commission is given to him and others, to try the indictment then depending, according to the law of the land and the privileges of the University. The indictment must first be found by a grand jury, and then the cognizance claimed of it in the first instance, or at the first day.

When the cognizance is allowed, if the offence be a misdemeanor it is tried in the Chancellor's court by the ordinary judge. If it be for treason, felony or mayhem, it is then determined before the Lord High Steward, who issues one precept to the sheriff of the county, who returns a panel of eighteen freeholders, and another to the university bedels, who return a panel of eighteen matriculated laymen. The indictment is then tried by a jury de medietate, half of freeholders and half of matriculated laymen in the guildhall there. The sheriff must execute the university process, to which he is bound by an oath.—4 Bl. Com. 277, and 4 Step. Com. 382.

The University of Cambridge has also a similar jurisdiction.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 17, s. 18, the jurisdiction of the University of Cambridge in criminal as well as other proceedings, wherein any person not a member of the university shall be a party, is taken away.—See CHANCELLOR OF THE TWO UNIVERSITIES.

High Treason. Since petit treason was abolished by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 2, the correlative term high is not now usually retained, when speaking of this the highest civil crime. It is merely denominated treason. See TREASON.

Highland Roads and Bridges Act 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 105.

Highness, a title of honor given to princes. The kings of England before the time of James I. were not saluted with the title of Majesty, but with that of Highness only. The children of crowned heads are generally styled royal highness.

High-water-mark, that part of the seashore to which the waters ordinarily reach when the tide is highest.

Highwaymen, robbers on the highways.

Highway rate, a tax chargeable upon the same property that is liable to the poor-rate. The rate is to be made and signed by the surveyor, who keeps accounts which may be inspected at all reasonable times by the rated inhabitants, without fee or reward. The yearly account is laid before the vestry, and examined and passed before justices of the peace, at the special sessions of the highways.—3 Step. Com. 246. Stat. 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, continued by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 67, authorises for a certain time the application of a portion of the highway rates to turnpike roads in certain cases. See also 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61.

Highways, public roads, which every subject of the kingdom has a right to use. They exist either by prescription, by authority of local acts of Parliament, or by dedication to the use of the public.

The liability to keep highways in repair (in whatever manner they may happen to have first originated) is of common right, incumbent generally upon the parishes in which they respectively lie; but in some cases it attaches (by prescription) to particular townships, or other divisions of parishes, and occasionally to private persons bound ratione tenuræ, or in right of their estates, to repair some particular highway.

Highways in general are regulated by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50 (amended by 4 & 5 Vict. cc. 51 & 59, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 71), which has repealed all former enactments on the subject, and is applicable to all highways whatever, except turnpike roads, and roads, pavements or bridges, falling under the provisions of local or personal acts of Parliament, a description which applies generally to the streets of towns.

The general plan of the act is to place highways under the care of surveyors to be appointed for the respective parishes, subject to a superintending power to be exercised by the justices of the peace, at special sessions to be holden for the highways. See 12 Vict. c. 14; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 35; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99; 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 68, 73; 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 46, 70, 126; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. See also 3 Step. Com. 242, et seq.

High wood, timber.

Higler, a person who carries from door to door, and sells, by retail, provisions, &c.

Hikenilde Street, one of the four Roman roads of Britain, leading from St. David's to Tynemouth, thus described by Trevisa:—'The fourthe is called Heykenyldestrete, and stretcheth forth by Worchestre, by Wycombe, by Byrmyngeham, by Lichefeld, by Derby; by Chestrefeld, by Yorke, and fourth unto Tynmouthe.'—Polychron. l. 1, c. xlv.

Hilary Term, one of the law terms, i. e. periods of time during which the courts of law are open for business. It begins on the 11th and ends on the 31st January in each year. It is an issuable term (1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 6); and is so called from Hilary, Bishop of Poictiers in France, a great champion of the Catholic faith against the Arians in the fourth century.

Hindeni Homines, a society of men. The Saxons ranked men into three classes, and valued them as to satisfaction for injuries, &c. according to their class. The highest class were valued at 1,200*s.* and were called twelf hindmen; the middle class at 600*s.* and called sexhindmen; the lowest at 200*s.* called troy-hindmen. Their wives were termed hindas.—Brompt. Leg. Alfred. c. xii.

Hine, or Hind, a husbandry-servant.

Hine fare, the loss or departure of a servant from his master.

Hinegeld. See HIDGILD.

Hircisсunda, the division of an inheritance among heirs.

Hireman, a subject.

Hiring [locatio, conductio, Lat.], a bailment for a reward or compensation. It is divisible into four sorts:—(1) The hiring of a thing for use (locatio rei). (2) The hiring of work and labor (locatio operis faciendi). (3) The hiring of care and services to be performed or bestowed on the thing delivered (locatio custodiæ). (4) The hiring of the carriage of goods (locatio operis mercium vehendarum), from one place to another. The three last are but subdivisions of the general head of hire of labor and services.

Several ingredients are of the essence of the contract of bailment for hire. (1) There should be a thing in esse, which may be the subject of the contract. (2) It should be a thing capable of being let. (3) The bailee should have a right to use, enjoy and possess it during the period for which it is let. (4) There should be a price for the hire. And, (5) There should be a contract creating a legal obligation between the parties.

To make a binding contract, it is necessary, (1) that the bailment should not be prohibited by law; (2) that it should be between persons competent to contract; and (3) that there should be a free and voluntary consent between the parties.

The rights, duties, and obligations of the parties resulting from the contract of bailment for hire may be thus stated.

(I.) Hire of things. The letting to hire implies an obligation to deliver the thing to the hirer; to refrain from every obstruction to the use of it by the hirer during the period of the bailment; to do no act that shall deprive the hirer of the thing; to warrant the title and right of possession to the hirer, in order to enable him to use the thing, or to perform the service; to keep the thing in suitable order and repair for the purposes of the bailment; and, finally, to warrant the thing free from any fault inconsistent with the proper use or enjoyment of it. It is the duty of the person letting to hire, according to the Roman law, to disclose the faults of the thing hired, and practice no artful concealment, to charge only a reasonable price therefor, and to indemnify the hirer for all expenses, which are properly payable by the letter. The rights of the hirer are that he acquires the right of possession only of the thing for the particular period or purpose stipulated (but he acquires no property in it); and that he also acquires the exclusive right to the use of the thing during the time of the bailment. His duties are to put the thing to no other use than that for which it is hired; to use it well; to take care of it; to restore it at the time appointed; to pay the price or hire; and, in general, to observe whatever is prescribed by contract, or by law, or by custom. The contract may be dissolved or extinguished in respect to future liabilities in various ways: (1) by the mere efflux of the time, or the accomplishment of the object, for which the thing is hired; (2) by the loss or destruction of the thing by any inevitable casualty; (3) by a voluntary dissolution of the contract by the parties; and (4) by operation of law, as where the hirer becomes proprietor by purchase or otherwise of the thing hired. How far these principles, which are derived altogether from the Roman and foreign laws, are to be deemed satisfactorily established in our jurisprudence, is a matter for consideration, since the common law does not furnish any direct recognition of them. But it may be safely affirmed, that they are so consonant with general justice and with the nature of the contract, that in the absence of any controlling authority, they may be used as fit guides to assist our general reasoning.

(II.) Hire of labor and services, divisible into two branches:—(α) Locatio operis faciendi, and (β) locatio operis mercium vehendarum, mentioned as the 2nd and 4th divisions of the four sorts of hiring above set forth.

(α) The locatio operis faciendi may be subdivided into two kinds:—(a) The hire of labor and services, or locatio operis faciendi, strictly so called; such are the hire of tailors to make clothes, of jewellers to set gems, and of watchmakers to repair watches; (b) locatio custodiæ (the third division first above mentioned), or the receiving of goods on deposit for a reward for the custody thereof, which is properly the hire of care and attention about the goods, as by warehousemen, wharfingers, &c.

(a) In contracts for work it is of the essence of the contract:—(1) That there should be work to be done; (2) that it should be to be done for a price or reward; and (3) that there should be a lawful contract between parties capable and intending to contract. The obligation and duties on the part of the employer, as deduced in the foreign law, are principally these:—(1) To pay the price or compensation; (2) to pay for all proper, new, and accessorial materials; (3) to do everything on his part to enable the workman to execute his engagement; (4) to accept the thing when it is finished. If before the work is finished, the thing perishes by internal defect, by inevitable accident, or by irresistible force, without any default of the workman, then, (1) if the work is independent of any materials or property of the employer, the manufacturer has the risk, and the unfinished work perishes to him; (2) if he is employed in working up the materials, or adding his labor to the property of the employer, the risk is with the owner of the thing, with which the labor is incorporated; (3) if the work have been performed in such a way as to afford a defence to the employer against a demand for the price, if the accident had not happened (as if it were defectively or improperly done), the same defence will be equally available to him after the loss. The obligations or duties on the part of the workman or undertaker are thus summed up in the foreign law:—To do the work; to do it at the time agreed on; to do it well; to employ the materials furnished by the employer in a proper manner; and, lastly, to exercise a proper degree of care and diligence about the work.

(b) The hiring of care and attention. To this class belong agistors of cattle; warehousemen forwarding merchants and wharfingers. They are bound to use ordinary diligence, and of course are responsible for losses by ordinary negligence.

(β) The locatio operis mercium vehendarum, or the carriage of goods for hire. In respect to contracts of this sort entered into by private persons, who do not exercise the business of common carriers, there does not seem to be any material distinction, varying the rights, obligations, and duties of the parties from those of other bailees for hire. Every such private person is bound to ordinary diligence, and to a reasonable exercise of skill; and of course he is not responsible for any losses not occasioned by the ordinary negligence of himself or of his servants. The exceptions to this general rule are postmasters, innkeepers, and common carriers. These are under peculiar regulations consonant with public policy. See those titles respectively.—Story on Bailments, c. vi.

Hirst, or Hurst, a wood.—Domesday; Co. Litt. 4 b.

His testibus (these being witnesses), a phrase anciently added in deeds, after in cujus rei testimonium. The deed was read in the presence of witnesses, and their names were then written down. The phrase is not now inserted.

Hiwisc, a hide of land.

Hlaf æta, a servant fed at his master's cost.

Hlaford, a lord.—Ang.-Sax.

Hlafordsocna, a lord's protection.

Hlasocner, the benefit of the law.

Hlothbote, a mulct set on him who commits homicide in a riot or hloth.

Hlothe [turma, Lat.], an unlawful company, from eight inclusive to thirty-five.—Cowel.

Hlytas [fr. sortes, Lat.], lots.

Hoastmen, an ancient guild or fraternity in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, engaged in selling or shipping coal.

Hobblers, or Hobilers, light horsemen or bowmen; also certain tenants, bound by their tenure to maintain a little light horse for giving notice of any invasion, or such like peril, towards the seaside.—Camd. Brit.

Hoccus saltis, a hoke, hole, or lesser pit of salt.

Hockettor, or Hocqueteur, a knight of the post; a decayed man; a basket carrier.—Cowel.

Hock-Tuesday-money, a duty given to the landlord, that his tenants and bondmen might solemnize the day on which the English conquered the Danes, being the second Tuesday after Easter week.—Cowel.

Hodge-podge Act, a statute embracing distinct subjects which it would be better to keep apart.

Hoga, Hogium, Hoch, a mountain or hill.

Hogaster, a little hog; a young sheep.

Hogenhine. See THIRD-NIGHT-AWN-HINDE.

Hoggacius, Hoggaster, a sheep of the second year.

Hogshead, a measure containing half a pipe, a fourth part of a ton, or sixty-three gallons.

Hokeday. See HOCK-TUESDAY-MONEY.

Hold, or Wold, a governor or chief officer. Gibs. Camd.

Holder, a payee of a bill of exchange or a promissory note.

Holdin tenure.—Scotch term.

Holding over, keeping possession of land by a lessee after the expiration of his term. See DOUBLE RENT; DOUBLE VALUE.

Holding up hand. When a prisoner is brought to the bar in treason or felony, he is called upon by name to hold up his hand; which, though it may seem a trifling circumstance, yet is of this importance, that by the holding up of the hand, he owns himself to be of that name by which he is called. It is not, however, an indispensable ceremony, for being calculated merely for the purpose of identifying the person, any other acknowledgment will answer the purpose as well.—4 Step. Com. 475.

Holiday, an anniversary feast; a time of festivity. Also called a red-letter day.

State holidays are either appointed by Act of Parliament or founded on ancient usage. The former are, the 5th November, to be kept as a day of thanksgiving (3 Jac. I. c. 1); the 29th May, to be an anniversary thanksgiving (12 Car. II. c. 14); the 30th January, to be kept as an anniversary day of humiliation (12 Car. II. c. 3, s. 1); the 2nd September, to be annually kept as a fast in London (19 Car. II. c. 3, s. 28). 'But the several acts and parts of acts, and every other enactment now in force which may be read or construed as requiring the observance of the 30th day of January, the 29th day of May, the 5th day of November, and the 23rd day of October respectively, as anniversary days, or the use of any special services of the church for those days respectively, shall be and the same are hereby repealed' (22 Vict. c. 2). The latter are the birthday, accession, proclamation, and coronation of the reigning monarch; and also the birthday of the Consort and Prince of Wales. Besides these, fast and thanksgiving days are occasionally appointed by royal proclamation.

As regards the holidays to be allowed in the common law offices, the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 43, after reciting 'that the observance of holidays in the courts of common law during term time, and in the offices belonging to the same, on the several days on which holidays are now kept, is very inconvenient, and tends to delay in the administration of justice,' enacts, 'that none of the several days mentioned in the 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 3, shall be observed or kept in the said courts, or in the several offices belonging thereto, except Sundays, the day of the nativity of our Lord and the three following days, and Monday and Tuesday in Easter week.' By rule of Hilary Term, 6 Wm. IV. it is ordered, that 'thenceforth, in addition to the said days, the following, and none other, shall be observed in the several offices belonging to the said courts, viz.: Good Friday and Easter Eve, and such of the four days following as may not fall in the time of term, but not otherwise; the birthday and accession of the sovereign; Whit-Monday and Whit-Tuesday.'

The several offices of the Court of Chancery, except the offices of the accountant-general and of the taxing masters, are to be opened on every day of the year except Sundays, Good Friday, Monday and Tuesday in Easter-week, Christmas-day, and all days appointed by proclamation to be observed as days of general fast or thanksgiving. The offices of the accountant-general and of the taxing masters are to be opened on every day of the year except Sundays and the days above specified, and except during vacations. The offices of the vacation taxing master are to be open during the vacations on every day except the days above specified.—Consol. Ord. 1860, v., r. 1, 2 & 3. See VACATION.

Holm [fr. hulmus, Sax.; insula amnica, Lat.], an isle, or fenny ground; a river island; also a hill or cliff.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Holograph [fr. ὅλος, Gk., all, and γράφω, to write], a deed written entirely by the grantor himself, which, on account of the difficulty with which the forgery of such a document can be accomplished, is held by the Scotch law valid without witnesses. Also a will in the testator's handwriting.

Holt, a wood.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Holy Orders, those who have been admitted and ordained as officials in the Established Church. They consist of archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons. The ordination must take place according to the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer.—3 Step. Com. 2. See DEACON.

Homage [fr. homo, Lat., a man], the most honorable service of reverence that a free tenant may do to his lord. When a tenant performs it, he is ungirt, and his head uncovered, the lord sitting; the tenant then kneels before him, and holds his hands extended and joined between the hands of his lord, and says thus:—'I become your man from this day forward, of life, and limb, and earthly honor, and to you will be faithful and loyal, and bear you faith, for the tenements that I claim to hold of you (saving the faith that I owe unto our sovereign lord the king): so help me God.' The lord then kisses him. Homage can only be done to the lord himself, but fealty may to his steward or bailiff.—Litt. 85. See COPYHOLD.

Homage ancestrel, where a tenant holds lands of his lord by homage; and the same tenant and his ancestors have holden the same land of the same lord, and of his ancestors, immemorially, and have done to them homage. 1 Inst. 100.

Homage Jury, a jury in a court-baron, consisting of tenants that do homage, who are to inquire and make presentments of the death of tenants, surrenders, admittances, and the like.

Homager, one who does or is bound to do homage.

Homagio respectuando (respecting of homage), a writ to the escheator commanding him to deliver seisin of lands to the heir of the king's tenant, notwithstanding his homage not done.—F. N. B. 269.

Homagium reddere (to renounce homage), when a vassal made a solemn declaration of disowning and defying his lord; for which there was a set form and method prescribed by the feudal laws.—Brac. l. 2, c. xxxv., s. 35.

Homagium, non per procuratores nec per literas fieri potuit, sed in propriâ personâ tam domini quam tenentis capi debet et fieri.—Co. Litt. 68.—(Homage cannot be done by proxy, nor by letters, but must be paid and received in the proper person, as well of the lord as the tenant.)

Homagium repellit perquisitum.—Gilb. 9, 142. (Homage repels perquisition.)

Home ne serra puny pur suer des briefes en court le roy, soit il a droit ou a tort.—2 Inst. 228.—(A man shall not be punished for suing out writs in the King's Court, whether he has a right or a wrong.)

Homesoken, Homsoken. See HAMESECKEN.

Homestall, a mansion-house.

Homicide, destroying the life of a human being, in its several stages of guilt, arising from the particular circumstances of mitigation or aggravation which attend it. It is either justifiable, excusable, or felonious.

I. Justifiable, of three kinds:—

(α) Where the proper officer executes a criminal in strict conformity with his sentence.

(β) Where an officer of justice, or other person acting in his aid, in the legal exercise of a particular duty, kills a person who resists or prevents him from executing it.

(γ) Where it is committed in prevention of a forcible and atrocious crime.—1 Hale, 488.

II. Excusable, of two kinds:—

(α) Per infortunium, or by misadventure, as where a man doing a lawful act, without any intention of hurt, by accident kills another.

(β) Se defendendo, as where a man kills another upon a sudden rencounter in his own defence, or in defence of his wife, child, parent, or servant, and not from any vindictive feeling.

III. Felonious, of two kinds:—

(α) Killing one's self.

(β) Killing another, which is either—

(1) Murder; or

(2) Manslaughter; and this is either—

(α) Voluntary, where a man doing an unlawful act, not amounting to felony, by accident kills another; or

(β) Involuntary, where, upon a sudden quarrel, two persons fight, and one of them kills the other; or where a man greatly provokes another, by some personal violence, &c. and the other immediately kills him.—4 Bl. Com. c. xiv.; 4 Step. Com. 130, et seq.

Homicidium vel hominis cædium, est hominis occisio ab homine facta.—3 Inst. 53.—(Homicide or slaughter of a man, is the killing of a man, perpetrated by a man.)

Hominatio, the mustering of men; the doing of homage.

Homine eligendo ad custodiendam peciam sigilli pro mercatoribus editi, a writ directed to a corporation for the choice of a man to keep one part of the seal appointed for statutes-merchant, when a former is dead, according to the Statute of Acton-Burnell.—Reg. Orig. 178.

Homine replegiando, a writ to bail a man out of prison.—Reg. Orig. 77. All these writs are totally disused.

Homines, feudatory tenants who claimed a privilege of having their causes, &c. tried only in their lord's court.—Paroch. Antiq. 152.

Homiplagium, the maiming of a man.

Homologation. The express or implied ratification of an act that formerly was null or invalid.—Scotch term.

Homo potest esse habilis et inhabilis diversis temporibus.—5 Co. 98.—(A man may be capable and incapable at divers times.)

Homstale, a mansion-house.

Hond-habend. See HAND-HABEND.

Hong, the Chinese name for large factories at Canton.

Hong Kong, Governor of, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 80, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 9.

Honor, a seignory of several manors held under one baron or lord paramount; also, those dignities or privileges, degrees of nobility, knighthood, and other titles, which flow from the Crown, the fountain of honor.

Honor, Court of, a branch of the Court of Chivalry. See CHIVALRY, Court of.

Honor Courts, tribunals held within honors or seigniories.

Honor, Maids of, ladies in attendance upon the Queen: they are six in number, and receive salaries of 300*l.* each.

Honorable, a title of quality given to the younger children of earls, and the children of viscounts and barons; to persons enjoying trust and honor; and, collectively, to the House of Commons and the East India Company.

Honorarium, a recompense for service rendered; a voluntary fee to one exercising a liberal profession, e.g. a barrister's fee.

Honorarium jus, the law of the prætors and the edicts of the ædiles.—Civ. Law.

Honorary Canons, those without emolument. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 23.

Honorary Feuds, titles of nobility, descendible to the eldest son, in exclusion of all the rest.

Honorary Services, those incident to grand serjeanty, and commonly annexed to some honor.

Honorary Trustees, trustees to preserve contingent remainders, so called because they are bound, in honor only, to decide on the most proper and prudential course.—Lewin on Trus. 408.

Honoris respectum, Challenge propter. See CHALLENGE.

Hontfongenethef, or Honfangenethef, a thief taken with hondhabend, i. e. having the thing stolen in his hand. See BACKBERINDE.

Hoo, a hill.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Hookland, land ploughed and sown every year.—Scott.

Hopcon, a valley.—Cowel.

Hope, a valley.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Hoppo, a collector; an overseer of commerce. Chinese.

Hora Auroræ, the morning-bell; as ignitegium, or coverfeu, was the evening-bell.

Hora non est multum de substantiâ negotii, licet in appello de eâ aliquando fiat mentio.—1 Buls. 82.—(The hour is not considered of much consequence as to the substance of business, although in appeal mention of it is sometimes made.)

Horda, a cow in calf.—Old Records.

Hordera, a treasurer.

Horderium, a hoard, treasury, or repository.

Hordeum palmale, beer, barley.—Cowel.

Horesti, the people of Angus-upon-the-Tay, or Highlanders.

Hornagium. See HORNGELD.

Horngeld, or Hornegeld, a forest-tax paid for horned beasts.

Horn with horn, or Horn under horn, the promiscuous feeding of bulls and cows, or all horned beasts that are allowed to run together, upon the same common.—Spelm.

Horning, Letters of, warrant for charging persons in Scotland to pay or perform certain debts and duties; probably so called because they were originally proclaimed by sound of trumpet.

Hors de son fee (out of the fee), where land is without the compass of a person's fee.

Hors-wealh, the wealh, or Briton who had the care of the king's horses.

Hors-weard, a service or corvée, consisting in watching the horses of the lord.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Horse-racing. By 13 Geo. II. c. 19, no plates or matches at horse-races, under 50*l.* value, could be run, under penalty of 200*l.* to be paid by the owner of the horse or horses, and 100*l.* by the advertiser of the plate. This was repealed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 5.

Formerly wagers of not more than 10*l.* on a legal horse race could be recovered by action, but now all wagers are void. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 5. As to the sale of horses, see 31 Eliz. c. 12.

Horstilers, innkeepers.

Hospes generalis, a great chamberlain.

Hospitallers, the knights of a religious order, so called, because they built an hospital at Jerusalem, wherein pilgrims were received. All their lands and goods in England were given to the Sovereign, by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 34.

Hospitals, eleemosynary corporations. They are either aggregate, in which the master or warden and his brethren have the estate of inheritance, or sole, in which the master, &c. only has the estate in him, and the brethren or sisters, having college and common-seal in them, must consent, or the master alone has the estate, not having college or common-seal. They are either eligible, donative, or presentative.

Any person seised of an estate in fee-simple may, by deed enrolled in Chancery, erect and found an hospital for the sustenance and relief of the poor, to continue for ever, and place such heads, &c. therein as he shall think fit; and such hospital shall be incorporated and subject to such visitors, &c. as the founder shall nominate; also such corporations have power to take and purchase lands, not exceeding 200*l.* per annum, so as the same be not holden of the Crown, and to make leases for twenty-one years, retaining the accustomed yearly rent. But no hospital is to be erected, unless upon the foundation it be endowed with lands or hereditaments of the clear yearly value of 20*l.* per annum, 39 Eliz. c. 5, perpetuated by 21 Jac. I. c. 1, s. 1. Any goods and chattels, real or personal, may be taken, of what value soever. 5 Reeves, 23. See CHARITABLE USES, and CHARITIES.

Hospiticide [fr. hospes, Lat., guest, and cædo, to kill], one that kills his guest or host.

Hospitium, procuration or visitation-money.

Hospodar, a Turkish governor in Moldavia or Wallachia.

Hostage, a person given up to an enemy as a security for the performance of the articles of a treaty, &c.

Hostelagium, a right to have lodging and entertainment, reserved by lords, in their tenants' houses.—Old Records.

Hosteler, or Hostler, an innkeeper.

Hostels, the inns of court.

Hosterium, a hoe.

Hostes sunt qui nobis vel quibus nos bellum decerninus; cæteri proditores vel prædones sunt. 7 Co. 24.—(Enemies are those with whom we declare war, or who declare it against us; all others are traitors or pirates.)

Hosticide, one who kills an enemy.

Hostilaria, Hospitalaria, a place or room in religious houses used for the reception of guests and strangers.

Hostilarius, an hospitaller.

Hostricus, a goshawk.

Hot-water-ordeal. This was a test, in cases of accusation, by hot water; the party accused and suspected being appointed by the judge to put his arms up to the elbows in seething hot water, which, after sundry prayers and invocations, he did, and was, by the effect which followed, judged faulty or faultless.—Verst. Rest. Dec. Intel. 66.

Hotchpot [fr. haché en poche, Fr., a confused mingling of divers things], a blending or mixing of lands and chattels, answering in some respects to the collatio bonorum of the civil law.

As to lands, it only applies to such as are given in frank-marriage, thus: if one daughter have an estate given with her in frank-marriage by her ancestor, then, if lands descend from the same ancestor to her and her sisters in fee-simple (not in fee-tail), she or her heirs shall have no share in them, unless they will agree to divide the lands so given in frank-marriage, in equal proportions with the rest of the lands descending, i. e. bringing her lands so given into hotchpot.

As to personalty. The Statute of Distributions intended children to take equal shares of the goods and chattels of their intestate ancestor and it considers that there may be some of the children who have previously received a portion or advancement, but not so much as to make up their full share; in that case, such child so advanced but in part, is allowed so much more out of the intestate's personal estate as will suffice to make his share equal to that of the other children. The act takes nothing away that has been given to any of the children, however unequal that may have been. How much soever that may exceed the remainder of the personal estate left by the intestate at his death, the child may, if he please, keep it all; if he be not content, but would have more, then he must bring into hotchpot what he has before received. This principle is based upon the equitable doctrine of equality, for it is perfectly coincident with that conduct which a good and just parent would pursue towards all his children. See 1 Step. Com. 353, and 2 Ibid. 225, 227.

Housage, a fee paid for housing goods by a carrier.

Housebote, estovers, or an allowance of necessary timber out of the lord's wood for the repairing or support of a house or tent.

House-breaking. See BURGLARY.

House-burning. See ARSON.

House of Commons, one of the constituent parts of Parliament, being the assembly of knights of shires, or the representatives of counties; citizens, or the representatives of cities; and burgesses, or the representatives of boroughs.

The following is a statement of the entire representation of the three kingdoms, composing the House of Commons:

ENGLAND AND WALES.

160 knights of shires,
338 citizens and burgesses, including the members for the universities.

Total 498

SCOTLAND.

30 knights of shires,
23 citizens and burgesses.

Total 53

IRELAND.

64 knights of shires,
41 citizens and burgesses, including the members for Trin. Col., Dublin.

Total 105

Total of the United Kingdom, 656.

The property-qualification of Members of Parliament is abolished by 21 Vict. c. 26. Members of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Trinity College, Dublin, eldest sons or heirs apparent of peers or of persons qualified to be knights of the shire, never required a qualification. In Scotland, no qualification was ever necessary.

Aliens are not eligible as members, neither are minors, lunatics, English or Scotch peers; but Irish peers, unless representative, may sit for any place in Great Britain. The English, Scotch, and Irish Judges (except the Master of the Rolls in England, when not a peer), are disqualified. Also the holders of various offices particularized by statute, Government contractors, clergymen, and bankrupts.—2 Step. Com.; 348, et seq.

House of Correction, a species of gaol which does not fall under the sheriff's charge, but is governed by a keeper, wholly independent of that office.

Houses of Correction, first established in the reign of Elizabeth, were originally designed for the penal confinement (after conviction) of paupers and vagrants refusing to work; but by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 38, ss. 3, 4, reciting that great inconvenience and expense had been found to result from the practice of committing to the common gaol, where it happens to be remote from the place of trial, it is enacted that a justice of the peace, or coroner, may commit for safe custody, to any house of correction situate near the place where the assizes or sessions are to be held; and that offenders sentenced in those courts may be committed, in execution of such sentence, to any house of correction for the county.—3 Step. Com. 234. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 91; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, ss. 20, 21.

House Duty, a tax on inhabited houses imposed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, in lieu of window-duty, which is abolished. See HOUSE-TAX.

House of Lords, a constituent part of Parliament, being composed of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal.

Archbishops and bishops held a prominent place in the great Saxon council, and under the Norman Kings they still retained it. They have always had a seat in the House of Lords, but by what right is not agreed. In the Saxon times there is no doubt that they sat as bishops, by virtue of their ecclesiastical office; but it is said that 'William the Conqueror thought proper to change the spiritual tenure of frank-almoign or free-alms, by virtue of which the bishops held their lands under the Saxon government, into the feudal or Norman tenure by barony; and in right of succession to those baronies, which were unalienable from their respective dignities, the bishops and abbots were allowed their seats in the House of Lords' (1 Bl. Com. 156). Mr. Hallam thinks this view of the rights of the English hierarchy too contracted, and maintains that the bishops of William the Conqueror were entitled to sit in his councils by the general custom of Europe, which invited the superior ecclesiastics to such offices, and by the common law of England, which the Conqueror did not overturn (Middle Ages, vol. iii. p. 6). Another view of the question is, that the abbots only had a seat in Parliament solely by virtue of their tenures as barons; but that the bishops sat in another capacity, as bishops and as barons (Hody's Treat. on Convocations, 126.) Their presence in Parliament, however, has been uninterrupted, whatever changes may have been effected in the nature of their tenure.

The lords temporal are divided into dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons. The number of British peerages of different ranks has been greatly augmented from time to time, and there is no limitation to the power of the Crown to add to it by fresh creation. The following table will show pretty correctly the present number of each class:

Lords Spiritual:
- 2 English archbishops,
- 24 English bishops (the Bishop of Sodor and Man and the junior bishop do not sit. See 10 & 11 Vict. c. 108, s. 2).
- 1 Irish representative archbishop,
- 3 Irish representative bishops.

Total 30

Lords Temporal:
- 3 princes of the royal blood,
- 20 dukes,
- 19 marquesses,
- 110 earls,
- 22 viscounts,
- 211 barons,
- 16 representative peers of Scotland,
- 28 representative peers of Ireland, one of whom is an English peer.

Total of the House of Lords, 459.

The House of Lords is the Supreme Court of Judicature in the kingdom, the appeal tribunal in the last resort, having no original jurisdiction over causes, but only upon appeals and proceedings in error, to rectify any injustice or mistake of the law, committed by the courts below.—2 Step. Com. 342; 3 Hallam's Constit. Hist. c. xiii., p. 17, et seq., 8th ed. As to Scottish appeals, see 4 Geo. IV. c. 85; and Irish appeals, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 67, art. 8.

The following are exceptions to the rule: an appeal from the Court of Stannaries in Cornwall, is to the Warden of the Stannaries, and from him to the Privy Council of the Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall; and if there be no Prince of Wales, it is to the Queen in Council.

An appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of Lancaster is to the Chancellor of the Duchy Court at Westminster.

An appeal from the Lord Chancellor in idiocy or lunacy is to the Queen in Council.

An appeal from the Ecclesiastical, Maritime, or Prize Courts in England, and from the courts in Man, Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, Alderney, or from the colonies, is to the Queen in Council.

An appeal from a court-martial is to the Queen in person.

In the text-books and reports, the abbreviation D. P. or Dom. Proc., is met with. It means a case decided by the House of Lords; both of these abbreviations standing for Domus Procerum, the House of Lords.

House-tax, an assessed tax, which was abolished by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 19. See HOUSE-DUTY.

Householder [paterfamilias, Lat.], an occupier of a house; a master of a family.

Howe, a hill.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Hredige, readily, quickly.

Hudegeld. See HIDGELD.

Hue and Cry [fr. huer, Fr. to shout; crier, to cry aloud; hutesium et clamor, Lat.], the old common law process of pursuing with horn and with voice all felons and such as have dangerously wounded another. It may be raised by constables, or by private persons, or by both. If, in a hue and cry, the constable or peace officer concur in the pursuit, he has the same powers, protection, and indemnification as if acting under a magistrate's warrant. Indeed, all those who join in following upon a hue and cry that has been raised, and that whether a constable be present or not, will be justified in the apprehension of the person pursued, even though it should ultimately turn out that he is innocent, or that no felony has been committed; and where the person pursued has taken refuge in a house, may break open the door to secure him, if admittance be refused. But if a man wantonly or maliciously raise a hue and cry, without cause, he is liable to fine and imprisonment, and also liable to an action at the suit of the party injured. The 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 28, provides for compensation and expenses in such cases, in order to encourage the apprehension of felons.—4 Bl. Com. 293, and 4 Step. Com. 431. As to the mode of raising the hue and cry, see Hawk. l. 2, c. xii., s. 6. The term is also applied to a paper circulated by order of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, announcing the perpetration of offences.

Huisserium, a ship used to transport horses. Also termed uffer.

Huissier, an usher of a court.

Hulka, a hulk, or small vessel.

Hullus, a hill.

Humagium, a moist place.

Hundred, a subdivision of the country, the nature of which is not known with certainty. In the Dialogus de Scaccario, it is said that a hundred 'ex hydarum aliquot centenariis, sed non determinatis constat; quidam enim ex pluribus, quidam ex paucioribus constat.' Some accounts make it consist of precisely a hundred hides; others, of a hundred tithings, or of a hundred free families. Certain it is, that whatever may have been its original organization, the hundred, at the period when it became known to us, differed greatly as to extent in the several parts of England. This division is ascribed to King Alfred, and he may possibly have introduced it into England, though in Germany it dates from a very remote period, where it was established among the Franks in the sixth century. In the capitularies of Charlemagne we meet with it in the form known among us.—Capit. l. 3, c. x.

To the statement that Alfred was the author of this division in England, it may be objected that the hundred is named in the Penitential of Egbert, but this objection is not fatal. It is there mentioned in the rubric only, to which it seems attached as an afterthought, and does not appear in the text, between which and the rubric there is little accordance; and, moreover, it is evident from its dialect, that the Penitential has not reached us in its original state, being bereft of every vestige of its Northumbrian origin, and, in its present dress, is most probably much later than the time of Alfred.—See Domesday, vol. i., p. 185; 1 Step. Com. 129.

Hundred Court, a larger court-baron, being held for all the inhabitants of a particular hundred, instead of a manor. The free suitors are here also the judges, and the steward the registrar, as in the case of a court-baron. It is not a court of record; it resembles a court-baron in all points, except that in point of territory it is of a greater jurisdiction. It was denominated hæreda in the Gothic constitution. Causes are removed by the same writ as from a court-baron, and its proceedings may be reviewed by writ of false judgment. The court is become obsolete.—3 Step. Com. 392.

Hundred-fecta, the performance of suit and service at the hundred court.

Hundred-fetena, dwellers or inhabitants of a hundred.

Hundred-lagh, or Hundred-law, a hundred-court.

Hundred-penny, the hundredfeh, or tax collected by the sheriff or lord of an hundred.

Hundredes earldor, Hundredes man [aldermannus hundreti], the presiding officer in the hundred-court.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hundredors, men of a hundred; persons serving on juries, or fit to be empannelled thereon for trials, dwelling within the hundred where the cause of action arose.

The statute now in force, by which hundredors are liable for damages done by rioters, is the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 31. The 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27, repeals all the prior statutes relative to such liability. Hundredors are now no longer, as formerly, liable in cases of robbery, arson, killing or maiming cattle, cutting down or destroying trees, destroying turnpikes or works on navigable rivers, cutting hop-bines, destroying corn to prevent it being exported, destroying corn going to market, or injuring horses or carriages so conveying it, and wounding revenue officers; they are, in short, only now liable for damage done by rioters acting feloniously. A plaintiff cannot proceed by action, unless his loss exceed 30*l.*; for a loss amounting to that sum or under, his remedy is by summary proceedings before justices at a special petty sessions. Previously to the commencement of an action, the plaintiff or his servant having the care of the property injured, must, within seven days after the commission of the offence, go before some near resident justice, and state on his oath the names of the offenders, and submit to an examination, and enter into a recognizance to prosecute. This examination must take place within seven days, exclusively of the day on which the offence was committed; the action must be brought within three calendar months after the committing of the offence, exclusive of the day the offence was committed. The writ should be served upon the high constable, or one of the high constables of the hundred, who should, within seven days after service, give notice of it to two justices residing near and acting for the hundred. Any of the hundredors are competent witnesses on the trial. The mode of execution is provided for by the 6th sec. of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 31. As to compensation by hundredors for the plunder, &c., of wrecks, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 477.

Hurdereferst, a domestic; one of a family.

Hurdle, a sledge used to draw traitors to execution.

Hurst, Hyrst, Herst, Hirst, a wood or grove of trees.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Hurtardus, Hurtus, a ram, or wether.

Husband of a Ship. See SHIP'S HUSBAND.

Husband, or Husbond [fr. hus, A. S., a house, and bindan, A. S., to bind, as domûs vinculum, one bound by rules, Spel., Skin., and Bosw.; or fr. hus and bonda, A. S., Somm. and Skin.; or fr. buend, A. S., or Bonda Dan, an occupier, Jun., being the pres. part. of bya, byan, bugian, habitare incolere, and rendered by manens in the Latin charters, as Palg. states], a married man; the good man of the house.

Husband and Wife [baron and feme], one of the great relationships of private life effected by marriage, by which the legal existence of a wife is incorporated with that of her husband.

The common law treats them, for most purposes, as one person, therefore a husband cannot make a grant to his wife at the common law, but he may do so: (1) under the Statute of Uses, by granting an estate to another person for her use; (2) by creating a trust in her favor; (3) by the custom of particular places; (4) by surrendering copyholds to her use; and (5) by will. If an estate be limited to them, they do not take as joint tenants, but the entirety is in each; neither can alien to the other.

The custody of the wife's person belongs of right to her husband; but if he, by ill-usage or threat, place her life or person in danger, she may obtain sureties to keep the peace either from a justice of the peace, the Sessions, the Court of Queen's Bench, or the Lord Chancellor, by articles of the peace and supplicavit. She may obtain a habeas corpus, at her own instance, if under improper restraint, though not at the instance of others, to enable her to make a will or an appointment of her property. If a wife be taken away or harboured, she may be retaken, or the husband may issue a habeas corpus, or bring an action for her detention. He may justify the defence of his wife by force; and when her life or person is endangered, he may even kill the assailant. If he were to detect anyone in criminal intercourse with her, flagrante delicto, his instant killing him would, at most, but constitute manslaughter.

The extent of a husband's rights in his wife's property, not settled or separated in her sole favor, may be thus epitomized:—

(a) A husband by the marriage acquires an absolute right to all his wife's personal property, in her actual and beneficial possession at the time, or capable of immediate and tangible possession, or which may come into actual possession during the coverture, all or any part of which he may assign and dispose of at his own pleasure. With regard to personalty in expectancy, or a chose en action, he may acquire a right thereto, either by a prenuptial agreement, or by receiving it without suit, or by resorting to the proper legal remedy in his own name alone, if he like, should the property have devolved upon her during marriage, but if she were possessed of it before marriage, then by joining her in the proceedings and thus reducing it into possession during the marriage. Should a chose en action be outstanding, and not in actual possession, when the marriage is dissolved by the death of either of them, then, if the wife be the survivor, she will be entitled to such property with all its accrued profits, against her husband's representatives; but should the husband survive, he has an absolute right to administer to his wife's effects in the Probate Court, in order to obtain it; for he would not be entitled to it, jure mariti, by virtue of the gift by marriage, and therefore he takes this property subject to the claims of his deceased wife's antenuptial creditors. If he do not take out letters of administration, he is entitled to any surplus which may remain after satisfying the wife's debts. If, however, he die before obtaining possession of the property by virtue of an administration, his legatees or next of kin will then be beneficially entitled, and will be allowed to administer, even where the husband did not himself administer.

(b) After the 31st day of December, 1857, it shall be lawful for every married woman by deed to dispose of every future or reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent, of such married woman or her husband in her right in any personal estate whatsoever to which she shall be entitled under any instrument made after the said 31st day of December, 1857 (except such a settlement as after mentioned), and also to release or extinguish any power which may be vested in or limited or reserved to her in regard to any such personal estate, as fully and effectually as she could do if she were a feme sole, and also to release and extinguish her right or equity to a settlement out of any personal estate to which she, or her husband in her right, may be entitled in possession under any such instrument as aforesaid, save and except that no such disposition, release, or extinguishment shall be valid, unless the husband concur in the deed by which the same shall be effected, nor unless the deed be acknowledged by her in the manner required by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to any reversionary interest to which she shall become entitled by virtue of any deed, will, or instrument, by which she shall be restrained from alienating or affecting the same (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57, ss. 1 & 2). Provided always that the powers of disposition given to a married woman by this act shall not interfere with any power which independently of this act may be vested in or limited or reserved to her so as to prevent her from exercising such power in any case, except so far as by any disposition made by her under this act she may be prevented from so doing in consequence of such power having been suspended or extinguished by such disposition (s. 3). Provided always that the powers of disposition hereby given to a married woman shall not enable her to dispose of any interest in personal estate settled upon her by any settlement or agreement for a settlement made on the occasion of her marriage, (s. 4).

them, even without her concurrence, and without any consideration if he like, and this though the property be held in trust for her benefit, as long as it is not settled to her separate use, or by a creditor of his selling them under an execution during his life; for otherwise the wife surviving him will at once have an absolute right thereto, by virtue of her antenuptial ownership, notwithstanding any will or disposition he may have made of them, to take effect after his decease. Should the husband, however, survive, such property belongs to him absolutely, in his marital right, without anything further being done by him.

(e) With regard to land limited to the wife, and her heirs, during the life of a third person (technically called a freehold pur autre vie), it will go to her heir-at-law, upon her death, and the husband would be excluded; but should such lands be limited to the wife, her executors and administrators, or to the wife alone, without adding her representatives, either real or personal, it will then devolve upon the husband-survivor for the remainder of the life of such third person, who is styled the cestui que vie, on his taking out letters of administration to his deceased wife's effects, subject, however, to the claims of the wife's antenuptial creditors.

(f) A wife acquires a right to her paraphernalia, making an exception to the rule, that the whole of her personal chattels vests absolutely in her husband.

A wife's paraphernalia consist of the clothing and ornaments which she possessed at the time of the marriage, or which have been given to her by her husband during the marriage, and which are suitable to her condition in life.

The respective rights of husband and wife in paraphernal property are these: the husband may, during the marriage, sell them or give them away; they may be seized by his creditors, but his power over them ceases at his death, for he cannot bequeath them; the wife has merely the use of them during the marriage, subject to the husband's power over them, and therefore she cannot dispose of them; but after his decease, she is entitled to them as her absolute property, and may claim them or their value as a debt owing from his estate, a claim which, although postponed till after his debts are paid, is yet preferred to legacies.

A wife's right to her paraphernalia may be barred by settlement, or by her acquiescence in a limited bequest of them to her by her husband's will; but this bequest she may repudiate, and stand upon her legal absolute right to them.

(g) A wife may make a will, with her husband's particular permission, of her unsettled personal property, for such permission waives his marital right to it. He should consent to such will, when it is proved, for his previous permission is revocable at any time before probate. Should he once act under the will, or agree to it after her death, he cannot afterwards retract. Should he die before his wife, it is a partial revocation of such will, and unless she make another, she will be held to have died intestate. Such a will, however, will be valid, so far as her separate estate is concerned, or so far as she was empowered to make a will without his assent, as executrix, or under a power. In all such cases, however, it will be better to make a new will.

The general rule is that a husband is not bound by his wife's contracts, unless they are made by his authority, express or implied. If any articles are supplied to the wife which are not necessaries, the legal presumption is, that the husband did not assent to his wife's contract; but it is contrariwise if they be necessaries. Any person supplying a married woman with goods is bound, therefore, at his peril, to ascertain whether they are necessaries, and whether she is acting under her husband's authority, for a husband is not liable on his wife's contracts, if the subjects of them are beyond his station and circumstances in society, unless by his express consent. Where a separation has ensued in consequence of the wife's adultery, whether it be by a decree of judicial separation, or by the voluntary elopement of the wife, or by expulsion from her husband's house, he is not responsible even for the necessaries of life furnished to her. So if a wife, though not guilty of adultery, elope from her husband without sufficient cause. So if they be separated, provided the husband duly pays her an adequate allowance; for otherwise he would be liable.—Story on Contracts, 46.

As to actions, wherever their cause would survive to the wife, she and her husband ought to join in suing; but where they arise during coverture, the husband may sue alone or jointly with her. In any action brought by a man and his wife for an injury done to the wife, in respect of which she is necessarily joined as co-plaintiff, it shall be lawful for the husband to add thereto claims in his own right, and separate actions brought in respect of such claims may be consolidated, if the court or a judge shall think fit. Provided that in the case of the death of either plaintiff such suit, so far only as relates to the causes of action, if any, which do not survive, shall abate.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 40. In bringing actions against husband and wife, the general rule is, that whenever the cause of action would survive against the wife, they ought to be sued jointly. 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1241.

In the Roman Civil Law, the husband and wife are considered as two distinct persons, and may have separate estates, contracts, debts, and injuries; and may also, by agreement with each other, have a community of interest in the nature of a partnership.

In courts of Equity, although the principles of law as to husband and wife are fully recognised and enforced in proper cases, yet they are not exclusively considered. On the contrary, equity, for many purposes, treats the husband and wife as the civil law treats them, as distinct persons, capable (in a limited sense) of contracting with each other, of suing each other, and of having separate estates, debts, and interests. A wife may, in a court of equity, sue her husband, and be sued by him. And in cases respecting her separate estate, she may also be sued without him; although he is ordinarily required to be joined for the sake of conformity to the rule of law, as a nominal party, whenever he is within the jurisdiction of the court, and can be made a party.

Courts of equity will, in special cases, in furtherance of the manifest intentions and objects of the parties, carry into effect a contract made before marriage between husband and wife, though it could not be enforced at law. An agreement, therefore, entered into by husband and wife before marriage, for the mutual settlement of their estates, or of the estate of either upon the other, upon the marriage, even without the intervention of trustees, will be enforced in equity, although void at law; for equity will not suffer the intention of the parties to be defeated by the very act which is designed to give effect to such a contract. Even at law a bond given by a husband to his intended wife, upon a condition not to be performed in his lifetime (as for instance, to leave her at his death 1,000*l.*), would not be extinguished by the intermarriage; for marriage extinguishes such contracts only as are for debts or things which are due in præsenti or in futuro, or upon a contingency, which may occur during the coverture. But where the debt or thing cannot be due until after the coverture is dissolved, the contract is only suspended and not extinguished during the coverture. A fortiori, such an agreement would be specifically decreed in equity. In regard to contracts made between husband and wife after marriage, the principles of the common law pronounce them a mere nullity: yet although æquitas sequitur legem, it will, under particular circumstances, give full effect and validity to post-nuptial contracts. And a wife may become a creditor of her husband by acts and contracts during marriage; and her rights, as such, will be enforced against him and his representatives.

It is well known that the strict rules of the old common law would not permit a wife to take or enjoy any real or personal estate separate from or independent of her husband; and although these rules have been in some degree relaxed and modified in modern times, yet they have still a very comprehensive influence and operation at law. On the other hand, courts of equity have, for a great length of time, admitted the doctrine that a married woman is capable of taking real and personal estate to her own separate and exclusive use, and that she has also an incidental power of disposition over it. This may be effected by marriage articles, or by an actual settlement before marriage. And although, in strict propriety, the separate and exclusive use should be vested in trustees for her benefit (and this is usually done in regular and well considered settlements), yet it has for more than a century been established in equity, that the intervention of trustees is not indispensable, and that whenever real or personal property is given, devised, or settled upon a wife, either before or after marriage, for her separate and exclusive use, without the intervention of trustees, the intention of the parties shall be effectuated, and the wife's interest protected against the marital rights and claims of her husband. In all such cases the husband will be held to be a mere trustee for her. Wherever a trust is created, or a power is reserved by a settlement, to enable a wife after marriage to dispose of her separate property, either real or personal, it may be executed by her in the manner provided for, whether it be by deed or other writing, or by a will or appointment.

The principal, if not the sole, cases in which equity will interfere to secure to a wife her equity to a settlement, are: (1) where a husband seeks aid or relief from a court of equity in regard to her property; (2) where he makes an assignment of her equitable interests; (3) where she seeks the like relief, as plaintiff against her husband or his assignees, in regard to her equitable interests. But if a wife be already amply provided for under a prior settlement, the motive and ground for the interference of equity in her favor is removed. And her equity to a settlement may be lost or suspended by her own misconduct. — 2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 546; Roper on Husband and Wife. See EQUITY TO A WIFE'S SETTLEMENT and SEPARATE ESTATE.

A wife, if her husband is banished, or has abjured the realm, or has been transported for felony, may, both at law and in equity, maintain a suit in her own name as a feme sole, otherwise the husband must join in the suit. But, in equity, if a wife claim some rights in opposition to those claimed by her husband, and it becomes proper to vindicate her rights against him, a bill is filed for her by her next friend, with her consent. The husband may also, in certain cases, sue the wife. Generally, a wife must be joined with her husband as a defendant in a suit.—Story's Eq. Plead. 61.

As to Criminal law, if a wife commit a felony in her husband's presence, the law presumes that she acted under his immediate coercion, and excuses her from punishment, which presumption, however, may be rebutted by evidence; but if in the absence of her husband she commit an offence—even by his order or procurement—her coverture will be no excuse. Such a protection is not allowed in crimes which are mala in se, and prohibited by the law of nature, nor in such as are heinous in their character, or dangerous in their consequences; and therefore, if a married woman be guilty of treason, murder, or homicide, in company with and by coercion of her husband, she is punishable as if she were sole. A wife may, generally, be found guilty with her husband in all misdemeanors. But husband and wife cannot alone be found guilty of a conspiracy, because they are deemed to be one person in law, and are presumed to have but one will. If a wife incite her husband to the commission of a felony, she is an accessory before the fact; but she cannot be treated as an accessory for receiving her husband, knowing that he has committed a felony.—1 Hale, 45; 1 Hawk, c. i., ss. 9, 10, 11, 12; 1 Russ. 20.

The law of Evidence on this subject may be thus epitomized: —

On the trial of any issue joined, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any suit, action, or other proceeding in any court of justice, or before any person having by law or by consent of parties authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence, the husbands and wives of the parties thereto, and of the persons in whose behalf any such suit, action, or other proceeding may be brought or instituted, or opposed, or defended, shall, except as hereinafter excepted, be competent and compellable to give evidence, either viva voce or by deposition, according to the practice of the Court, on behalf of either or any of the parties to the said suit, action, or other proceeding.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, s. 1.

Nothing herein shall render any husband competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, or any wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against her husband, in any criminal proceeding, or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery (s. 2).

No husband shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, and no wife shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage (s. 3).

So much of s. 1 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85 as relates to husbands and wives is repealed by s. 4. See also 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99.

The following are exceptions in criminal proceedings:—

(1) If a woman be taken away by force and married, she may be a witness against her husband, if he is indicted under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, for she is not a wife de jure, a contract obtained by force having no obligation in law.

(2) On an indictment for a second marriage during the continuance of a former marriage, though the first wife or husband cannot be a witness, yet the second wife or husband may, after the proof of the first marriage.

(3) A wife may be a witness against her husband for an offence committed against her person.

(4) Upon an appeal against an order of bastardy, in the case of a married woman, Lord Hardwicke and the other judges held that she was a competent witness to prove her criminal connection with the appellant, though her husband was interested both in the question and in the event of the appeal; because such a fact, so secret in its nature, can scarce ever be proved by other evidence.

By the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, the courts of bankruptcy may summon the wife of any bankrupt, and examine her (after she shall have made and signed the necessary declaration), either by word of mouth or interrogatories in writing, for the finding out and discovery of the estate, goods, and chattels of such bankrupt, concealed, kept, or disposed of by such wife, in her own person, or by her own act, or by any other person; and she will incur such danger or penalty for not coming before the court, or for refusing to be sworn and examined, or for refusing to sign or subscribe her examination, or for not fully answering to the satisfaction of the court, as any other person.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 117, 118.

By the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 83, all parties to any proceedings in the county courts, their wives, and all other persons, may be examined on behalf of the plaintiffs or defendants, upon oath or affirmation.

By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 6, on a wife's petition to the Divorce Court for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery and cruelty, or of adultery and desertion, husband and wife are competent and compellable to give evidence of or relating to cruelty or desertion.

As to dissolution of marriage, judicial separation, nullity of marriage, protecting order, see the respective titles, and MARRIAGE.

Husbandry, farming; a man devoted to this pursuit is not to be called a farmer, but a husbandman.

Husbrece, burglary.

Huscarle, a menial servant.—Domesday.

Husfastne, he who holds house and land.

Husgable, house-rent or tax.

Hush-money, a bribe to hinder information; pay to secure silence.

Husting [fr. hus-thing, A.S.], council, court, tribunal; apparently so called from being held within a building, at a time when other courts were held in the open air. It was a local court. The county court in the city of London bears this name. There were hustings at York, Winchester, Lincoln, and in other places, similar to the London hustings.—Madox, Hist. Excheq. c. xx.

In these courts certain documents are enrolled, outlawries proclaimed, &c., and the elections of officers and parliamentary representatives take place. The raised place from which candidates for seats in Parliament address the constituency is called hustings.

Hutesium et Clamor (hue and cry).

Hutilan, taxes.

Hwata, Hwatung, augury, divination.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hybernagium, the season for sowing winter corn between Michaelmas and Christmas.

Hyd, hide, skin. See HIDE-GILD.

Hyd, a measure of land, containing at present a hundred acres, which quantity is also assigned to it in the Dialogus de Scaccarii. It seems, however, that the hide varied in different parts of the kingdom. See HIDE OF LAND.

Hydage. See HIDAGE.

Hynden, an association of ten men, first mentioned in In. 54, where it signifies the persons from among whom the consacramentals were to be chosen in the case of deadly feud. From Ath. V. iii. it appears that the members of the 'firth-guilds' (congildones) were formed into associations of ten, the enactment running thus: 'That we count ten men together, and let the senior direct the nine in all those things that are to be done; and then let them count their hyndens together, with one hynden-man who shall admonish the ten (i. e. the ten hyndens) for our common benefit.' Hence it would seem that the eleven who are to hold the money consisted of the senior of each hynden, together with the hynden-man who presided over the hynden of the hyndens, i. e. ten hyndens. The number XII. mentioned in Ath. V. viii. 1, is apparently an error for XI.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hypobolum, a legacy to a wife above her dower.—Civ. Law.

Hypothecation [fr. hypotheca, Civ. Law, a species of pledge in which the pledger retained possession of the thing pledged, as distinguished from pignus, where the possession was transferred to the pledgee. See Sand. Justin. 52, 227, 429; Smith's Dict. of Antiq., tit. 'Pignus'], the act of pledging a thing as security for a debt or demand without parting with the possession.

There are few cases, if any, in our law where an hypothecation, in the strict sense of the Roman law, exists. The nearest approaches, perhaps, are the cases of holders of bottomry-bonds, and of seamen to whom wages are due in the merchant service, who have a claim against the ship in rem. But these are rather cases of liens or privileges than strict hypothecations. There are also cases where mortgages of chattels are held valid, without any actual possession by the mortgagee, but they stand upon very peculiar grounds, and may be deemed exceptions to the general rule.

Hypotheque, the right acquired by the creditor over the immoveable property which has been assigned to him by his debtor as security for his debt, although he be not placed in possession of it.—Fr. Law.

Hyrnes [parochia, Lat.], parish.

Hysteropotmoi [Gk.], such as had been thought dead, and after a long absence in foreign countries returned safely home; or such as had been thought dead in battle, and afterwards unexpectedly escaped from their enemies and returned home. These, among the Romans, were not permitted to enter their own houses at the door, but were received at a passage opened in the roof.—Encyc. Lond.

Hysterotomy [fr. ὑστέρα, Gk., the womb, and τόμος, a section], the Cæsarian operation.

Hythe, a port or little haven at which to lade or unlade wares.

Ibi semper debet fieri triatio, ubi juratores meliorem possunt habere notitiam.—7 Co. 1.—(A trial should always be had there where the jury can get the better information.)

Ibidem, Ibid., Id. [Lat.] (in the same place or case).

Iceni, the ancient name for the people of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire.

Ich Dien (I serve), the motto of the Prince of Wales, first assumed by Edward the Black Prince, after he had slain John, King of Bohemia, at Cressy, whose motto it was originally. The Black Prince assumed it to show his subjection to his father, Edward III.

Icona, a figure or representation of a thing.

Ictus orbus, a maim, bruise, or swelling, without a solution of continuity.

Id certum est quod certum reddi potest; sed id magis certum est quod de semet ipso est certum.—9 Co. 47.—(That is certain which can be reduced to a certainty, but that is more certain which is certain on the face of it.)

Idem semper antecedenti proximo refertur.—Co. Litt. 685.—(The same is always referred to its next antecedent.)

Idem sonans (sounding alike). The courts will not interfere in setting aside proceedings on account of the misspelling of names, provided the variance is so trifling as not to mislead, or there is an idem sonans between the pronunciation of the right name and that which is inserted in the proceedings; as Lawrance instead of Lawrence, Reynell for Reynolds, Beneditto for Benedetto.—1 Cromp. and M. 806; 1 *Chitt. Identity of person. Cases have frequently arisen, both in civil and criminal courts, where the question at issue has been whether an individual was really the person whom he pretended or stated himself to be. When such cases present themselves, the difference of opinion that exists is generally of such a nature as to render the duty of the court trying and difficult. This subject is calculated to excite attention, to awaken discussion, and to cause great positiveness of opinion on either side. An examination of these cases will lead to the conclusion that considerable importance should be attached to physical signs. In all disputed cases, recommends Foderé, we should particularly notice mature formations or congenital marks. These cannot be removed. All wounds also of the soft parts leave marks of their existence. Scrofulous ulcers have their cicatrices; smallpox and burns have their marks. All peculiarities of physiognomy, profession, or trade, should be noted.—Beck's Med. Juris. 104.

Ides [fr. iduare, obs. Lat., to divide], a division of time among the Romans. In March, May, July, and October, the Ides were on the 15th of the month, in the remaining months, on the 13th.—Kenn. Antiq.; Smi. Clas. Antiq. This method of reckoning is still retained in the Chancery of Rome, and in the calendar of the breviary.

Idiots and Lunatics, persons incapable of contracting and transacting the ordinary business of life.

The administration of idiots' and lunatics' estates is, in virtue of personal authority given by the Crown, viz. a special commission under a warrant of the Queen's sign manual, countersigned by the Lords of the Treasury, not directed to the Court of Chancery, but to a certain great officer of the Crown, not of necessity the person who has the custody of the great seal, though it is generally given to him by a warrant from the Crown, in consideration of its being his duty as chancellor to issue the commissions on which the inquiry as to the facts of idiotcy or lunacy is to be obtained. It is said that the warrant confers no jurisdiction, but only a power of administration. This power is at present exercised by the Lord Chancellor and the two Lords Justices of Appeal by virtue of the royal sign manual.

The rules of equity and law are the same as to what amounts to insanity.

Insanity in its ordinary acceptation may be divided into:—(1) Mania, in which the delusion extends to all kinds of objects, and is accompanied with some excitement. (2) Monomania, or melancholy, in which the delusion is confined to a single object, or to a few objects. (3) Dementia, wherein the person is rendered incapable of reasoning, in consequence of functional disorder of the brain, not congenital (i. e. not born with the person). (4) Idiotism, congenital, from original mal-conformation of the brain.

The ancient theory on the subject of lunacy was that a person insane became so at particular changes of the moon, and that in the interval he would be rational. This is a notion, however, long since abandoned. 'Lunatic,' says Lord Hardwicke, 'is a technical word, coined in more ignorant times, as imagining these persons were affected by the moon; but it is discovered by philosophy and ingenious men, that it is entirely owing to a defect of the organs of the body.'

In the case of a lunatic the Crown is but a trustee of his estate, but in the case of an idiot the Crown is absolutely entitled to the profits, subject to the idiot's maintenance; but persons are seldom found idiots, but only non compotes mentis; and even when they are found idiots the Crown very rarely claims that interest in their property to which it is legally entitled.

A lunatic is never considered in law to be incurable.

It is exceedingly difficult to ascertain the lunacy of a person, where, instead of being marked and excessive, it is cunningly present in his mind; to determine the precise point at which mental health ceases, and incontrollable impulse begins; or to discriminate between acts which arise from violent temper or excessive passion, and acts which indicate a diseased obliquity of the volition and understanding. For what can be more alike than the anger of the sane and the insane; or than the maniac and the habitually passionate; or the melancholic and one accustomed to brood over his malignant and revengeful conceptions?

As to the nature and duration of a lucid interval:—

'It must not be a superficial tranquillity, a shadow of repose, but, on the contrary, a profound tranquillity, a real repose; it must be not a mere ray of reason, which only makes its absence more apparent when it is gone—not a flash of lightning, which pierces through the darkness only to render it more gloomy and dismal—not a glimmering which unites the night to the day; but a perfect light, a lively and continued lustre, a full and entire day, interposed between the two separate nights of the fury which precedes and follows it; and, to use another image, it is not a deceitful and faithless stillness which follows or forbodes a storm, but a sure and steadfast tranquillity for a time, a real calm, a perfect serenity; in fine, without looking for so many metaphors to represent our idea, it must be not a mere diminution, a remission of the complaint, but a kind of temporary cure, an intermission so clearly marked as in every respect to resemble the restoration of health. So much for its nature.

'And as it is impossible to judge in a moment of the quality of an interval, it is requisite that there should be a sufficient length of time for giving a perfect assurance of the temporary re-establishment of reason, which it is not possible to define in general, and which depends upon the different kinds of fury; but it is certain that there must be a time, and a considerable time. So much for its duration.'—Per D'Aguesseau, pleading in the case of the Prince de Conti and the Duchess of Nemours as to the insanity of the Abbé d'Orleans, 1696; 2 Poth. on Oblig. by Evans, 668.

When the question is whether an act was done lucido intervallo, which may be either by remission or intermission of the disease, it is not enough to show that the act was actus sapienti conveniens, for that may happen many ways; but it must be proved to be actus sapientis, and to proceed from judgment and deliberation, otherwise the presumption continues. See MENTAL ALIENATION.

The practice in lunacy is regulated by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, amended by 18 Vict. c. 13, and by 'The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, and the General Orders, Nov. 7, 1853.

In lieu of a Special Commission, a General Commission is issued to the two masters in lunacy, to inquire as to the lunacy of all persons whose cases shall be referred to them by the Lord Chancellor, under a separate order in each case (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, s. 39), obtainable upon petition.

The mode of inquiry without a jury as to lunatics in confinement, heretofore authorised by the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 95 (commonly known as Lord Ashley's Act), is discontinued, and the inquiry as to insanity is, in future, to be conducted in the same manner, whether the alleged lunatic be in confinement or not (ss. 53 & 54).

The inquiry takes place before a jury if the alleged lunatic, within seven days after notice has been given him of the petition for an inquiry, by notice signed by him, and attested by his solicitor, and filed with the registrar, or at the hearing of such petition, orally by himself, his counsel, or solicitor, or by petition to the Lord Chancellor, demands a jury, and the Lord Chancellor, after a personal examination of the alleged lunatic, is satisfied that he is mentally competent to form and express a wish for an inquiry before a jury; or if the Lord Chancellor, or master acting under the petition, is of opinion that such an inquiry is expedient (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, ss. 41, 42, 43, and Gen. Ord. 7–10, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, s. 6. The inquiry is to be confined to the question, whether or not the person who is the subject of it is at the time of such inquiry of unsound mind and incapable of managing himself or his affairs, and no evidence as to anything done or said by such person, or as to his demeanor or state of mind at any time being more than two years before the time of the inquiry, shall be receivable in proof of insanity on any such inquiry, or on the trial of any traverse of an inquisition, unless the judge or master shall otherwise direct (25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, s. 3), but inquiries as to previous dealings with the lunatic's property may after inquisition be gone into (Ord. 12). Whenever the Lord Chancellor shall order an inquiry before a jury, he may direct an issue to be tried in one of the superior courts of common law—the question in such issue to be whether the alleged insane person is of unsound mind and incapable of managing himself or his affairs (the provisions of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, with respect to commissions of lunacy and orders for inquiry to be tried by a jury, and the trial thereof and the constitution of the jury, to apply to such issue, &c.), and a verdict finding the alleged insane person to be of unsound mind, &c., shall have the same force as an inquisition under a commission of lunacy (25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, s. 4). Upon the trial of such issue the alleged insane person, if within the jurisdiction, is to be examined before any evidence is taken, and at the close of the proceedings before the jury consult as to their verdict, unless the presiding judge shall otherwise direct, and such examination shall take place in open court or in private, as the presiding judge shall direct (s. 6). No person shall be entitled to traverse any inquisition so made upon the oath of a jury, but the Lord Chancellor may, upon a petition presented within three months after the trial, order a new trial (s. 7). If it shall appear to the Lord Chancellor not expedient, or not for the benefit of the lunatic, that the commission should be superseded unconditionally, but that it should be superseded on terms and conditions, he may, upon the consent of the lunatic, &c., order it to be superseded on terms and conditions (s. 10). The Lord Chancellor may order the costs of, and incidental to the presentation of a petition for a commission, &c., to be paid, in whole or in part, either by the party presenting or opposing the petition, or out of the estate of the alleged lunatic (s. 11). When it is established to the satisfaction of the Lord Chancellor by the report of a master, or commissioner, in lunacy, or by affidavit, or otherwise, that a person is of unsound mind and incapable of managing his affairs, and that his property does not exceed 1,000*l.*, or that his annual income does not exceed 50*l.*, he may, without directing an inquiry under a commission of lunacy, after notice to the alleged lunatic, make such order as he may think expedient for the purpose of rendering the property or income of such person available for his maintenance or benefit, or for carrying on his trade or business (s. 12), and may order such property to be sold, charged, &c., and the proceeds to be paid to such person as he thinks fit, to be applied for the benefit of the insane person, his family, &c. (s. 13). When on the trial of an indictment the accused has been acquitted on the ground of insanity, the Lord Chancellor, on being satisfied by affidavit or otherwise of the continued insanity of such person, and that he is still in confinement, may make similar orders as to the application of his property (s. 15).

After inquisition, all applications as to the person and property of the lunatic may be entertained by the masters, and are to be submitted to them in the first instance; any person being at liberty, at any time, to carry the inquiry before the Lord Chancellor, but at his own risk as to costs (ss. 69 to 74, and Gen. Ord. 12 to 14). If objections be taken to the master's report, they are to be left with and proceeded on before the master, and any objections not removed are to be brought forward (without separate petition) on the hearing of the petition to confirm (ss. 93 & 94). If there be no objections remaining to the master's report, it is to be submitted to the Lord Chancellor for confirmation, without petition, and without the attendance of parties; and the Lord Chancellor's fiat on the report will give to it the operation of an order made upon petition; and, in all those cases, the report will contain the necessary consequential directions (ss. 95 & 96).

Should the Lord Chancellor see fit to have any matter heard before him, either before or after a report from the master, it will be brought before him by petition, as heretofore (s. 97).

The General Orders made under the Act embody the common provisions and directions in particular orders. By this means, unnecessary repetition in reports and orders will be avoided (s. 98, and Gen. Ord. 34 to end).

And it is provided that 'affidavits, petitions, and other documents brought into the offices of the masters or registrar shall not contain unnecessary recitals, or statements of proceedings or documents previously taken or used in the matter; and the taxing-masters shall look into all such affidavits, petitions, and other documents as aforesaid, and deal in such manner as to them seems just, with the costs of any affidavit, petition, or other document appearing to them to be unnecessary or improper, in the whole or in part, or of unnecessary length' (s. 89).

The order of the Lord Chancellor appointing a committee will have the force of a grant of custody, and that very expensive document is dispensed with; and the security is taken by the masters, instead of her Majesty's attorney-general (ss. 62, 63, and Gen. Ord. 36).

The committeeship may survive among several committees, if the master shall so approve; and in that case, the security will be taken accordingly (s. 66).

Enlarged powers are given to the Lord Chancellor for dealing with the real and leasehold estate of the lunatic, for various purposes, and for providing, among others—

For charging the estate with the expenses of any permanent improvements of the lunatic's estate (s. 118).

Also for selling the lunatic's land for building purposes (s. 125). And for granting mining leases (ss. 130, 131, & 132, and 18 Vict. c. 13). Powers are also given to the Lord Chancellor and the masters, for regulating the inquiries as to next of kin, and for fixing, or dispensing with, the attendance of next of kin (ss. 75 to 82, and Gen. Ord. 22 & 23).

The dividends are to be invested by the accountant-general without request, as in Chancery (Gen. Ord. 16).

The certificate of the master (without confirmation by the court) is to have the effect of an order in some classes of cases, of which the following are the principal :—

For payment of money or transfer of stock of the lunatic into court, whether to the credit of the lunacy generally, or to a particular or separate account in the lunacy (s. 64, and Gen. Ord. 20).

For the receipt, or delivery out, of deeds or securities, or for the payment of money or transfer of stock of the lunatic into court for the purpose of reducing the security, or for any other reason (s. 65, and Gen. Ord. 20).

For payment or transfer of money or stock of an approved committee into court in lieu of security (s. 64, and Gen. Ord. 20).

For the investment of cash standing in the name of the accountant-general (Gen. Ord. 16).

For opening and delivering out the will of the lunatic on his death (s. 84).

For the taxation and allowance of the costs of certain proceedings before them ; and

For disallowing the costs of any proceeding or document. The costs of counsel attending in the master's office are not to be allowed, unless the master shall consider such attendance necessary, and for the lunatic's benefit (ss. 72 & 88, and Gen. Ord. 48).

The percentage formerly paid into the Lunatics' Visitors' Fund is discontinued, and a graduated percentage on incomes amounting to 100*l.* and upwards, ranging from four per cent. on the smaller to two per cent. on the larger incomes (but in no instance to exceed 200*l.*), is charged on lunatics' estates; and in lieu of fees heretofore payable, fees of 2*l.* for each order, 1*l.* for such report or certificate, and 1*l.* for every attendance of a clerk in court, are fixed (ss. 26 & 29). The percentage and fees are to be collected by stamps, as in Chancery, except where the percentage is carried over by the accountant-general from the particular lunacy to the fee fund, which will be done where there is cash at the accountant-general's, arising from income available for the purpose (ss. 29 & 31, and Gen. Ord. 27–33). For copies and engrossments, the stationer's charge only is to be paid (s. 29). Other alterations are introduced in the law and practice in matters of minor importance, which will be seen on reference to the Act and Orders. And see Elmer's Lunacy Prac. As to actions by or against idiots and lunatics, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1256.

Idoneum se facere ; idoneare se, to purge one's self by oath of a crime of which one is accused.

Idoneus homo (a proper man). He is legally said to be idoneus homo who has honesty, knowledge, and ability.

Id perfectum est quod ex omnibus suis partibus constat ; et nihil perfectum est dum aliquid restat agendum.—9 Co. 9.—(That is perfect which is complete in all its parts; and nothing is perfect whilst anything remains to be done.)

Id possumus quod de jure possumus.—Lane, 116.—(We may do only that which by law we are allowed to do.)

Id quod est magis remotum, non trahit ad se quod est magis junctum, sed è contrario in omni casu.—Co. Litt. 164.—(That which is more remote does not draw to itself that which is nearer, but on the contrary in every case.)

Idumanus fluvius, Black Water in Essex.

Ifungia, the finest white bread, formerly called cocked bread.—Blount.

Ignis judicium, the old judicial trial by fire.

Ignitegium [fr. ignis, Lat., fire, and tego, to cover], the curfew.—Encyc. Lond.

Ignoramus (we are ignorant). The word formerly written on a bill of indictment by a grand jury when they rejected it; the phrase now used is ' not a true bill,' or ' not found.'

Ignorantia eorum quæ quis scire tenetur non excusat.—Hale's Pl. Cr. 42.—(Ignorance of those things which one is bound to know, excuses not.)

Ignorantia facti excusat, ignorantia juris non excusat.—1 Co. 177.—(Ignorance of the fact excuses; ignorance of the law excuses not.)

Every man must be taken to be cognizant of the law; otherwise there is no saying to what extent the excuse of ignorance may not be carried. It is, therefore, a rule—1st, that money paid with full knowledge of the facts, but through ignorance of the law, is not recoverable, if there be nothing against conscience in retaining it; and, 2ndly, that money paid in ignorance of the facts is recoverable, provided there have been no laches in the party paying it.—2 Smith's L. C. 327.

In criminal cases this maxim applies, when a man intending to do a lawful act does that which is unlawful. For there is not that conjunction between the deed and the will which is necessary to establish a criminal act; but, in order that he may stand excused, there must be an ignorance or mistake of fact, and not an error in point of law; for a mistake in point of law, which every person of discretion not only may but is bound and presumed to know, is no sort of defence.—4 Bl. Com. 27.

Ignorantia judicis est calamitas innocentis.—2 Inst. 591.—(The ignorance of a judge is the misfortune of the innocent.)

Ignoratis terminis ignoratur et ars.—Co. Litt. 2.—(The terms being unknown, the art also is unknown.)

Ilet, a little island.

Illegal conditions, all those that are impossible or contrary to law, immoral, or repugnant to the nature of the transaction. See CONDITION.

Illegal considerations. See CONSIDERATION.

Illegal contract, an agreement to do any act forbidden by the law, or to omit to do any act enjoined by the law.

Illegal contracts have been divided into 1st, contracts which violate the common law; subdivided into

(α) Contracts void on account of fraud, which may be either

(a) Misrepresentation.

(b) Concealment.

(β) Contracts void on account of immorality.

(γ) Contracts in violation of public policy, which may be

(a) In restraint of trade.

(b) In restraint of marriage.

(c) Marriage-brokerage contracts.

(d) Wagers.

(e) Contracts to offend against law, &c.

(f) Trading with an enemy without license.

2nd, Contracts which violate any statute provisions.—Story on Contracts, 102.

Illegitimacy. See NATURAL CHILD.

Illeviable, a debt or duty that cannot or ought not to be levied.

Illicit, unlawful.

Illicite, unlawfully.

Illicitum Collegium (an illegal corporation).

Illocable, incapable of being placed out or hired.—Bailey.

Illud, quod alias licitum non est, necessitas facit licitum; et necessitas inducit privilegium quoad jura privata.—Bac. Max.—(That which is otherwise not permitted, necessity permits; and necessity makes a privilege as to private rights.)

Illud, quod alteri unitur, extinguitur, neque ampliùs per se vacare licet.—Godolph. Rep. Can. 169.—(That which is united to another is extinguished, nor can it be any more independent.)

Illusory Appointment Act, 1 Wm. IV. c. 46. This statute enacts that no appointment made after its passing (July 16, 1830), in exercise of a power to appoint property real or personal among several objects, shall be invalid, or impeached in equity on the ground that an unsubstantial, illusory, or nominal share only was thereby appointed, or left unappointed, to devolve upon any one or more of the objects of such power; but that the appointment shall be valid in equity as at law. It provides that the act shall not prejudice any provision in any deed, will, or other instrument, declaring the amount from which no object of the power shall be excluded.

Imagine, to entertain or contemplate.

Iman, Imam, or Imaum, a Mohammedan prince having supreme spiritual as well as temporal power; a regular priest of the mosque.

Imbargo. See EMBARGO.

Imbasing of money, mixing the species with an alloy below the standard of sterling.—1 Hale's P. C. 102.

Imbezzle. See EMBEZZLE.

Imbracery. See EMBRACERY.

Imbrocus, a brook, gutter, or water-passage.

Immaterial averment, an unnecessary statement.

Immaterial issue, an issue upon a point or ground unfit to decide the action.—Step. Plead. 142.

Immediate execution. See SPEEDY EXECUTION.

Immemorial usage, a practice which has existed time out of mind; custom; prescription.

Immoral contracts, all contracts founded upon considerations contra bonos mores, are void. Ex turpi contractu non oritur actio. But where a contract, founded upon an immoral consideration, has been executed, neither law nor equity will interfere to set it aside, if both parties have been equally in fault, for in pari delicto, potior est conditio defendentis.

Yet, a sealed contract, made in consideration of past seduction and cohabitation, or past cohabitation without seduction, can be enforced; not merely because it is binding in honor and conscience, for such a reason is not legally sufficient, but because a specialty imports a consideration, which, if legal, both parties thereto are estopped from denying.—1 Vern. 483; 2 Wils. 339.

Immoveable, not to be forced from its place; the characteristic of things real, or land.

Immunity, exemption.

Impalare, to put in a pound.

Impanel, or Impannel, the writing and entering of the names of a jury in a parchment-schedule by the sheriff.

Impargamentum, the right of impounding the cattle.

Imparl, to have license to settle a litigation amicably, to obtain delay for adjustment.

Imparlance [fr. licentia loquendi, Lat.], time to plead; also when a court gives a party leave to answer or plead at another time, without the assent of the other party. Abolished by r. 31 T. T. 1853. And see 2 Wm. IV. c. 39.

Imparsonee, a clergyman inducted into a benefice. See INDUCTION.

Impatronization, the act of putting into full possession of a benefice.

Impeachment, a prosecution by the House of Commons before the House of Lords of a commoner for treason, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, or of a peer for any crime.

Impeachment by the House of Commons is a proceeding of great importance, involving the exercise of the highest judicial powers of Parliament; and though in modern times it has rarely been resorted to, in former periods of our history it was of frequent occurrence. The last memorable cases are those of Warren Hastings, in 1788, and Lord Melville, in 1805.

The mode of proceeding is this:—A member of the House of Commons charges the accused of certain high crimes and misdemeanors, and moves that he be impeached; if the House agree to it, the member is ordered to go to the Lords, and at their bar, in the name of the House of Commons and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom, to impeach the accused. A committee is then appointed to draw up articles of impeachment, which are reported to the House, and having been discussed and agreed upon, are engrossed and delivered to the Lords. Further articles may be delivered from time to time. The accused sends answers to each article, which are communicated to the Commons by the Lords; to these, replications are returned, if necessary. After these preliminaries, the Lords appoint a day for the trial. The Commons desire the Lords to summon the witnesses required to prove their charges, and appoint managers to conduct the proceedings. Westminster Hall has been usually fitted up as the court, which is presided over by the Lord High Steward. The Commons attend with the managers, as a committee of the whole House. The accused remains in the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod, to whom he is delivered; if a commoner, by the Serjeant-at-Arms attending the House of Commons. The managers should confine themselves to the charges contained in the articles of impeachment. Persons impeached of treason are entitled, by 20 Geo. II. c. 30, to make their full defence by counsel; a privilege which is also enjoyed by persons charged by the Commons with high crimes and misdemeanors. When the managers have made their charges and adduced evidence in support of them, the accused answers them, and the managers have a reply. The Lord High Steward then puts to each peer, beginning with the junior baron, the question upon the first article, whether the accused be guilty of the crimes charged therein. The peers, in succession, rise in their places when the question is put, and standing uncovered, and laying their right hands upon their breast, answer 'guilty' or 'not guilty,' as the case may be, 'upon my honor.' Each article is proceeded with separately in the same manner, the Lord High Steward giving his own opinion the last. The numbers are then cast up, and being ascertained, are declared by the Lord High Steward to the Lords, and the accused is acquainted with the result.—The Imperial Parliament, by T. E. May.

Impeachment of waste. See ABSQUE IMPETITIONE VASTI.

Impechiare, to impeach, to accuse, or prosecute for felony or treason.

Impediatus. See EXPEDITATE.

Impediens, a defendant or deforciant.

Imperfect obligations, moral duties, such as charity, gratitude, &c., which cannot be enforced by law.

Imperfect trust, an executory trust, which see; and see EXECUTED TRUST.

Imperii majestas est tutelæ salus.—Co. Litt. 64.—(The majesty of the empire is the safety of its protection.)

Imperitia culpæ annumeratur.—Jur. Civ.—(Want of skill is reckoned as a fault.)

Imperitia est maxima mechanicorum pœna.—11 Co. 54.—(Ignorance is the greatest punishment of mechanics.)

Imperium, right to command, an attribute of executive power.

Impersonalitas non concludit nec legat.—Co. Litt. 352 b.—(Impersonality neither concludes nor binds.)

Impertinence, where the pleadings in Chancery are encumbered with long recitals, or with lengthy digressions of matters of fact, which are altogether unnecessary, and totally immaterial to the point in question, as where a deed is stated, which is not prayed to be set forth, in hæc verba.

The practice of excepting to bills, answers, and other proceedings for impertinence shall be and the same is hereby abolished. Provided always that it shall be lawful for the court to direct the costs occasioned by any impertinent matter introduced into any proceeding in the said court, to be paid by the party introducing the same, upon application being made to the court for that purpose.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 17.

The application to be made for the costs of any impertinent matter introduced into any bill, answer, or other proceeding, is to be made at the time when the court disposes of the costs of the cause or matter, and not at any other time.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xl. r. 11.

Impescatus, impeached or accused.

Impetitio. See IMPEACHMENT.

Impetration, acquiring anything by request and prayer.

Impier, umpire, which see.

Impierment, impairing or prejudicing.

Impignoration, the act of pawning or putting to pledge.

Impius et crudelis judicandus est qui libertati non favet.—Co. Litt. 124.—(He is to be adjudged impious and cruel who does not favor liberty.)

Implead, to sue or prosecute.

Implicata [Ital.]. In order to avoid the risk of making fruitless voyages, merchants have been in the habit of receiving small adventures on freight at so much per cent. to which they are entitled at all events, even if the adventure be lost.—Mar. Law.

Implication, a necessary or possible inference, of something not directly declared.

Implied condition. See CONDITION.

Implied contract. See CONTRACT.

Implied trusts. An implied trust arises generally from an equitable construction put upon the acts, conduct, or situation of parties.

Implied trusts have been distributed into two classes: (1) those depending upon the presumed intent of the parties, as where property is delivered by one to another to be handed over to a third person, the receiver holds it upon an implied trust in favor of such third person; (2) those not depending upon such intention, but arising by operation of law, in cases of fraud, or notice of an adverse equity.

A trust of this kind arises, wherever the estate is converted by the trustee from one species of property into another; for if the property, in its original form, were invested with a trust, the cestui que trust's interests cannot be affected by any change of that form; and whether the conversion be in pursuance or in breach of the trustee's duty, is immaterial; for an abuse of trust cannot confer any right on the party abusing it, or on those who claim in privity with him.

Implied use. See RESULTING USE.

Implied warranty. See WARRANTY.

Importation, the bringing goods and merchandize into this country from other nations. As to importation of arms, &c. see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 45.

Imports, goods or produce brought into a country from abroad.

Imposition, tax, contribution.

Impost [fr. impôt, Fr.; impositum, Lat.], any tax or tribute imposed by authority; particularly a tax or duty laid by Government on goods imported.

Impotence, or Impotency, physical inability of a man or woman to perform the act of sexual intercourse. A marriage is void if at the time of the celebration either of the parties to it is incurably impotent, and may be declared void by a decree in a suit of nullity of marriage. See Bishop on Marriage and Divorce.

A plea of impotence is sometimes pleaded by prisoners indicted for rape. Very nice questions as to the legitimacy of children have been contested on issues as to impotence.

The medical jurists have classed the subject, as to the male, into absolute, curable, and temporary, as to the female into curable and incurable. Consult Beck's Med. Juris. p. 52.

Impotentiam, propter, property, a qualified property, which may subsist in animals, feræ naturæ, on account of their inability, as where hawks, herons, or other birds, build in a person's trees, or coneys, &c. make their nests or burrows in a person's land, and have young there, such person has a qualified property in them till they can fly or run away, and then such property expires.—2 Step. Com. 8.

Impotentia excusat legem.—Co. Litt. 29.—(Impotency excuses law.)

Impounding cattle, &c. placing cattle, &c. after they have been distrained, in a safe place for custody.—11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 10; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 5; Woodf. Land. and Ten. 399.

Imprescriptable rights, such as a person may use or not, at pleasure, since they cannot be lost to him by the claims of another founded on prescription.

Impressing men, compelling persons to serve in the navy. This practice is founded on immemorial usage, and has been practised for ages, and is in conformity with the well-known constitutional maxim, that it is better that private mischief be submitted to than that public detriment and inconvenience should ensue. It is provided by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 24, that no person shall be detained in the royal navy, against his consent, for a longer period than five years, except in case of emergency. And see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69, and 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 18, 104, ss. 141–145.

(1) Every ship in the coal trade has the following persons protected, viz.: two able seamen (such as the master shall nominate) for every ship of 100 tons, and one for every 50 tons for every ship of 100 tons and upwards; and any officer who presumes to impress any of the above shall forfeit to the master or owner of such vessel 10*l.* for every man so impressed; and such officer shall be incapable of holding any place, office, or employment in any of his Majesty's ships of war.—6 & 7 Wm. III. c. 18, s. 19.

(2) No parish apprentice shall be compelled or permitted to enter into His Majesty's sea service till he arrives at the age of eighteen years. 2 & 3 Anne, c. 6, s. 4.

(3) Persons voluntarily binding themselves apprentices to sea service shall not be impressed for three years from the date of their indentures.

But no person above eighteen years of age shall have any exemption or protection from His Majesty's service, if they have been at sea before they became apprentices.—2 & 3 Anne, c. 6, s. 15; 4 Anne, c. 19, s. 17; and 13 Geo. II. c. 17, s. 2.

(4) Apprentices.—The Act 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 19, enacts some new regulations with respect to the number of apprentices that ships must have on board, according to their tonnage; and the Act 4 Geo. IV. c. 25, grants protection to such apprentices till they have attained the age of twenty-one years.

(5) Persons employed in the Fisheries.—The Act 50 Geo. III. c. 108, grants the following exemptions from impressment, viz.:—

1st. Masters of fishing vessels or boats, who, either themselves or their owners, have, or within six months before applying for a protection shall have had, one apprentice or more under sixteen years of age, bound for five years, and employed in the business of fishing.

2ndly. All such apprentices, not exceeding eight, to every master or owner of any fishing vessel of fifty tons or upwards; not exceeding seven to every vessel or boat of thirty-five tons, and under fifty; not exceeding six to every vessel of thirty tons and under thirty-five tons; and not exceeding four to every vessel or boat under twenty-nine tons burden, during the time of their apprenticeship, and till the age of twenty years; they continuing for the time in the business of fishing only.

3rdly. One mariner, besides the master and apprentices, to every fishing vessel of ten tons or upwards, employed on the sea coast during his continuance in such service.

4thly. Any landsman, above the age of eighteen, entering and employed on board such vessel for two years from his first going to sea; and to the end of the voyage then engaged in, if he so long continue in such service.

An affidavit, sworn before a justice of the peace, containing the tonnage of such fishing vessel or boat, the port or place to which she belongs, the name and description of the master, the age of every apprentice, the term for which he is bound, and the date of his indenture, and the name, age, and description of every such mariner and landsman respectively; and the time of such landsman's first going to sea is to be transmitted to the Admiralty, which, upon finding the facts correctly stated, grants a separate protection to every individual. In case, however, of an actual invasion of these kingdoms or imminent danger thereof, such protected persons may be impressed; but, except upon such an emergency, any officer or officers impressing such protected persons, shall respectively forfeit 20*l.* to the party impressed, if not an apprentice, or to his master, if he be an apprentice (ss. 2, 3, & 4).

(6) General Exemptions.—All persons fifty-five years of age and upwards, and under eighteen years. Every person being a foreigner, who shall serve in any merchant ship or other trading vessel or privateer, belonging to a subject of the Crown of Great Britain; and all persons of what age soever, who shall use the sea; shall be protected for two years, to be computed from the time of their first using it.—13 Geo. II. c. 17.

(7) Harpooners, line managers, or boat-steerers, engaged in the southern whale-fishery, are also protected.—26 Geo. III. c. 50.

(8) Mariners employed in the herring-fishery are exempted whilst actually employed.—48 Geo. III. c. 110.

Impressment is not now necessary, as the voluntary enlistment of seamen is both encouraged and responded to.

Imprest money, money paid on enlisting soldiers or sailors.

Impretiabilis, invaluable.

Imprimatur, a license to print or publish.

Imprimery, a print or impression.

Imprimis (in the first place).

Imprisii, adherents or accomplices.

Imprisonment, the restraint of a person's liberty under the custody of another. It extends to confinement not only in a gaol, but in a house, stocks, or to holding a man in the street, &c.; for in all these cases the person so restrained is said to be a prisoner, so long as he has not his liberty freely to go about his business, as at other times.—Co. Litt. 253. See BAIL and CAPIAS. The power of imprisonment for small debts, so indiscriminately exercised by county-court judges, is now very properly limited to cases of fraud, breach of trust, &c. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 57, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 105.

Impristi, those who side with or take the part of another, either in his defence or otherwise.

Improbation, the act by which falsehood or perjury is proved.—Scotch term.

Improbi rumores dissipati sunt rebellionis prodromi.—2 Inst. 226.—(Wicked rumours spread abroad are the forerunners of rebellion.)

Improper feuds, derivative feuds; as, for instance, those that were originally bartered and sold to the feudatory for a price, or were held upon base or less honourable services, or upon a rent in lieu of military service, or were themselves alienable, without mutual license, or descended indifferently to either males or females.—1 Step. Com. 185.

Impropriation, the act of employing the revenues of a church-living to a layman's use. See APPROPRIATION.

Improvement. See APPROVEMENT.

Impruiamentum, the improvement of land.

Impruiare, to improve land.

Impunitas continuum affectum tribuit delinquendi.—4 Co. 45.—(Impunity confirms the disposition to commit crime.)

Impunitas semper ad deteriora invitat.—5 Co. 109.—(Impunity always invites to greater crimes.)

Imputatio [Lat.], legal liability.—Civ. Law.

In ædificiis lapis malè positus non est removendus.—11 Co. 69.—(A stone badly placed in buildings is not to be removed.)

In æquali jure melior est conditio possidentis. Plow. 296.—(In equal right the condition of the possessor is best.)

Inalienable, not transferable.

In alio loco [Lat.] (in another place).

In altâ proditione nullus potest esse accessorius sed principalis solummodo.—3 Inst. 138. (In high treason no one can be an accessory, but only principal.)

In alternativis electio est debitoris.—(In alternatives the debtor has the election.)

In ambiguis casibus semper præsumitur pro rege.—(In doubtful cases the presumption is always in favor of the king.)

In Angliâ non est interregnum.—Jenk Cent. 205.—(In England there is no interregnum.)

In articulo mortis [Lat.] (at the point of death).

In atrocioribus delictis punitur affectus licet non sequatur effectus.—2 Rol. Rep. 82.—(In more atrocious crimes the intent is punished, though an effect does not follow.)

Inauguration, the act of inducting into office with solemnity, as the coronation of the sovereign, or the consecration of a prelate.

In auter, or Autre droit (in another's right).

In banco, or banc, sittings. The Chief Justices and the Chief Baron, and the puisné judges of the three superior courts of common law, sit during the term, and also in vacation, if they so determine, for the despatch of business, in their full courts. The puisné judges sit by rotation, in each term or otherwise, as they agree among themselves, so that no greater number than three of them sit at the same time in banc, unless in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice or Chief Baron, the number of the judges forming the full court in banc being limited to four.

The usual business of the court in banc is to hear arguments on demurrers, applications in arrest of judgment, and for new trials, &c., and in the Queen's Bench, criminal informations, parish cases, &c.

Inblaura, profit or product of ground.—Cowel.

Inborh, a security, pledge, or hypotheca, consisting of the chattels of a person unable to obtain a personal 'borg,' or surety.

Inbound Common, an unenclosed common, marked out, however, by boundaries.

Incastellare, to make a building serve as a a castle.

In casu extremæ necessitatis omnia sunt communia.—H. P. C. 54.—(In cases of extreme necessity, every thing is in common.)

Incaustum, or Encaustum, ink.—Fleta, l. 2, c. xxvii., p. 5.

Incerta pro nullis habentur.—Dav. 33.—(Things uncertain are reckoned as nothing.)

Incerta quantitas vitiat actum.—1 Rol. Rep. 465.—(An uncertain quantity vitiates the act.)

Incest, carnal knowledge of persons within the Levitical degrees of kindred. This crime is a capital offence in Scotland; here it is left to the feeble coercion of the spiritual courts.

Inchartare, to give, or grant and assure, anything by a written instrument.

In chief. See EXAMINATION.

Inch, a twelfth part of a foot.

Inch of candle, a mode of sale among merchants. A notice is first given upon the Exchange or other public place, as to the time of sale; the goods to be sold are divided into lots, printed papers of which and the conditions of sale are published; when the sale takes place, a small piece of candle, about an inch long, is kept burning, and the last bidder, when the candle goes out, is entitled to the lot or parcel for which he bids.

Incident, a thing necessarily depending upon, appertaining to, or following another that is more worthy, as rent is incident to a reversion; a court-baron is incident to a manor.

Incident diligence, a process granted before litis contestatam in improbations, for the recovery of writs craved to be produced, and in many other cases during the dependance of a principal process.—Scotch Law.

Incipitur (it is begun), the technical commencement of a declaration, demurrer-book, judgment, &c.—3 Step. Com. 663 n.

Incivile est nisi totâ sententiâ inspectâ de aliquâ parte judicare.—Hob. 171.—(It is improper to judge of any part unless the whole sentence be examined.)

Incivism, unfriendliness to the state or government of which one is a citizen.

In claris non est locus conjecturis.—(In things obvious there is no room for conjecture.)

Inclausa, a home-close, or enclosure near a house.

Inclosure Acts, 41 Geo. III. c. 109; 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 23; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 115; 8 & 4 Vict. c. 31; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 70; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 111; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 83; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 79; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 97; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 31; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 43; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 94; and 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 18 & 39.

Inclosure Commissioners, officers appointed under inclosure acts.

Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.—(The inclusion of one is the exclusion of another.)

Income-tax Acts, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 24; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 4; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 8; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 12; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 10; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 20; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 33; 20 Vict. c. 6; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 5; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 18; 23 Vict. c. 14; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33.

In commendam. See COMMENDAM.

Incommodum non solvit argumentum.—(An inconvenience does not destroy an argument.)

In conjunctivis oportet utramque partem esse veram.—Wing. 13.—(In things conjunctive, each part ought to be true.)

In consimili casu, consimile debet esse remedium.—Hard. 65.—(In similar cases the remedy should be similar.)

In consuetudinibus non diuturnitas temporis sed soliditas rationis est consideranda.—Co. Litt. 141.—(In customs, not the length of time but the strength of the reason should be considered.)

Incontinency, unlawful indulgence of the sexual passion.

In contractibus, benigna: in testamentis, benignior; in restitutionibus, benignissima interpretatio facienda est.—Co. Litt. 112.—(In contracts, the interpretation is to be liberal; in wills, more liberal; in restitutions most liberal.)

In contractibus tacitè insunt quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis.—(Those things which are of manner and custom are tacitly imported into contracts.)

Incopolitus, a proctor or vicar.

Incorporated Law Society, constituted registrar of attornies and solicitors, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 21.

Incorporation, the formation of a legal or political body, with the quality of perpetual existence and succession, unless limited by the act of incorporation.

Incorporeal chattels, incorporeal rights incident to chattels, e. g. patent rights and copyrights.—2 Stop. Com. 9.

Incorporeal hereditament. See HEREDITAMENT.

Incrementum, increase or improvement, opposed to decrementum or abatement.

In criminalibus probationes debent esse luce clariores.—3 Inst. 210.—(In criminal cases the proofs ought to be clearer than light.)

In criminalibus sufficit generalis malitia intentionis cum facto paris gradûs.—Bacon.—(In criminal actions a general malice of intention, with an act of corresponding degree, is sufficient.)

In criminalibus voluntas reputabitur pro facto.—3 Inst. 106.—(In criminal acts the will will be taken for the deed.)

Incroachment [fr. accrochement, Fr., a grasping], an unlawful gaining upon the right or possession of another.

Incumbent [fr. incumbo, Lat., to attend diligently], a clergyman in possession of an ecclesiastical benefice.

Incumbrance, a claim, lien, or liability attached to property; as a mortgage, a registered judgment, &c.

Incurramentum, the liability to a fine, penalty, or amerciament.

In custodia legis [Lat.] (in the keeping of the law).

Indebitatus assumpsit [Lat.] (being indebted he undertook); that species of the action of assumpsit in which the plaintiff first alleges a debt, and then a promise in consideration of the debt. The promise laid is generally implied. All actions on the indebitatus counts are now, both in form and substance, actions of debt. See 1 Selw. Nisi Prius, 69, et seq.

Indecimable, not titheable.

Inde datæ leges ne fortior omnia posset.—Dav. 36.—(The laws are made lest the stronger should be altogether uncontrolled.)

Indefeasible, not to be made void.

Indefensus, undefended.

Indefinite payment, where a debtor owes several debts to a creditor, and makes a payment, without specifying to which of the debts it is to be applied.

Indefinitum equipollet universali.—1 Vent. 368.—(The indefinite equals the universal.)

Indefinitum supplet locum universalis.—4 Co. 77.—(The indefinite supplies the place of the universal.)

Indemnity, a writing to secure one from all danger and damage that may ensue from an act or omission. An act of indemnity is passed in every session of Parliament for the relief of those who have neglected to take the necessary oaths of office, &c. See 26 & 27 Vict. c. 107.

Every deed, will, or other instrument, creating a trust either expressly or by implication, shall, without prejudice to the clauses actually contained therein be deemed to contain a clause in the words or to the effect following: that is to say: 'that the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said deed, will, or other instrument shall be respectively chargeable only for such monies, stocks, funds, and securities, as they shall respectively actually receive, notwithstanding their respectively signing any receipt for the sake of conformity, and shall be answerable and accountable only for their own acts, receipts, neglects, or defaults, and not for those of each other, nor for any banker, broker, or other person with whom any trust monies or securities may be deposited, nor for the insufficiency or deficiency of any stocks, funds or securities, nor for any other loss, unless the same shall happen through their own wilful defaults respectively;' and also 'that it shall be lawful for the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said deed, will, or other instrument to reimburse themselves or himself, or pay and discharge out of the trust-premises all expenses incurred in or about the execution of the trusts or powers of the said deed, will, or other instrument.'—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 31.

Indenization, the act of making free, or of naturalizing.

Indenture, a deed indented between two or more parties. See DEED.

Index animi sermo.—(Speech is the mind's index.)

India. See EAST INDIA COMPANY.

India Stocks, Act for the Registration and Transfer of, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 7; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 73.

Indicatif, an abolished writ by which a prosecution was in some cases removed from a court-christian to the Queen's bench.—Encyc. Lond.

Indicavit (he has proclaimed), a writ of prohibition that lies for a patron of a church, whose clerk is sued in the spiritual court by another clerk for tithes which amount to a fourth part of the profits of the advowson, when the suit belongs to the common law courts, by West. II. c. 5, 13 Edw. I. st. 4. The patron of the defendant is allowed this writ, as he is like to be prejudiced in his church and advowson, if the plaintiff recover in the spiritual court.—Reg. Orig. 55.

Indicia [Lat.], signs, marks.

Indicted, charged in an indictment with a criminal offence. See INDICTMENT.

Indictee, a person indicted.

Indictio, an indictment.

Indiction, Cycle of, a mode of computing time by the space of fifteen years, instituted by Constantine the Great; originally the period for the payment of certain taxes. The Popes, since the time of Charlemagne, have dated their acts by the year of the indiction, which was fixed on the 1st of January A. D. 313. At the time of the reformation of the calendar, the year 1582 was reckoned the 10th year of the indiction. Now this date, when divided by 15, leaves a remainder of 7, that is 3 less than the indiction, and the same must be the case in all subsequent calculations; so that in order to find the indiction for any year, divide the date by 15, and add 3 to the remainder. It has no connection with the motion of the heavenly bodies. Some of the charters of King Edgar and Henry III. are dated by indictions.

Indictment [fr. indico, Lat., to show], a written accusation against one or more persons, of a crime of a public nature, preferred to and presented upon oath by a grand jury. It lies against all persons (except those under incapacity, as lunatics, &c.), who actually commit or who procure and assist in the commission of crimes, or who knowingly harbour an offender; for each, in contemplation of law, is guilty and liable to punishment according to the part which he takes in the perpetration of the offence. It consists of three principal parts—the commencement (or caption), statement, and conclusion. The caption is no part of an indictment, it is merely the style of the court where it is preferred, which is prefixed by way of preamble, when the record is made up, or when it is returned to a certiorari. The statement must be certain as to the party indicted, and as to the person against whom the offence was committed, and also as to time and place, facts, circumstances, and intent. It must be positive, and neither double nor repugnant. There is, in general, no time limited for preferring an indictment, but by several statutes certain limitations for certain offences are fixed. If an indictment be defective, it will be quashed.—2 Hawk. c. xxv., s. 4; Arch. Crim. Plead. by Power 75, et seq.

An indictment for perjury, subornation of perjury, conspiracy, obtaining money or other property by false pretences, keeping a gambling house, keeping a disorderly house, and any indecent assault, cannot be preferred without previous authorization. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17. See Roscoe's Crim. Evid.

Indictment, in the Scotch law, is the form of process by which a criminal is brought to trial at the instance of the Lord Advocate. Where a private party is a principal prosecutor, he brings his charge in what is termed the form of criminal letters.

Indictment de felony est contra pacem domini regis, coronam et dignitatem suam, in genere et non in individuo; quia in Angliâ non est interregnum.—Jenk. Cent. 205.—(Indictment for felony is against the peace of our lord the king, his crown and dignity in general, and not against his individual person; because in England there is no interregnum.)

Indictor, he who indicts another for an offence.

Indirect evidence, proof of collateral circumstances, from which a fact in controversy, not directly attested by witnesses or documents, may be inferred. It is also called circumstantial and presumptive evidence. See Starkie, Taylor, or Best on Evidence.

Indistanter, forthwith; without delay.

In disjunctivis sufficit alteram partem esse veram.—Wing. 13.—(In things disjunctive, it suffices should either part be true.)

Indivisum, that which is held in common, without partition.

Indo-Briton, a person born in India, one of whose parents is a native of Great Britain.

Indorsee, the person to whom a bill of exchange, promissory note, bill of lading, &c. is assigned by indorsement.

Indorsement [fr. in, Lat., upon, and dorsum, a back], anything written or printed upon the back of a deed or writing.

Indorser, he who writes his name on the back of a bill of exchange, &c.

Indowment. See ENDOWMENT.

In dubiis non præsumitur pro testamento.—Cro. Car. 51.—(In doubtful things, the presumption is not in favor of a will.)

In dubiis magis dignum est accipiendum. (In doubtful things, that which is more worthy is to be received.)

In dubio hæc legis constructio quam verba ostendunt.—Jur. Civ.—(In a doubtful point, the construction which the words point out is the construction of the law.)

In dubio pars mitior est sequenda.—(In doubt, the gentler course is to be followed.)

In dubio sequendum quod tutius est.—(In doubt, that which is the safer course is to be adopted.)

Inducement, an allegation of a motive; an incitement to a thing. A term used in pleading.

Induciæ legales, the days between the citation of a defendant and the day of appearance.

Induciare, to prorogue, postpone, respite.

Induction [fr. inductio, Lat., a leading into], the giving a parson possession of his church.

A clerk is not complete incumbent until induction, which is performed by a mandate from the bishop to the archdeacon, or if the church be exempt from archidiaconal jurisdiction, to the chancellor or commissary, or if it be a peculiar, to the dean or judge, who usually issues a precept to other clergymen to perform it for him.

It is to be made according to the tenor and language of the mandate, by investing the clerk with all the profits, and full possession of the church. Accordingly, the person who inducts usually takes the clerk by the hand, and lays it on the ring, key, or latch of the church-door, or wall of the church, or delivers a clod, turf, or twig of the glebe, and gives corporal possession of the church in the following manner:—

'By virtue of this mandate I induct you into the real, actual, and corporal possession of the church of , with all rights, profits, and appurtenances thereto belonging.'

The inductor then usually opens the door, and puts the clerk into the church, and he frequently tolls the bell to make his induction public, and known to the parishioners. After which the inductor endorses a certificate of the induction on the mandate, which is witnessed by the persons present.

Induction, therefore, is the investiture of the temporal part of the benefice or the corporal seisin, as institution is of the spiritual. And when a clerk is thus presented, he is then, and not before, in full and complete possession of the temporalities, and is called in law persona impersonata, or parson imparsonee. No person can, either by institution or collation, be admitted to any ecclesiastical living, except he first subscribe to these three articles:—

That the queen's majesty, under God, is the only supreme governor of this realm, and of all others her highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal; and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within her majesty's said realms, dominions, and countries;

That the book of common prayer, and of ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, containeth in it nothing contrary to the word of God, and that it may lawfully be used; and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed in public prayer, and administration of the sacraments, and none other;

That he alloweth the book of articles of religion, agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the convocation holden at London in the year of our Lord One thousand five hundred and sixty-two; and that he acknowledgeth all and every the articles therein contained, being in number nine and thirty, besides the ratification, to be agreeable to the word of God.

To these three articles, whosoever will subscribe, he shall, for the avoiding of all ambiguities, subscribe in this order and form of words, setting down both his Christian and surname, viz.: 'I, , do willingly and ex animo subscribe to these three articles abovementioned, and to all things that are contained in them.' And if any bishop shall admit any as is aforesaid, except he first have subscribed in manner and form as aforesaid, he shall be suspended from giving of orders and licences to preach for the space of twelve months.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, 195.

Indulgence, in the Roman Catholic church a remission of the punishment due to sins, granted by the pope or church, supposed to save the sinner from purgatory. Its abuse led to the reformation in Germany.

Indulto, a dispensation granted by the pope to do or obtain something contrary to the common law.

Indument, endowment.

Industrial Schools. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 48, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 108.

Industriam, per, a qualified property in animals feræ naturæ may be acquired per industriam, i. e. by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education; or by so confining them within his own immediate power, that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty.—2 Step. Com. 5.

In esse (actually existing), distinguished from in posse, which means, that which is not, but may be. A child before birth is in posse; after birth, in esse.

Inesse potest donationi, modus, conditio, sive causa; ut modus est; si, conditio; quia, causa.—Dyer, 138.—(In a gift there may be a manner, condition, or cause; ut, introduces a manner; si, a condition; quia, a cause.)

Inewardus, a guard, a watchman.

In extremis (in the last moments).

In faciendo (in doing or in feasance).

In facto quod se habet ad bonum et malum magis de bono quam de malo lex intendit.—Co. Litt. 78.—(In an action which addresses itself to good and bad, the law looks more to the good than to the bad.)

Infalistalus, a capital punishment inflicted on the sands or seashore.—Sed. qu.

Infamy, public disgrace; total loss of character. This does not now incapacitate from giving evidence.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 1.

Infangenthef, a privilege of lords of certain manors to judge any thief taken within their fee.—Anc. Inst. Engl.

Infant [fr. infans, Lat., which means qui fari non potest, one who cannot speak for himself], a person under twenty-one years of age, whose acts are in many cases either void or voidable. See AGE.

At Common Law, the contracts of infants are divided into three classes:—

1st. Those which are absolutely void: such as are positively injurious to the interests of the infant, and can only operate to his prejudice; as a surety-bond, or a release to his guardian.

3rd. Those which are binding ab initio, and need no ratification: such as contracts for the public service, articles of apprenticeship, executed contracts of marriage, representative acts as executor or trustee, contracts for necessaries.—Story on Contracts, 21.

All conveyances by an infant are voidable by him or his heirs, on attaining majority, but an infant at the age of fifteen may make a valid feoffment of gavelkind lands, which he has by descent; yet it must be by way of sale, and not by mortgage; and an infant, at any age, may present to a church. By 1 Wm. IV. c. 47, courts of equity are empowered to direct and compel a conveyance by the infant heir or devisee, or the devisee having a limited interest, of a person whose estates shall have been decreed by the court to be sold for payment of his debts. And by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 60, the court is empowered to make mortgages as well as sales of such estates, in the case where the devisee of a limited interest is an infant. As to conveyances and transfers of estates and funds vested in trustees and mortgagees, &c., being infants, see 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60. Leases made by infants are also voidable, on attaining majority. By 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 65, ss. 16, 17, infants are empowered to grant renewals of leases under the direction of the Court of Chancery, and that court is authorized to direct leases of land belonging to infants, when it is to the benefit of the estate. By custom, infants seised of lands in socage may, at the age of fifteen, make leases for years, which shall bind them after majority. All leases made to infants are voidable; but the election to avoid must be made within a reasonable time after attaining full age.

An infant is liable for torts committed by him unless the tort has arisen out of a contract. As to the criminal liability of infants, see AGE, ante.

An infant cannot prosecute an action, either in person or by attorney, he must sue either by prochein amy or guardian; usually the former. The process is sued out in the infant's name, and the prochein amy approved by a judge at chambers. An infant can appear and defend by guardian ad litem only.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1230, 1233.

The general superintendence and protective jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over the persons and property of infants, is a delegation of the rights and duties of the Crown—the universal guardian of infants. This court interferes:—

1st. In the appointment and removal of guardians. It will appoint a suitable guardian where there is none other, or none other who will or can act; but the infant must have property. Such a guardian is treated as an officer of the court, and held responsible to it. Whenever sufficient cause is shown, the court will remove a guardian, no matter how and by whom appointed. Guardians are also assisted by the court in their duty.

2nd. In the suitable maintenance and education of an infant, having a due regard to the rank, the future expectations, and the intended profession and employment, and the property of the infant, the court usually confines itself within the limits of the income of the property; but where the property is small, and more means are necessary for the due maintenance of the infant, the court will sometimes allow the capital to be broken in upon.

3rd. In the management and disposition of the property, by exercising a vigilant care over the conduct of guardians as to the change of property, making it in all cases advisable for them to act under the strict guidance of the court in the duties of their fiduciary office.

4th. As to marriage. If anyone marry a ward of court without the express sanction of the court, even with the guardian's consent, he is guilty of a contempt of court, though he be ignorant that he has married a ward, and will be committed to prison until he consents to such a settlement of the property as the court shall deem equitable and proper.—2 Story's Eq. 516; Madd. Ch. vol. i., tit. 'Infants;' Chambers on Infancy; 2 Step. Com. 314, et seq.

Infants institute a suit in equity by their next friend, but they must defend a suit by guardian, who is appointed by the court, and is usually their nearest relation not interested in the matter in question.—Story's Eq. Plead. 70; Smi Ch. Pr. 176, 325.

Infants' Marriage Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43. This act enacts that from and after the 2nd of July, 1855, it shall be lawful for every infant (who being a male has attained the age of twenty years, or a female seventeen years, s. 4), upon or in contemplation of his or her marriage, with the sanction of the Court of Chancery (given upon petition presented by the infant or his or her guardian in a summary way without the institution of a suit, s. 3), to make a valid and binding settlement, or contract for a settlement of all or any part of his or her property, or over which he or she has any power of appointment, whether real or personal, and whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy; and every conveyance, appointment, or assignment of such real or personal estate, or contract to make a conveyance, appointment, or assignment thereof executed by such infant with the approbation of the said court for the purpose of giving effect to such settlement, shall be as valid and effective as if the person executing the same were of the full age of twenty-one years. If there be no guardian, the court may require a guardian to be appointed or not, as it shall think fit, and the court also may, if it shall think fit, require that any persons interested or appearing to be interested in the property should be served with notice of such petition. This act is not to extend to powers of which it is expressly declared that they shall not be exercised by an infant (s. 1). And also in case any appointment under a power of appointment or any disentailing assurance shall have been executed by any infant tenant-in-tail under the provisions of this act, and such infant shall afterwards die under age, such appointment or disentailing assurance is thereupon to become absolutely void (s. 2). See In re Strong, 26 L. J. Ch. 64. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 83, the above act is declared to extend to the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

Infanticide, the killing of a child after it is born. The felonious destruction of the fœtus in utero is more properly called fœticide, or criminal abortion.

In every case in which an infant is found dead, and its death becomes the subject of judicial investigation, the great questions which present themselves for inquiry are:—

(1) What is the age of the child?
(2) Was the child born alive?
(3) If born alive, how long had it lived?
(4) If born alive, by what means did it die?

If it be proved that its death was owing to violence, it is then to be ascertained who the murderer of it is. If suspicion fall upon the mother, it is to be determined—

(1) Whether she has been delivered of a child? and,

(2) Whether the signs of delivery correspond as to time, &c. with the appearances developed in the child?

Now there are two ways in which a child may be born alive. (1) It may be born, the cord may be pulsating, showing that it is alive, and yet it may not respire. It may thus continue for a sufficient length of time, so as to die from natural causes, or in consequence of criminal interference, before respiration has commenced. (2) It may be born and respire.

It must be evident that when a child is born alive but has not yet respired, its condition is precisely like that of the fœtus in utero. It lives merely because the fœtal circulation is still going on. In this case none of the organs undergo any changes. But the case of a child who is born alive and respires, is tested by respiration. The proofs by which this is to be established are all deduced from certain changes which take place in the system as soon as the vital process of respiration commences. These proofs have been thus classed:—

(I.) Those derived from the circulating system, subdivided into—

(a) The character of the blood itself. According to Fourcroy, the points of difference between the composition of fœtal and adult blood, are the following:—(1) In the fœtus the coloring matter is darker, and the blood is not so susceptible of taking the brilliant red shade on exposure to the atmosphere. (2) It contains no fibrous matter; the thickened and coagulated matter which is found in its place more resembles gelatinous matter. (3) It does not contain any phosphoric acid.

(β) The condition of the heart and blood-vessels. There are a number of striking and interesting peculiarities in the organs circulating the blood in the fœtus, which are modified or entirely lost after the child is born, and respiration is established. (1) The foramen ovale becomes obliterated after birth by the closure and adhesion of its valve, leaving behind it in the adult nothing but an oval depression in the septum between the auricles, called the fossa ovalis. If the foramen ovale be found closed, in consequence of the blood taking a new route through the lungs, when respiration commences, it is an evidence of the child's having been born alive. But with regard to the validity of this test, it must be obvious that, from the gradual manner in which such change takes place, a great many cases must occur, from which no positive conclusion can be drawn. (2) The ductus arteriosus will be found open and filled with blood in the fœtus, but, after birth, it becomes gradually obliterated, the duct itself eventually changing into a ligament. Should, therefore, this duct be found permanently closed, it is a proof that the child was born alive. (3) The ductus venosus in the fœtus, anterior to respiration, is always found open; after respiration it gradually contracts, becomes impervious, and is finally converted into a ligament. If it be obliterated, it is a proof that the child has lived and respired; on the contrary, as it remains open a day or two at least after birth, its being found open is no proof that the child was born dead. (4) The umbilical vessels, consisting of two arteries and a vein, become gradually obliterated after birth, and converted into ligaments. From scientific observations the following conclusions have been drawn:— (a) That the fœtal openings are not obliterated immediately after birth. (b) That the periods at which they are obliterated are variable. (c) That most commonly the foramen ovale and the ductus arteriosus are obliterated towards the eighth or the tenth day. (d) That the order in which they are obliterated is the following—viz. the umbilical arteries, the umbilical vein, the ductus venosus, the ductus arteriosus, and lastly, the foramen ovale. (e) That their obliteration proves that the child was born alive. (f) That it is impossible to infer from the fact of their not being obliterated, that the child has not respired, since the obliteration is very far from being made immediately after birth. (5) The umbilical cord after birth, and its division from the placenta, separates from the child, and drops off. In a new-born infant the cord is firm, round, and of a bluish color. If the child live, the first change which it undergoes is that of withering, the second is that of desiccation or drying; the third is the separation of it; and, lastly, the cicatrisation of the umbilicus.

The following are some general inferences which have been deduced from the examination of the circulation:—

(1) If the foramen ovale, the ductus arteriosus, the ductus venosus, and the umbilical vessels, be obliterated, and the umbilical cord be separated, the conclusion is certain, not merely that the child has respired, but that it has lived for a considerable time.

(2) If the foramen ovale, the ductus arteriosus, the ductus venosus, and the umbilical vessels, be still open, and if the cord be still attached to the umbilicus, no inference can be drawn that the child has not respired.

(3) Of all the changes in the circulating apparatus, consequent upon respiration, those of the ductus arteriosus are the only ones which can be rendered available in cases where the child has respired but for a short period.

(4) In cases where a child has respired for a sufficient length of time, valuable presumptive evidence of the fact may be obtained from the state of the umbilical cord.

(5) The changes in the circulation, consequent upon respiration, are important, in many cases, to determine the length of time during which a child may have lived after birth.

(II.) Those derived from the respiratory organs. There are three conditions in which the new-born child may be found: it may have respired perfectly; it may have respired imperfectly; it may not have respired at all. In reference to these conditions the following investigations have been made.

(α) The size and configuration of the thorax. Its size, in a child which has never respired, is narrow and flattened, and the diaphragm rising into it is highly arched. This test, taken by itself, is not of much value; it is only in connection with other signs that it is of importance.

(β) The situation of the lungs. Anterior to respiration the lungs occupy a small space at the upper and posterior parts of the thorax, leaving the pericardium and diaphragm almost, and sometimes entirely, uncovered. If only imperfect respiration have taken place, the lungs will be found occupying the lateral portions of the thorax also. If the respiration have been complete, and especially if it have been established for a certain length of time, they will cover almost entirely the pericardium, as well as the arch of the diaphragm.

(γ) The volume of the lungs in the fœtal state is comparatively small, but as soon as respiration is established the volume is increased, because the lungs are distended with air.

(ε) The color of the lungs in the fœtus is of a brownish red, resembling very much the color of the liver in the adult, and of the thymus gland in the fœtus. After perfect respiration, it is a pale red or scarlet. Other causes, however, will modify or change the color of the lungs, as artificial inflammation, disease, or atmospherical action.

(ζ) Consistence or density of the lungs. In the fœtus the lungs are dense, somewhat resembling the solidity of the liver; on pressure or when cut into, they do not crepitate. After perfect respiration they become soft and spongy; air-bubbles may be squeezed out of them; and when pressed or cut into they give out a crepitus.

(η) The absolute weight of the lungs. According to Orfila no just inference can be drawn from this test.

(θ) The specific gravity of the lungs. The principle upon which this test is founded is the difference produced in the specific gravity of the lungs, in consequence of the introduction of air into them. On putting the lungs of a still-born child into water, it will be found that they sink rapidly to the bottom of the fluid. On the other hand, if the lungs of a child which has breathed perfectly be put into water, they will be found to float high in that fluid. If the breathing have only been imperfect, the lungs will float or sink according as a greater or less portion of these organs has been penetrated by air. On cutting the lungs into pieces, those portions into which air has been introduced will float, while the rest will sink. From these facts the general conclusions are, that when the lungs float, the child has respired; when they sink, that the child has not respired; when portions of the lungs only float, that the respiration has been partial and imperfect.

There are, however, several objections to this hydrostatic test: (1) that a child may not have respired, and yet the lungs may float in water from having undergone putrefaction; (2) there may be a peculiar emphysematous condition of the lungs, which may make them float in water, even though respiration has never taken place; (3) the lungs may float in consequence of artificial inflation.

The following conclusions have been drawn from an examination of the objections to the hydrostatic test:—

(1) That when the lungs float in water, it must be from one of four causes—natural respiration, putrefaction, emphysema, the artificial introduction of air.

(2) As the lungs may float from other causes besides respiration, their mere floating is no proof that the child has respired.

(3) As, however, it is possible to discriminate between the floating of natural respiration, and of that which is the result of other causes, it follows:

(4) That, with due precautions, the floating of the lungs may be depended upon as a decided proof that the child has respired.

Another class of objections may be thus stated:—(1) That although the child has breathed, yet the lungs, in consequence of disease, may have their specific gravity so increased as to make them sink in water. (2) A child may have actually breathed, but yet so imperfectly that the lungs shall not have received air sufficient to make them float. From these objections it may, therefore, be concluded—

(1) That when the lungs sink in water, it must be from one or the other of the following causes: the total want of respiration, feeble and imperfect respiration; some diseases of the lungs rendering them specifically heavier than the water.

(2) As the lungs may sink from other causes than the absence of respiration, the mere sinking is no decisive proof that the child has not respired.

(3) As, however, the sinking from the want of respiration may be distinguished from that which is the result of other causes, it follows:

(4) That with due precautions, the sinking of the lungs is a safe test that the child has not respired.

(III.) Those deduced from the abdominal organs.

(α) The liver, which is much larger in the mature fœtus, than it is after respiration has taken place.

(β) The intestines, in the fœtal state, contain a dark pitchy matter, called the meconium, which is evacuated shortly after birth, when the child is born alive.

(γ) The bladder anterior to birth contains a considerable quantity of urine, which, at variable periods after birth, is evacuated.

It is from all these various proofs of a child having respired, that the inference of its having been born is drawn. To all this, however, a capital objection is urged—that a child may respire during the birth, and yet may die before it is fully born. But it has been inferred:

(1) That respiration anterior to full birth is a rare occurrence.

(2) That when it does take place, it must be under circumstances which give the child the best possible chance of being born alive.

(3) That when a child dies in this situation, the respiration must necessarily be imperfect, and therefore it can create no difficulty in cases where the evidences of perfect respiration are present.

(4) That when a child diés in this situation, the respiration must, as a matter of course, be of short duration, and therefore it can present no difficulty in cases where, from the appearance of the umbilical cord, it is evident that respiration has been continued for some time.

Uterine respiration can never become a question in infanticide, for it takes place only under circumstances which render manual aid necessary to complete the delivery. Vaginal respiration is also so far similarly circumstanced. Respiration in the passages, as hitherto observed, takes place only—(1) in delivery by the feet, when the whole body but the head is protruded; (2) in natural delivery, either when the head is expelled or the body remains in the passages; (3) when before the expulsion of the head, and after the rupture of the membranes, the hand is introduced to accelerate tedious labor. These cases are by no means likely to occur in legal medicine.

The inquiry how long the child had lived, if born alive, is important, inasmuch as it enables us to ascertain how it compares with the signs of delivery in the reputed mother. In this inquiry no information of any importance can be obtained from the respiratory organs. The question mainly depends upon proofs deduced from the circulation, and especially from the state of the umbilical cord.

The means by which a child came to its death are either:—

(I.) Criminal, subdivided into—

(α) The intentional neglect of tying the umbilical cord.

(β) Exposing a new-born child to the action of cold.

(γ) Keeping from the child the nourishment necessary for supporting life.

(δ) The infliction of wounds and injuries of various kinds.

(ϵ) Asphyxiating a new-born child, or putting a stop to its respirations.

(ζ) Poisoning.

(II.) Accidental, as—

(α) Various causes connected with delivery, unconnected with criminal intention.

(β) Congenital malformation of certain organs.

(γ) Various diseases, which may be either congenital, or occur immediately after birth.

The questions occurring as to the mother are two: (1) Has she been actually delivered? (2) Do the signs of delivery in the mother correspond as to time, &c., with the appearance of the child?

Infinitum in jure reprobatur.—9 Co. 45.—(Infinity is reprehensible in law.)

In formâ pauperis (in the character of a pauper). Every poor person, who may have cause of action, is entitled to have writs according to the nature of the case, without paying the fees thereon, and the judges may assign him counsel and attorney, who, together with the officers of the court, act gratis. The party applying must swear that he is not worth 5*l.* excepting his wearing apparel and the matter involved in the cause. This discretionary indulgence is confined to plaintiffs at common law, and is not granted to defendants in civil actions, but is extended to defences in prosecutions. A plaintiff must have a counsel's certificate of good cause of action.

No person shall be admitted to sue in formâ pauperis unless the case laid before counsel for his opinion, and his opinion thereon, with an affidavit of the party or his attorney, that the same case contains a full and true statement of all the material facts, to the best of his knowledge and belief, shall be produced before the court or judge to whom application may be made; and no fees shall be payable by a pauper to his counsel and attorney, nor at the offices of the masters, or associates, or at the judges' chambers, or elsewhere, by reason of a verdict being found for such pauper, exceeding five pounds.—121 r. H. T. 1853.

Where a pauper omits to proceed to trial, pursuant to notice, he may be called upon by rule to show cause why he should not pay costs, though he has not been dispaupered, and why all further proceedings should not be stayed until such costs shall be paid.—122 r.

A person admitted to sue in formâ pauperis shall not in any case be entitled to costs from the opposite party, unless by order of the court or a judge.—28 r. T. T. 1853; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1277.

In equity a pauper, under the circumstances above stated, will be admitted to sue, and also to be sued, in formâ pauperis.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 779.

A person desirous of prosecuting a suit in formâ pauperis, in the Divorce or Probate Courts, must obtain counsel's opinion that he has reasonable grounds for asking relief, and then obtain the order of the judge, upon the production of the case and opinion, with an affidavit that the case contains all the material facts, and that the applicant is not worth 25*l.* after payment of debts, except wearing apparel. A pauper not proceeding to trial pursuant to notice, may be called upon to show cause why he should not pay costs, proceedings to be stayed in the mean time.—21 & 22 Vict. c. 85, s. 54; Orders 42, 43, & 44; Prob. Rules, Con. Bus. 23 & 24.

Informality, want of legal form.

Information, an accusation, or complaint; also, communicated knowledge.

Information in Chancery. Where a suit is instituted on behalf of the Crown or Government, or of those of whom it has the custody by virtue of its prerogative (such as idiots and lunatics), or whose rights are under its particular protection (such as the objects of a public charity), the matter of complaint is offered to the court by way of information by the attorney or solicitor-general, and not by way of petition. When a suit immediately concerns the Crown or Government alone, the proceeding is purely by way of information, but where it does not so immediately, a relator is appointed, who is answerable for costs, &c.; and if he be interested in the matter, in connection with the Crown or Government, the proceeding is then by information and bill. Informations differ from bills in little more than name and form; and the same rules are substantially applicable to each.—Story's Eq. Plead. 5.

A Crown information filed in the Court of Exchequer is a suit for recovering money or other chattels, or for obtaining satisfaction, in damages, for any personal wrong committed in the lands or other possessions of the Crown. It is instituted to redress private wrongs, while criminal informations are resorted to to punish public wrongs, or heinous misdemeanors. See Ex officio informations. The most usual Exchequer informations are in cases of intrusion, for trespasses on Crown lands; debt, for Crown monies due upon breaches of penal statutes; and, in rem, when any goods are supposed to become the property of the Crown, no one claiming them, as treasure-trove, wrecks, waifs, and estrays.—4 Step. Com. 82.

Initialia testimonii. Before examining a witness in chief, in Scotland, he is first examined as to his disposition, whether he bear ill-will to either of the parties, or has been prompted what to say, or has received any bribe. It is somewhat similar to our voir dire, which see.

Initials, the first letters of names. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 12, in all actions upon bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other written instruments, any of the parties to which are designated by the initial letter or letters, or some contraction of the Christian or first name or names, it shall be sufficient to designate such persons by the same initial letter or letters, or contraction of the Christian or first name or names, instead of stating them in full.

Initiate, tenant by courtesy, the husband is so called, when a child is born, capable of inheriting the land subject to his courtesy.

In judicio non creditur nisi juratis.—Cro. Car. 64.—(In judgment nothing is believed except upon oath.)

Injunction, the Court of Chancery's discretionary process of preventive and remedial justice; an interdictory writ, whereby a person is required to refrain from doing a specified meditated wrong, the wrong, however, not amounting to a crime. It is either (I.) provisional or temporary until the coming in of the defendant's answer, or until the hearing of the cause, or until the chief clerk has made his certificate—which is subdivided into (a) common, granted on default, and (b) special, granted upon particular grounds; or (II.) perpetual, i. e. forming part of a decree made at a hearing upon the merits whereby the defendant is perpetually inhibited from the assertion of a right, or perpetually restrained from the commission of an act, contrary to equity and good conscience.

So numerous are the instances for which an injunction will be granted, that only the principal of them can be here pointed out. See for more detailed information, Eden on Injunctions; 2 Sto. Eq. Jurisp. c. xxiii.; 3 Chit. Eq. Ind. by Mac. 2232–2297, and the recent Chancery Practices of Daniel and Smith.

A common injunction has for its object the staying of a suitor from his civil proceedings at common law.

The following are cases in which it will be granted:—

Suppose an executor or administrator is in possession of abundant assets to pay all the debts of the deceased, and by an accidental fire a great portion of them is destroyed so that the estate becomes insolvent; he might be sued by a creditor at law, and the loss of the assets by accident would be no defence, for being once chargeable with the assets at law he is for ever chargeable, notwithstanding any intervening casualties. Equity will restrain such proceedings at law.

Again, if a person sued for a debt of long standing which has been paid, is unable after due search to find a receipt or release which would have established that fact, and judgment is obtained against him, and afterwards the receipt is unexpectedly found, either in his own possession or in that of a third person, equity would in such a case afford relief by a perpetual injunction.

Again, where a judgment has been obtained at law by fraud for a sum larger than is justly due, upon the understanding that a certain set-off should be allowed and deducted, equity will not hesitate to restrain execution upon the judgment to the extent of such set-off.

Equity will also interpose to restrain proceedings at law for the recovery of penalties. A common instance of this species of relief is that which is given against a clause of re-entry in a lease for non-payment of rent.—4 Geo. II. c. 28, ss. 2, 3; and see The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, ss. 210, 211, 212.

Where the rights of a party are wholly equitable in their own nature, or are incapable, under the circumstances, of being asserted in a court of law, an injunction will be granted, as upon the application of a tenant holding under an agreement for a lease, to restrain the landlord from proceeding against him in ejectment. And this upon the common equity, that the tenant is entitled to a specific performance of the agreement by the execution of a lease. So if a trustee, in violation of his trust, brings an ejectment to oust the possession of the cestui que trust of an estate to the beneficial enjoyment of which he is entitled, an injunction will go against him.

Another instance of interposition against the prosecution of a legal right, is, where there has been a decree in equity, for the administration of assets to pay debts. The decree is considered as in the nature of a judgment for all the creditors, and, therefore, if subsequently to it a creditor sue at law, the court, in the assertion of its jurisdiction, will restrain him by injunction (which is in this case special), from proceeding after he has been served with notice of the decree. See the principle of the doctrine and a summary of the mischief which it is designed to prevent in Re the Royal British Bank, 5 W. R. 61, V. C. K. (1856). If the action have been commenced before bill filed, the creditor will be at liberty upon discontinuing the action to prove the costs as a debt under the decree; and, until notice, the party seeking to restrain the creditor must pay the costs occasioned by not having given notice, and suffering the creditor to go on; but after notice the creditor cannot have any costs.

An injunction will be granted against a party who attempts to enforce a judgment at law which has been satisfied. Where a creditor is suing a shareholder of a company at the instigation of the directors, being anxious to make the shareholders contribute, an injunction will issue on the ground that it was not the unbiassed action of the creditor, but rather the indirect proceeding of the co-shareholders. Beck v. Dean, 5 W. R. 106, V. C. W. (1856). A legatee who has mortgaged his legacy will be enjoined from suing the executors for it in the county court, and the fund will be ordered to be brought into court.—Neighbour v. Brown, M. R. 26 L. J. Ch. 670 (1858).

In short, wherever a person is unconscientiously attempting to make a court of law an instrument of injustice, equity will restrain his proceedings, either totally or partially, even though they have gone on to judgment.

The injunction may, upon a proper case being presented to the court, be granted at any stage of the proceedings at law. Thus an injunction will be granted to stay trial: after verdict to stay judgment; after judgment to stay execution; after execution to stay the money in the hands of the sheriff; in a case of a fi. fa., or to stay the delivery of possession, in case of a writ of ha. fa. po.

The injunction is called common when it is obtained upon an ex parte case supported by affidavit, defendant not having appeared to or answered the bill; all other injunctions are called special.

Proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts will be restrained upon special application wherever those courts attempt to enforce a trust, or anything in the nature of a trust.

Wherever parties are resident within a country, the courts of such country have full authority to act upon them personally with respect to the subject of suits in another country, as the ends of justice may require; and with that view to order them to take, or to omit to take, any steps or proceedings in any court of justice, whether in the same country or in any foreign country.

A special injunction will be granted to stay waste. See WASTE.

In all cases in which a bill for an injunction will lie, equity, upon the principle of preventing multiplicity of suits, will compel an account of, and satisfaction for, waste or damage already committed, as consequential to the injunction.

Purpresture or pourpresture, which is any encroachment upon the royal demesne lands, will be restrained upon an information at the suit of the attorney-general.

When both parties to a suit in a foreign country are resident within another country, the courts of equity of the latter may act in personam upon those parties, and direct them by injunction to proceed no further in such suit, or to take certain steps in such suit as the ends of justice may require.

As to nuisances. Amongst the public nuisances, which will be restrained either upon information or at the suit of a private person, who is immediately grieved by them, may be enumerated all obstructions to highways and bridges, public rivers and harbours, and in general everything that renders the enjoyment of life and property hazardous and uncomfortable. In the case of a private nuisance, there must be such an injury as from its nature is not susceptible of being adequately compensated for by damages at law, or such as from its continuance or permanent mischief must occasion a constantly recurring grievance, which cannot be otherwise adequately prevented than by an injunction; as where the injury is irreparable, or where injury to health or trade, destruction of the means of subsistence, or permanent ruin to property, may or will ensue from the wrongful act, e. g. the darkening or obstruction of ancient lights of a dwelling-house, the blocking-up of watercourses, the diversion of streams from mills, the back flowage on mills, the pulling down of the banks of rivers, and thereby exposing adjacent lands to inundation, or neighboring mills to destruction, &c.

The piracy of a copyright, or the invasion of a patent, can be restrained, and the court will direct an account of the books printed, and the profits made by the infringer.

A special injunction may be obtained to restrain the following acts:—The publication of letters, for the writer of a letter has a joint property in it with the person to whom it is addressed, the receiver having only a special property in it; it is a gift to him for the purpose of reading and keeping, but ultra the purposes for which it was sent, the property of the letter remains in the sender, and therefore cannot be published, either for profit or otherwise, without the writer's consent;—the improper use by one man of the trade-marks or name of another person, for to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia, by which purchasers may be induced to believe that the goods are the manufacture of another person, cannot be allowed; and an alien will be protected in the use of his trade-mark, although it is applied to goods not usually sold by him in this country (the Collins Company v. Reeves, 28 Law. J. Ch. 56);—the disclosure of secrets, acquired in the course of a confidential employment;—the alienation of property;—the negotiation of bills of exchange and promissory notes, obtained by fraud or collusion;—the unjust transfer of stock;—the receipt of dividends;—the sale of specific chattels; the vexatious alienation of real property pendente lite;—the sale of trust property;—the sale of equitable property of wives by husbands;—the presentation to a benefice;—the appointment of a minister to a dissenting chapel;—the indorsement of the registry or the sailing of a ship;—the removal of timber;—the breach of covenants;—to protect a ward of court from removal, marriage, or improper influence;—the unconscientious setting up of a legal title;—a partner intermeddling with the partnership effects, as by accepting or negotiating bills in the name of the partnership for his own private purposes, or from attempting unjustly to dissolve the partnership;—a solicitor attempting to give up one party in order to act for another party in a suit;—and lastly, railways have given rise to many questions as to the duty of equity to interfere, and prevent mischiefs to private property by an excess, or abuse, or misapplication of the corporate powers of the companies.

The practice of the Court of Chancery with respect to injunctions for the stay of proceedings at law is now, so far as the nature of the case will admit, assimilated to the practice with respect to special injunctions generally, and such injunctions may be granted upon interlocutory applications, supported by affidavit, in like manner as other special injunctions are granted. The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, empowers the Court of Chancery to award damages to an injured party, even in addition to or in substitution for an injunction. See Smi. Ch. Pr. 745.

The legislature has empowered the superior courts at common law to grant injunctions in certain cases by the following statutes:—

The Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 42, enacts, that in any action in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record at Westminster and in Dublin for the infringement of letters-patent, it shall be lawful for the court in which such action is pending, if the court be then sitting, or if the court be not sitting, then for a judge of such court on the application of the plaintiff or defendant respectively, to make an order for an injunction, inspection, or account, and to give such direction respecting such action, injunction, inspection, and account, and the proceedings therein respectively, as to such court or judge may seem fit.

This section gives the courts of common law the same power with respect to injunction, inspection, and account as the Court of Chancery. The Queen's Bench, upon application after verdict and damages recovered, refused to order an account of goods sold, in infringement of a patent previously to the bringing of the action, as the damages, though nominal in amount, must be taken to cover all loss previously incurred by the plaintiff; but made an order for an account of profits accruing after the action was brought, and for payment of the amount to the plaintiff.

The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, empowers the Court of Common Pleas, on summary application, to enjoin railway or canal companies impeding or delaying the facility of receiving or forwarding traffic. See the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 226, and Cobbett v. Ludlam, 11 Exch. 446 (1855), as to rendering injunctions more effectual.

By the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, it is provided, that in all cases of breach of contract or other injury, where the party injured is entitled to maintain and has brought an action, he may claim a writ of injunction against the repetition or continuance of such breach of contract or other injury, or the committal of any breach of contract or injury of a like kind, arising out of the same contract, or relating to the same property or right; and he may also in the same action include a claim for damages or other redress (s. 79).

The writ of summons in such action is to be in the same form as the writ of summons in any personal action, but on every such writ and copy thereof there is to be endorsed a notice that in default of appearance the plaintiff may, besides proceeding to judgment and execution for damages and costs, apply for and obtain a writ of injunction (s. 80).

The proceedings in such action are to be the same, as nearly as may be, and subject to the like control, as the proceedings in an action to obtain a mandamus under the provisions contained in the act (ss. 68-77); and in such action judgment may be given that the writ of injunction do or do not issue, as justice may require; and in case of disobedience such writ of injunction may be enforced by attachment by the court, or, when such courts shall not be sitting, by a judge (s. 81).

It shall be lawful for the plaintiff at any time after the commencement of the action, and whether before or after judgment, to apply ex parte to the court or a judge for a writ of injunction to restrain the defendant in such action from the repetition or continuance of the wrongful act or breach of contract, or injury of a like kind, arising out of the same contract, or relating to the same property or right; and such writ may be granted or denied by the court or judge upon such terms as to the duration of the writ, keeping an account, giving security, or otherwise, as to such court or judge shall seem reasonable and just, and in case of disobedience such writ may be enforced by attachment by the court, or when such court shall not be sitting, by a judge. Any order, however, for a writ of injunction made by a judge, or any writ issued by virtue thereof, may be discharged, or varied, or set aside by the court, on application made thereto by any party dissatisfied with such order (s. 82).

Injury, any wrong or damage done to another, either in his person, rights, reputation, or property.

Inlagare, to admit or restore to the benefit of the law; to in-law, or render law-worthy.

Inlagary, or Inlagation, a restitution of an outlaw to the protection and benefit of the law.

Inlagh, a person within the law's protection, contrary to utlagh, an outlaw.

Inland, demesne land; that which was let to tenants, being denominated outland (utland).

Inland Bill of Exchange, a bill which is payable in the country where it is drawn. Its use in England was not resorted to until the reign of Charles II. See FOREIGN BILL.

Inland Trade, trade wholly carried on at home, as distinguished from Commerce, which see.

Inlantal, Inlantale, demesne or inland, opposed to delantal, or land tenanted.

Inleased, insnared.

Inlegiare, to admit a person to the protection of the law, after undergoing a legal punishment for a delinquency.

In loco parentis (in the place of a parent).

In majore summâ continetur minor.—5 Co. 115.—(A less sum of money is contained in a greater.)

In maximâ potentiâ minima licentia.—Hob. 159.—(In the greatest power there is the smallest license.)

Innamium, a pledge.

Innings, lands recovered from the sea; when rendered profitable they are termed gainage lands.

Innocent conveyances, a covenant to stand seised, a bargain and sale, and release, so called, because since they convey the actual possession by construction of law only, they do not confer a larger estate, in property, than the person conveying possesses, and therefore, if a greater interest be conveyed by these deeds, than a person has, they are only void pro tanto, for the excess. But a feoffment was a tortious conveyance, and therefore, under such circumstances, would have been void altogether, and produced a forfeiture. But by the 4th sec. of the 8 & 9 Vict., c. 106, a feoffment made after October 1, 1845, shall not have any tortious operation. It is therefore an innocent conveyance. See Phillips v. Phillips, 8 Jurist. (N. S.) 145.

Innominate contracts, those which had no particular names, as permutation and transaction.—Civ. Law.

Innkeepers, proprietors of common inns for the accommodation of travellers in general.

All persons are deemed innkeepers who keep houses where a traveller is furnished with every thing which he has occasion for whilst on his way. They are bound to take in all travellers and wayfaring persons, and to entertain them, if they can accommodate them, for a reasonable compensation, provided they behave themselves properly, &c.; and they have a lien upon the goods of their guests for board and lodging, &c.; but the lien does not extend to their persons, or personal clothing in actual wear. Guests are those who are bonâ fide travelling, and not mere neighbors and friends who visit the house occasionally. By the common law, innkeepers are bound to take not merely ordinary care but uncommon care of the goods, money, and baggage of their guests; and they are responsible for the acts of their servants and domestics, as well as for the acts of other guests. They are only liable for the goods brought within their inn, but the goods need not be delivered to the innkeeper, nor is it necessary to give him actual notice that they are in the inn. An innkeeper cannot exonerate himself from liability, save by positive proof that there was no default or negligence in him or his servants; but if a guest take upon himself exclusively the custody of his own goods, or has, by his own neglect, exposed them to peril, he exonerates thereby the innkeeper from liability.—Story's Bail. 470; Calye's case, 8 Rep. 32, and 1 Smith, L. C.

The liability of innkeepers at the common law having been found to press hardly upon them, by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 41, 'An Act to amend the law respecting the Liabilities of Innkeepers, and to prevent certain frauds upon them,' it is enacted that no innkeeper shall, after the passing of this act, be liable to make good to any guest any loss or injury to goods or property brought to his inn not being a horse or other live animal, or any gear appertaining thereto, or any carriage, to a greater amount than the sum of 30*l.*, except in the following cases:—

1. Where such goods or property shall have been stolen, lost, or injured, through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper, or any servant in his employ.

2. Where such goods or property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

Provided always, that in the case of such deposit it shall be lawful for such innkeeper, if he think fit, to require as a condition of his liability, that such goods or property shall be deposited in a box or other receptacle fastened and sealed by the person depositing the same (s. 1). If any innkeeper shall refuse to receive for safe custody, as before mentioned, any goods or property of his guest, or if any such guest shall, through any default of such innkeeper, be unable to deposit such goods or property as aforesaid, such innkeeper shall not be entitled to the benefit of this act in respect of such goods or property (s. 2). Every innkeeper shall cause at least one copy of the 1st section of this act, printed in plain type, to be exhibited in a conspicuous part of the hall or entrance to his inn, and he shall be entitled to the benefit of this act in respect of such goods or property only as shall be brought to his inn, while such copy shall be so exhibited (s. 3). Except where the nature of the provision or the context of the act shall exclude such construction, the word 'inn' shall mean any hotel, inn, tavern, public-house, or other place of refreshment, the keeper of which is now by law responsible for the goods and property of his guests; and the word 'innkeeper' shall mean the keeper of any such place (s. 4).

Innotescimus [fr. innotesco, Lat., to make known], a kind of letters-patent.

In novo casu, novum remedium apponendum est.—2 Inst. 3.—(A new remedy is to be applied to a new case.)

Inns of Chancery, so called, perhaps, because anciently inhabited by such clerks as chiefly studied the framing of writs, which regularly belonged to the cursitors, who were officers of the Court of Chancery. There are nine of them, which are appendages to the inns of court, viz.: Clement's, Clifford's, and Lyon's Inns, belonging to the Inner Temple; Furnival's, Thavies', and Symond's Inn to Lincoln's Inn; New Inn to the Middle Temple; and Barnard's and Staples' Inn to Gray's Inn. These were formerly preparatory colleges for young students, and many were entered in them before they were admitted into the inns of court. See 3 Rep. Pref. 18.

Inns of Court. There are four of them, exercising the right of admitting persons to practise at the bar—the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. 2 Reeves, 360; 3 Rep. Pref. 18. No means of obtaining that rank exists, but that of becoming enrolled as a student in one or other of these inns, and afterwards applying to its benchers for a call to the bar.

By orders of the several societies of Lincoln's Inn, the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and Gray's Inn, the following report has been adopted, and directed to be carried into effect; and the regulations therein suggested are now the rules of the four inns of court.

1. That the four inns of court shall act in concert with each other in the joint establishment and maintenance of an uniform system for the legal education of students before admission to the bar.

2. That a standing committee or council be established, to consist of eight benchers, two to be nominated by each of the inns of court, and of whom four shall be a quorum. The members shall remain in office for two years, and each inn shall have power to fill up any vacancy that may occur in the number of its nominees during that period. To this council shall be entrusted the power and duty of superintending the whole subject of the education of the students, and of arranging and settling the details of the several measures which may be deemed necessary to be adopted.

3. That for the purpose of affording to the students the means of obtaining instruction and guidance in their legal studies, five readerships or professorships shall be established, which shall consist of the three readerships already established by the societies of the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and Gray's Inn—viz. on jurisprudence and the civil law, the law of real property, and the common law—and also of a reader on equity to be named by the society of Lincoln's Inn, and of a readership on constitutional law and legal history to be founded by the four societies jointly. The readers shall be appointed for a period of three years, and the reader on constitutional law and legal history shall be chosen by the standing council.

4. That the duties of the readers (subject to regulation by the standing council) shall consist of the delivery of three courses of lectures in each year, of the formation of classes of students for the purpose of giving instruction in a more detailed and personal form than can be supplied by general lectures, and of affording to students generally advice and directions for the conduct of their professional studies.

5. That the four inns of court shall form a common fund by annual contributions, the amounts of which shall be mutually agreed on, and out of which fund shall be drawn the stipends to be assigned to the readers, and such studentships as shall from time to time be conferred upon students.

6. That the lectures and classes of the readers shall be open to the students of all the societies without distinction, subject to the payments of such fees as are hereinafter directed.

7. That the stipend of each reader shall be three hundred guineas per annum, and such stipends, and also the expense of the studentships, shall be wholly defrayed out of the common fund, to be raised by the contributions of the several societies.

8. That each student shall on admission pay a sum of five guineas, which shall entitle him to attend the lectures of all the readers.

9. That the fund composed of such last-mentioned payments shall be annually divided among the five readers equally, in addition to their stipends.

10. That (subject to regulation by the council) every student shall be at liberty to attend such class as he may think necessary, upon payment of a moderate fee to the reader, but care shall be taken by the council that such fees shall not in any year exceed the sum of three guineas.

11. That for the purposes of education the legal year shall be considered as divided into three terms or periods: one commencing with the 1st of November, and ending on the 22nd of December; the second commencing on the 11th of January, and ending on the 30th of March; and the third commencing on the 15th of April, and ending on the 31st of July, subject to a deduction of the days intervening between the end of Easter and the beginning of Trinity Term.

12. That no student shall be eligible to be called to the bar who shall not either have attended during one whole year the lectures of two of the readers, or have satisfactorily passed a public examination.

13. That public examinations shall be instituted, to be held three times a year, for the examination of all such students as shall be desirous of being examined previously to being called to the bar, and such examination shall be conducted by at least two members of the council jointly with the five readers, and certificates of having honorably passed such examination shall be given to such students as shall appear to the examiners to be entitled thereto.

14. That such examinations shall be held in Michaelmas Term, Hilary Term, and Trinity Term.

15. That as an inducement to students to propose themselves for examination, studentships shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each public examination; and further the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations, and the inns of court to which such students belong may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students, previously to their being called to the bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students they select has been such as entitles them thereto.

16. That at every call to the bar those students who have passed a public examination, and either obtained a studentship or a certificate of honour, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day.

17. That the standing council shall have power to grant dispensations to students who shall have been prevented by any reasonable cause from complying with all the regulations as to the attendance on lectures which shall from time to time be established.

18. That it is expedient that henceforward there should be uniformity of usage at the respective inns of court as to the admission of students as members of those societies.

19. That it is expedient that no attorney at law, solicitor, writer to the signet, or writer to the Scotch courts, proctor, notary public, clerk in Chancery, parliamentary agent, or agent in any court original or appellate, clerk to any justice of the peace, or person acting in any of these capacities, and no clerk of or to any barrister, conveyancer, special pleader, equity draftsman, attorney, solicitor, writer to the signet, or writer of the Scotch courts, proctor, notary public, parliamentary agent, or agent in any court original or appellate clerk in Chancery, clerk of the peace, clerk to any justice of the peace, or of or to any officer in any court of law or equity, or person acting in the capacity of any such clerks, should be admitted a member of any of the said societies for the purpose of being called to the bar, or of practising under the bar, until such person, being on the roll of any court, shall have taken his name off the rolls thereof, nor until he and every other person above named or described shall have entirely and bonâ fide ceased to act or practise in any of the capacities above named or described.

20. That it is expedient that no member of any of the said societies should be allowed to apply for, or take out, any certificate to practise, either directly or indirectly, as a special pleader, or conveyancer, or draftsman in equity, without the special permission of the masters of the bench of each society respectively, and that no such permission should be granted until the member applying shall have kept twelve terms.

21. That such permission should only be granted for one year from the date thereof, but may be renewed annually by order, as aforesaid.

22. That it is expedient that no person be allowed to obtain any such certificate unless he shall have attended such lectures, or passed such an examination, as under the preceding rules would be necessary to entitle him to be called to the bar.

23. That it is expedient that the following forms should be adopted by the said societies on applications for admission as members:—

I, ● of aged , the son of of , in the county of (add father's profession, if any, and the condition in life and occupation, if any, of the applicant) , do hereby declare that I am desirous of being admitted a member of the honorable society of for the purpose of keeping terms for the bar, and that I will not, either directly or indirectly, apply for or take out any certificate, to practise directly or indirectly, as a special pleader, or conveyancer, or draftsman in equity, without the special permission of the masters of the bench of the said society.

And I do hereby further declare that I am not an attorney at law, solicitor, a writer to the signet, a writer of the Scotch courts, a proctor, a notary public, a clerk in Chancery, a parliamentary agent, an agent in any court original or appellate, a clerk to any justice of peace, nor do I act, directly or indirectly, in any such capacity, or in the capacity of clerk of or to any of the persons above described, or as clerk of or to any officer in any court of law or equity.

Dated this day of

(Signature)

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that we believe the above named to be a gentleman of respectability, and a proper person to be admitted a member of the said society.

Treasurer, or in his absence by two benchers.

24. That it is expedient that every member of the said societies should have kept twelve terms before being called to the bar, unless any term or terms shall have been dispensed with under the 15th preceding rule.

25. That it is expedient that every member of the said societies should have attained the age of twenty-one before being called to the bar.

26. That it is expedient that members of the said societies, who shall at the same time be members of the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, London, or Durham, or of the Queen's University in Ireland, should be enabled to keep terms by dining in the halls of their respective societies any three days in each term.

27. That members of the said societies, who shall not at the same time be members of the said Universities, should be enabled to keep terms by dining in the halls of their respective societies, any six days in each term.

28. That it is expedient that no day's attendance in the respective halls should be available for the purpose of keeping term, unless the member so attending shall have been present at the grace before dinner, during the whole of dinner, and until the concluding grace shall have been said.

29. That it is expedient that no member of any of the said societies, desirous of being called to the bar, should be so called until the name and description of such candidate shall have been placed upon the screens hung in the halls, benchers' rooms, and treasury or steward's offices, of each society, fourteen days in term before such call.

30. That it is expedient that the name and description of every such candidate should be sent to the other inns of court, and should also be screened for the same space of time in their respective halls, benchers' rooms, and treasury or steward's offices.

31. That it is expedient that the above regulations as to screening names, &c., should be applied to members seeking certificates to practise as special pleaders, conveyancers, or equity draftsmen.

32. That it is expedient that no call to the bar should take place except during term; and that such call should be made on the same day by the several societies, namely, on the sixteenth day of each term, unless such day happen to be Sunday, and in such case on the Monday after.

33. That all the foregoing rules and regulations shall come into operation on the first day of Trinity Term now next ensuing, and shall apply to all persons entering as students on and after that day, and also to all existing students who shall not by the first day of Trinity Term next have kept more than four terms; but all other students shall, if they desire it, be admitted to the benefit of the lectures and classes, and be entitled to submit themselves to the public examinations upon the same terms, and subject to the same regulations, as are hereby made applicable to students entering on and after the first day of Trinity Term, 1852.

The committee have abstained from framing any scheme, or making any suggestion as to the fees or dues charged by the inns of court to their respective members, or the deposits on the entrance of students, as they consider that these are matters of internal arrangement, which may with more propriety be left to the discretion and regulations of the societies respectively.

Inquest, judicial inquiry.

Inquest, Coroner's. See CORONER.

Inquest of office, an inquiry made by the king's (or queen's) officer, his sheriff, coroner, or escheator, virtute officii, or by writ sent to them for that purpose, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitles the king to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels. In order to avoid the possession of the Crown acquired by the finding of such office, the subject may have his petition of right, monstrans de droit, or traverse, as the case may be.—4 *Step. Inquilinus, the hirer of a house.—Civil Law.

Inquirendo, an authority given to some official person to institute an inquiry concerning the Crown's interests.

Inquiry, Court of, sometimes appointed by the Crown to ascertain the propriety of resorting to ulterior proceedings against a person charged before a court-martial.—1 Bl. Com. 418, note by Mr. Justice Coleridge.

Inquiry, Writ of, a judicial process addressed to the sheriff of the county in which the venue in an action is laid, stating the former proceedings in the action, and 'because it is unknown what damages the plaintiff has sustained,' commanding the sheriff that, by the oath of twelve honest and lawful men of his county, he diligently inquire the same, and return the inquisition into court. This writ is necessary after an interlocutory judgment, the defendant having let judgment go by default, to ascertain the quantum of damages. As the inquest, however, merely informs the court, the court may, in all cases, if it please, assess the damages, and thereupon give final judgment; and it is the practice in actions upon bills of exchange, promissory notes, or bankers' cheques, to refer it to one of the masters to compute the amount of principal and interest without a writ of inquiry. If the computation of damages be not a mere matter of calculation, the court will not refer it to one of the masters, but the plaintiff must sue out his writ of inquiry.—2 *Chit. Arch. Inspectator, a prosecutor or adversary.

Inspection, examination, sight of a thing.

Trial by Inspection was resorted to when, for the greater expedition of a cause, some point or issue, being either the principal question, or one arising collaterally out of it, and being evidently the object of sense, was decided by the judges of the court upon the evidence of their own senses. Obsolete.

Inspection of written documents. Where a plaintiff declares upon a written instrument not under seal, or where an action is founded upon such an instrument, the defendant may, in general, have a copy of it, by applying to a judge at chambers, who will order a copy of it to be forthwith delivered to the defendant, and all proceedings, in the meantime, to be stayed. 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1427.

Also where a defendant is possessed of any written instrument, of which it is material that a plaintiff should have inspection, a judge at chambers, under particular circumstances, will order that such plaintiff may have leave to inspect it; that the defendant shall furnish a copy of it at the plaintiff's expense, and that the defendant shall produce it at the trial, if called upon to do so, or that he shall produce it to the plaintiff's attorney, in order that he may ascertain the names of the witnesses, so as to subpœna them. Inspector, an overseer.

Inspectors of Mines. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 151; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 79.

Inspectorship, Deed of, an instrument entered into between an insolvent debtor and his creditors, appointing one or more person or persons to inspect and oversee the winding-up of such insolvent's affairs on behalf of the creditors.

Inspeximus (we have inspected), the first word of an ancient charter, a royal grant. An exemplification of the inrolment of a charter or of letters patent is called an inspeximus. Co. Litt. 225 b.; Page's case, 5 Rep. 52.

Installation, the ceremony of inducting or investing with any charge, office, or rank, as the placing a bishop into his see, a dean or prebendary into his stall or seat, or a knight into his order.

Instalment, a portion of a debt. When a debt is divided into two or more parts, payable at different times, each part is called an instalment, and the debt is said to be payable by instalments. It is a frequent condition in bonds, warrants of attorney, &c. Also giving possession of an ecclesiastical dignity, and is correlative to a rector or vicar's induction to a benefice.

Instance, that which may be insisted on at one diet or course of probation.—Scotch term.

Instance Court of Admiralty. See ADMIRALTY.

Instans est finis unius temporis et principium alterius.—Co. Litt. 185.—(An instant is the end of one time and the beginning of another.)

Instanter, immediate; at once.

Trial instanter is had where a prisoner between attainder and execution pleads that he is not the same who was attainted.—4 Step. Com. 554.

When a party is ordered to plead instanter, he must plead the same day.

Instar dentium [Lat.] (like teeth).

In statu quo (in the condition in which it was).

Instaurum, a stock of cattle.

Instirpare, to plant or establish.

In stirpes (according to lineage).

Institor, a consignee or factor; one who superintends the business of a store or shop.

Institorial power, the charge given to a clerk to manage a shop or store.—1 Bell. Com. 385.

Institute, a commentary, a treatise. Also, in Scotland, a person to whom an estate is first given by destination or limitation.

Institutes of Lord Coke, four volumes by Lord Coke, published A.D. 1628. The first volume is a very extensive comment upon a treatise of tenures, compiled by Littleton, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, in the reign of Edward IV. This comment is a rich mine of valuable common law learning, collected and heaped together from the ancient reports and year-books, but greatly defective in method. It is usually cited by the name of Co. Litt. or as 1 Inst. The second volume is a comment upon many old acts of parliament, without any systematic order; the third a more methodical treatise of the pleas of the Crown; and the fourth an account of the several species of courts. These are cited as 2, 3, or 4 Inst. without any author's name.—1 Bl. Com. 73.

Institution, used in four senses:—(1) Laws, rites, and ceremonies enjoined by authority, as permanent rules of conduct or of government. (2) Putting a clerk into possession of a spiritual benefice, previous to which the oaths against simony and of allegiance and supremacy are to be taken. It is a conveyance or commitment of the cure of souls by the bishop to the incumbent, whereby the benefice becomes filled. It is thus performed: the clerk kneels before the ordinary or commissary having a deputation for that purpose, whilst he reads the words of the institution out of a written instrument, drawn for this purpose, with the episcopal seal appended, which the clerk holds in his hand during the ceremony.

The act of presentation only gives the clerk a right ad rem, but institution gives him a right in re, when he becomes parson as to the spirituality, and may celebrate divine service, and enter on the parsonage house and glebe, and take the profits of the benefice, though he cannot grant, or let, or claim a freehold in them, or bring an action for them till induction.

Institution being given to a clerk, a distinct and particular entry of it should be made in the public register of the ordinary, that is, not only that such a clerk received institution on such a day, and in such year, but if the clerk were presented, then at whose presentation, and whether in his own right or in the right of another, and if collated or presented by the Crown, then whether jure pleno or per lapsum temporis. This has been the practice as far back as any ecclesiastical records remain, and it is of great importance that such entries be duly made and carefully preserved, both to the clerk, whose letters of institution may be destroyed or lost, and to the patron, whose title may suffer in time to come by the want of proper evidence, upon whose presentation it was that institution was given.—Mirehouse on Advow. p. 187. (3) A society for promoting any public object, as a charitable or benevolent institution. (4) In the civil law, the appointment of a debtor as heir, i. e. to carry on the legal existence, the persona, of the testator.

Institutiones. It was the object of Justinian to comprise in his Code and Digest, or Pandects, a complete body of law. But these works were not adapted to the purposes of elementary instruction, and the writings of the ancient jurists were no longer allowed to have any authority, except so far as they had been incorporated in the Digest.—Smi. Dict. of Antiq. It was, therefore, necessary to prepare an elementary treatise, and the Institutes were published a month before the Pandects, A.D. 533, and designed as an elementary introduction to legal study (legum cunabula). The work was divided into four books, subdivided into titles.

The Institutes are the elements of the Roman law, and were composed, at the command of the Emperor Justinian, by Trebonian, Dorotheus, and Theophilus, who took them from the writings of the ancient lawyers, and chiefly from those of Gaius, especially from his Institutes and his books called Aureorum (i. e. of important matters).

The Institutes are divided into four books, each book into several titles, and each title into several parts—the first of which is called Principium, and those which follow, paragraphs. The first book of the Institutes has twenty-six titles, the second twenty-five, the third thirty, and the fourth eighteen; in all ninety-one titles. First, it is to be observed that the division is triple—Persons, Things, and Actions, under which the subject matter of the four books of Institutes is comprised. The first book treats of the Rights of Persons; the second, third, and five first titles of the fourth, of Things; and Actions are the subjects treated of from the sixth title of the fourth book to the end. The first book treats of Persons, but it is from Title III. only; for the first two, which are by way of introduction, explain Justice, Law, and Right; the meaning of the Right or State of Persons follows in two divisions, which complete the remaining part of the first book. According to the chief Division of Persons treated of from Title III. to VIII. of the first book, men are either Free or Slaves.

The condition of all slaves is the same, but it is not so with freemen, of whom some are free by birth, others are made so by emancipation.

The second Division of Persons begins at Title VIII. of the first book, and is explained in the following titles of that book. It is of independent persons, and of such as are under the power of another. The power of masters over their slaves, and of fathers over their children, is first treated of; after which is shown the manner of acquiring paternal power, viz., by marriage, legitimation, and adoption, and how that power may be lost.

Title XIII. to the end of the first book treats of Pupils, or such as have Tutors; of Minors, or such as have Curators appointed to them; and lastly, of persons who are of age, subject to nobody, and masters of their own actions.

Tutorship is treated of under three heads: (1) the definition or division thereof into testamentary, legal, and dative; (2) the effect of the tutorship, which consists in putting the pupil under the care of his tutor, so that he may do nothing that will bind him, unless with the authority of his tutor; (3) the manner in which tutorships expire.

In Title XX. matters relating to Curators, and in the last three of this book, three things common to Tutors and Curators, are treated of. These are, the security they are obliged to give to indemnify pupils and minors; the lawful causes exempting persons from being tutors or curators; and lastly, those for which they may be deprived of their offices.

After Persons, Things are treated of, in Title I. of the second book to Title VI. of the fourth, under three heads—their divisions, the way of acquiring them, and the means by which they become due to us.

The divisions are principally two: by the first, Things are divided into those which belong to individuals and those which do not; by the second they are corporeal or incorporeal. The property in Things is acquired either by the Natural Law or by the Civil Law.

The ways of acquiring introduced by Natural Law are explained in Title I. of the second book.

Title II. explains the second Division of Things, which are either corporeal or incorporeal; and here real or personal services, as being incorporeal things, are treated of. The modes of acquisition introduced by the Civil Law follow; and the property of Things, according to the Civil Law, acquired either by particular or universal title.

The civil means of acquiring by particular title are Adjudication, Usucaption, or Prescription; and the express provision of the law, as where the title to a Thing is derived directly from the law, as in the case of a gift by a testament, the validity of which was declared by the law of the Twelve Tables or a donatio mortis causâ, or gift in contemplation of death.

Title VI. treats of Usucaption or just Usurpation and the conditions which it requires, and Title VII. of Donations; Titles VIII. & IX. of those who have the power of alienation, and of those through whom property may be acquired.

The mode of acquiring property in Things, according to the Civil Law, by universal title, are—Inheritance; the Prætorian Succession, called Bonorum Possessio; Acquisition, by Adrogation; the Adjudication of the goods of a deceased person in order to make the enfranchisement of slaves effectual; and the two abrogated Successions per bonorum venditionem, and ex Senatûs-Consulto Claudiano. These six modes of acquisition occupy from Title X. of the second to Title XIV. of the third book. As every succession is either testamentary or legal, and the legal takes place only in default of the testamentary, the question of Testaments takes precedence, and extends from Title X. to the end of the second book, and may be reduced under three principal heads.

The first relates to the four conditions required to make a testament valid: viz. (1) It must be made in the form prescribed by law, from which, however, the military testament is exempt. (2) The testator must possess the power of making a will. (3) He must either institute or disinherit such children as are sub potestate. (4) He must institute an heir, for without that the testament is null. Now, the institution may be to the first, second, or third degree. That in the first is called properly Institution; that in the second or other degree is termed Substitution; and it is divided into vulgar, pupillary, quasi-pupillary. The second head shows how a testament duly made may afterwards become null, which is the subject-matter of Titles XVII. and XVIII. of the second book.

Title III. shows how a Testament made in the form prescribed by law, and not invalidated, may be carried into execution, which is done by the heir accepting the succession. Now this may be in several ways, according to the different qualities of the heir: for some are necessary heirs, or such as are obliged to accept the inheritance; others are both necessarii and sui hæredes, and others extranei hæredes.

The entering on inheritance makes the heir liable, not only for the debts of the deceased, but to the liquidation of legacies and fiduciary bequests, which are the subject of the second book from Title XX. to the end. In the first place the meaning of a legacy is explained; what actions a legatee may bring on account of the legacy left him; what things may be disposed of by legacy, and to whom. It is then shown how legacies are taken away or transferred; and lastly, the diminution to which they are subject by Lex Falcidia.

Fiduciary Bequests are treated of in Titles XXIII. and XXIV. In the first of these the nature of the universal Fiduciary Bequest, called Inheritance by the Fiduciary Bequest, is explained; and in the other the nature of a particular Fiduciary Bequest. The last title of the book speaks of Codicils.

Testamentary Successions, which take place before all others, are explained in the last fifteen titles of the second book.

Title I. of the third book and those that follow treat of Legal successions, admissible only in default of Testamentary.

According to the Ancient Law, there were but two kinds of legal heirs; for by the provisions of the law of the Twelve Tables, the legal succession, or succession to intestates, fell only to two sorts of heirs, which were, first, hæredes sui, or domestic heirs, and in default of them to the next of kin on the father's side, termed Agnati. These make the subject-matter of the two first titles of this book. In process of time, another sort of legal succession was created by the Senatûs-Consultum Tertullianum and Orphitianum contained in Titles III. and IV.

Title V. treats of the Succession to Intestates, to which the cognati, or female side, were admitted by the Prætorian equity according to the degree of cognation. This necessitates an examination of the degrees of kindred, which immediately follows in Title VI.

The Title, in conclusion, treats of those who were excluded from this Prætorian succession, because allied to the deceased only by a servile relation.

The succession of Freemen is the subject of Title VII., and the assignment of Freemen that of Title VIII.

After disposing of the question of Succession, which by the Civil Law is the first mode of acquiring property by universal title, the other five modes which followed, by the Prætorian succession, are called bonorum possessio; acquisition by adrogation; the adjudication of the goods of a deceased person, in order to make the enfranchisement of slaves effectual; and the two abrogated successions, per bonorum venditionem and ex Senatûs-Consulto Claudiano. Titles IX.–XII.

We then come to the last point relating to Things, viz.: Obligations, being the means whereby things accrue to us. The principal division of them is into two kinds. Civil, or those constituted by the laws, or at least recognised by the civil law, and Prætorian, or those which the prætor has established by his own authority, also called honorary. There is a further division of obligations into four kinds, for they arise (1) ex contractu; (2) quasi ex contractu; (3) ex maleficio; (4) quasi ex maleficio—Title XIII., 1 & 2. First, it is shown what an Obligation is, and the causes producing a mixed Obligation—that is, partly natural and partly civil, as a contract, quasi-contract, crime, or offence.

Contracts are called Nominate, that is, distinguished by certain proper names authorized by law, which assigns to them a particular action; or Innominate, that is, having no special name or particular designation, and completed only by one of the parties fulfilling the agreement. Nominate Contracts are formed in four ways: by delivery of the things agreed, by solemn and formal words, by writing, and by the sole consent of the contractors. Innominate Contracts are made by the delivery of the thing itself, of which kind are loans, deposits, and pledges, all of which are treated of in Title XV.

Contracts made by words are called Stipulations, the general principles of which are first explained, in order to arrive at the chief divisions of that kind of contract. The first division is of the Stipulation made between the person who demands and him that promises, and of that made between several who stipulate or promise together.

The second is of the Stipulation made by free persons or slaves.

The third is of Stipulations that are called judicial, prætorian, common, or conventional.

The fourth is of Stipulations called equitable (utiles), or good in law, and of Stipulations which are inutiles.

The fifth is of Principal and Accessory Stipulations, called sureties or cautions.

Title XXII. treats of Written Contracts. The five following Titles explain contracts made by the sole consent of the contracting persons, which are the contracts of purchase, of hire, of partnership, and of mandate.

Title XXVIII. treats of Quasi-Contracts; the next shows how Obligations are to be acquired; and the last in what manner they may be extinguished. Having spoken of Obligations which arise from contracts or quasi-contracts, the first five titles of the fourth book treat of obligations arising out of faults and quasi-faults —delicta or quasi delicta. The rest of the book, from Title VI. to Title XVI. is devoted to the treatment of Actions.

It begins with the definition of an Action, which is followed by several divisions explained in Title VI.; according to the chief and principal of which, Actions are either real, personal, or mixed.

The second is of Actions derived from the Civil Law, and such as have their foundations in Prætorian equity.

The third is of Actions by which the plaintiff seeks to recover a thing belonging or due to him, and of those by which the punishment of the offender is only aimed at, and of such actions by which both are intended.

The fourth division is of Actions by which the plaintiff sues for the single, double, treble, or quadruple value of the thing he would recover.

The fifth is of Actions of good faith, strict law, and arbitrary.

The sixth is of Actions in which the total of what is due is sued for, and in which the defendant is either not sued for the whole, or in consequence of which he is condemned to pay only so much as his circumstances will allow.

After these divisions of Actions are explained, Title VII. treats of certain Prætorian Actions which are liable to and which proceed from contracts made by slaves or children under power, or else by persons to whom they have committed the management of their affairs.

Title VIII. speaks of Actions that may be brought against a master for an error committed by his slave.

Title IX. of Actions to which the owner is liable for the hurt or damage done by a beast.

Title X. directs what persons are to be employed in carrying on lawsuits.

Title XI. treats of the security required of the parties to a suit, or such as appear for them.

Title XII. sets forth the nature of temporary or perpetual Actions, and what Actions the law affords to or against heirs; which those are which lie in their favor, and not against them; and lastly those which are neither allowed for nor against them.

Title XIII. treats of Exceptions, and Title XIV. of Replications.

Title XV. of Injunctions, or Actions to put the party injured into possession.

Title XVI. declares the Penalty against such as commence vexatious suits.

Title XVII. prescribes Rules to be observed by judges in the several suits brought before them.

And Title XVIII. the last, shows what were the Roman public prosecutions which every one had free liberty to institute, and of which the penalties were established by the laws called Judiciorum Publicorum Leges.

The Institutes are quoted in the same manner as the Code and Pandects, with the letter I. or Inst. thus § si adversus 12, I. De Nuptiis, is nothing more than twelve paragraphs of the Title De Nuptiis, which, on reference to the index, will be found to be the tenth of the first book. This is usually now cited I. 1, 10, 12. 1 Colqu. R. C. L. s. 61; Sand. Just.

Instrument [instrumentum, Lat., fr. instruo, to prepare, or provide], a formal legal writing, e.g. a record, charter, deed, or written agreement.

Instrumenta, writings not under seal.

In subsidium (in aid).

Insucken multures, a quantity of corn paid by those who are thirled to a mill. See THIRLAGE.

Insufficiency, an answer in Chancery is said to be insufficient when it does not specifically reply to the specific charges in the bill.

If a plaintiff conceive an answer to be insufficient, he may take exceptions to it in writing, stating the parts of the bill which he alleges are not answered, and praying that the defendant may, in such respect, file a further and full answer to the bill. Scandal and impertinence in an answer must be disposed of before its sufficiency can be considered.

After the filing of a defendant's answer, the plaintiff has six weeks within which he may file exceptions thereto for insufficiency, otherwise the answer will be deemed sufficient. For the practice, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 344, and Consol. Ord. 1860, xvi.

In suo quisque negotio hebetior est quam in alieno.—Co. Litt. 377.—(Every one is duller in his own business than in the business of another.)

Insuper, debiting or charging a person in an account.—Exchequer term.

Insurance, the act of providing against a possible loss, by entering into a contract with one who is willing to give assurance, that is, to bind himself to make good such loss, should it occur. In this contract, the chances of benefit are equal to the insurer and the insured. The first actually pays a certain sum, and the latter undertakes to pay a larger, if an accident sho[uld] or happen. The one, therefore, renders his property secure; the other receives money with the probability that it is clear gain. The instrument by which the contract is made is denominated a policy, and the stipulated consideration a premium. It is generally made to provide against risks at sea, losses by fire, or death.

Insurances are effected sometimes by companies or societies, and sometimes by individuals, the risk being in either case diffused amongst a number of persons. Companies formed for carrying on this business have generally a large subscribed capital, or such a number of proprietors as enables them to raise, without difficulty, whatever sums may at any time be required to make good their losses. Societies of this sort do not limit their risks to small sums; that is, they do not often refuse to insure a large sum upon a ship, a house, a life, &c. The magnitude of their capitals affords them the means of easily defraying a heavy loss; and their premiums being proportioned to their risks, their profit is, on an average, independent of such contingencies.

(I.) The practice of marine insurance, no doubt, from the extraordinary hazard to which property at sea is exposed, seems to have long preceded insurances against fire and upon lives.

While all fire and life insurances are made at the risk of companies, which include within themselves the desirable requisites of security, wealth, and numbers, a large proportion of marine insurances is made at the risk of individuals who are called underwriters.

Until 1824, all firms and companies, with the exception of the two chartered companies—the Royal Exchange and London, were prohibited by law from taking marine insurances. Towards the latter part of that year the prohibition was removed, and the business of marine insurance was placed on the same legal footing as other descriptions of business. There are at present many marine insurance companies in London—viz. the two old chartered companies, the Royal Exchange and London; two established immediately upon the passing of the act of the year 1824; the Alliance and the Indemnity Mutual; the Marine, established in 1836; and the General Maritime and Neptune, established in 1839, and several others since formed.

The underwriters meet in a subscription room at Lloyd's. The joint affairs of the subscribers to these rooms are managed by a committee chosen by the subscribers. Agents (who are commonly styled Lloyd's agents) are appointed in all the principal ports of the world, who forward regularly to Lloyd's accounts of the departures of ships from and arrivals at such ports, as well as of losses and other casualties; and, in general, all such information as may be supposed of importance towards guiding the judgments of the underwriters. These accounts are regularly filed, and are accessible to all the subscribers. The principal arrivals and losses are besides posted in two books, placed in two conspicuous parts of the room; and also in another book, which is placed in an adjoining room, for the use of the public at large.

The rooms are open from ten o'clock in the morning till five o'clock in the afternoon; but the most considerable part of the business is transacted between one and four.

Those merchants and shipowners who manage their own insurance business procure blank policies, which they fill up so as to meet the particular case, and submit them to those underwriters with whom they are connected, by whom they are subscribed or rejected. Each policy is handed about in this way until the amount required is complete.

Many merchants and shipowners do not transact their own insurance business. They give their orders for insurance to others, who undertake it for them, and are responsible for its proper management. These latter persons are called insurance-brokers, and some of them manage the business of a number of principals. To them likewise are transmitted the orders for insurance from the outports and manufacturing towns. They charge the whole premium to their principals, and their profit consists in 5 per cent. upon the premium, 12 per cent. upon the money that they pay to the underwriters, and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. that they deduct from all the claims they recover from the underwriters.

But where the business is transacted with a company, this inducement to consign their insurance business to brokers, if not destroyed altogether, is, at all events, very much diminished. Any party having property to insure has merely to go to the manager of the company and state the particulars of the risk to be insured; the premium being agreed upon, the manager writes out a memorandum for the policy, which the party signs, and he is thus effectually insured.

Besides the individual underwriters and companies above noticed, there are clubs or associations formed by shipowners, who agree, each entering his ships for a certain amount, to divide among themselves the losses which may be sustained by any of them. These clubs are institutions of long standing, but, since the alteration of the law in 1824, appear to be on the decline. Their formation originated in a twofold reason:—1st, that the underwriters charged premiums more than commensurate with the risk; and, 2ndly, that they did not afford adequate protection.

The losses against which a merchant or shipowner is not protected by an insurance in this country, are the following:—

(1) Acts of our own Government. (2) Breaches of the revenue laws. (3) Breaches of the law of nations. (4) Consequences of deviation. (5) All losses arising from unseaworthiness. Unseaworthiness may be caused in various ways, such as want of repair, want of stores, want of provisions, want of nautical instruments, insufficiency of hands to navigate the vessel, or incompetency of the master. (6) All loss arising from unusual protraction of the voyage. (7) All loss to which the shipowner is liable when his vessel does damage to others. (8) Average clause.—This description of loss is described in the following clause of the policy:—'Corn, fish, salt, seed, flour, and fruit, are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins, are warranted free from average under five per cent. unless general, or the ship be stranded; and all other goods, also the ship and freight, are warranted free from average under three per cent. unless general, or the ship be stranded.'

Average is a name applied to certain descriptions of loss, to which the merchant and shipowner are liable. There are two kinds of average—general and particular:

(a) General average comprehends all loss arising out of a voluntary sacrifice of a part of either vessel or cargo, made by the captain for the benefit of the whole. Thus, if a captain throw part of his cargo overboard, cut from an anchor and cable, or cut away his masts, the loss so sustained being voluntarily submitted to for the benefit of the whole, is distributed over the value of the whole ship and cargo, and is called general average.

(b) Particular average comprehends all loss occasioned to ship, freight, and cargo, which is not of so serious a nature as to debar them from reaching their port of destination, and when the damage to the ship is not so extensive as to render her not worth repairing.

Losses where the goods are saved, but in such a state as to be unfit to forward to their port of destination, and where the ship is rendered unfit to repair, are called 'partial or salvage loss.' The leading distinction between particular average and salvage loss is, that, in the first, the property insured remains the property of the assured; the damage sustained, or part thereof, as the case may be, being made good by the insurer; and, in the second, the property insured is abandoned to the insurer, and the value insured claimed from him, he retaining the property so abandoned, or its value. See CONSTRUCTIVE TOTAL LOSS.

All the elements that can by possibility enter into general average may be classed under four heads:—(1) Sacrifice of part of the ship and stores. (2) Sacrifice of part of the cargo and freight. (3) Remuneration of service required for general preservation. (4) Expense of raising money to replace what has been sacrificed, and to remunerate services. See Arnould on Marine Insurance.

(II.) Insurance against fire is a contract of indemnity, by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium received by him, either in a gross sum or by annual payments, undertakes to indemnify the insured against all loss or damage he may sustain in his houses or other buildings, stock, goods, and merchandise, by fire, during a specified period.

Insurances against fire are hardly ever made by individuals, but almost always by corporations or joint-stock companies; of which there are several in all the considerable towns throughout the empire.

The conditions on which the different offices insure are contained in their proposals, which are printed on the back of every policy; and it is in most instances expressly conditioned that they undertake to pay the loss, not exceeding the sum insured, 'according to the exact tenor of their printed proposals.'

It often occurs that no one office will insure to the full amount required by a person who has a large property; and he in such a case, to cover his own interest, is obliged to insure at different offices. But, in order to prevent the frauds that might be practised by insuring the full value in various offices, there is, in the proposals issued by all the companies, an article which declares that persons insuring must give notice of any other insurance made elsewhere upon the same houses or goods, that the same may be specified and allowed by indorsement on the policy, in order that each office may bear its rateable proportion of any loss that may happen; and that unless such notice be given the insurance will be void.

The risk commences in general from the signing of the policy, unless there be some other time specified. Policies of insurances may be annual, or for a term of years at an annual premium; and it is usual for the office, by way of indulgence, to allow fifteen days after the expiration of each year for the payment of the premium for the next year; and provided the premium be paid within that time, the insured is considered as within the protection of the office. A policy of insurance is not in its nature assignable, nor can it be transferred without the express consent of the office.

Insurances are generally divided into common, hazardous, and doubly hazardous.

(a) Common insurances.

(1) Buildings covered with slates, tiles, or metals, and built on all sides with brick or stone, or separated by party walls of brick or stone, and wherein no hazardous trade or manufacture is carried on, or hazardous goods deposited.

(2) Goods in buildings as above described, such as household goods, plate, jewels in private use, apparel, and printed books, liquors in private use, merchandise, stock, and utensils in trade, not hazardous. The premium upon these, with certain exceptions, is 1*s.* 6*d.* per cent. per annum.

(β) Hazardous insurances.

(1) Buildings of timber or plaster, or not wholly separated by partition-walls of brick or stone, or not covered with slates, tiles, or metals, and thatched barns and outhouses having no chimney, nor adjoining to any building having a chimney; and buildings falling under the description of common insurance, but in which hazardous goods are deposited, or some hazardous trade or manufacture is carried on.

(2) Ships and craft, with their contents (lime barges, with their contents, alone excepted). At 2*s.* 6*d.* per cent. per annum, with certain exceptions.

(γ) Doubly hazardous insurances.

(1) All thatched buildings having chimneys or communicating with or adjoining to buildings having one, although no hazardous trade shall be carried on, nor hazardous goods deposited therein: and all hazardous buildings, in which hazardous goods are deposited, or hazardous trades carried on.

(2) All hazardous goods deposited in hazardous buildings and in thatched buildings having no chimney, nor adjoining to any building having a chimney. At 4*s.* 6*d.* per cent. per annum, with certain exceptions.

That part of the business of life insurance which consists of granting annuities upon lives is treated of under interest and annuities, so that we have only to treat in this place of the insurance of sums payable at the death of the insurers or their nominees.

(III.) Life insurance companies are divided into three classes. The first class consists of corporations or joint-stock companies, who undertake to pay fixed sums upon the death of the individuals insuring with them; the profits made by such companies being wholly divided among the proprietors. Of this class are the Royal Exchange, Globe, &c. The second class are also corporations or joint-stock companies with proprietary bodies; but instead of undertaking, like the former, to pay certain specified sums upon the death of the insured, they allow the latter to participate to a certain extent along with the proprietors in the profits made by the business. The mode in which this sort of mixed companies allots the profits granted to the insured is not the same in all; and in some, the principle on which the allotment is made is not disclosed. The Rock, Sun, Alliance, Guardian, Atlas, &c. belong to this mixed class. The third species of company is that which is formed on the basis of mutual insurance. In this sort of company there is no proprietary body distinct from the assured; the latter share among themselves the whole profits of the concern, after deducting the expenses of management. The Equitable Society, the Amicable, the Norwich Life, &c. belong to this class.

In order to hinder the growth of gambling transactions upon life insurance, it was enacted by 14 Geo. III. c. 48, that no insurance shall be made by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, on the life or lives of any person or persons, or any other event or events whatsoever, wherein the person or persons for whose use or benefit, or on whose account such policy or policies shall be made, shall have no interest, or by way of gaming or wagering; and that every insurance made contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever (s. 1). It shall not be lawful to make any policy or policies on the life or lives of any person or persons, or other event or events, without inserting in such policy or policies the name or names of the person or persons interested therein, or for what use, benefit, or on whose account such policy is so made or underwrote (s. 2). In all cases where the insured has an interest in such life or lives, event or events, no greater sum shall be recovered or received from the insurer or insurers than the amount or value of the interest of the insured in such life or lives, or other event or events (s. 3). As to abatement of income-tax in respect to insurance on lives, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, continued by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 5.—McCull. Comm. Dict.; 2 Selw. N. P. 941. See DOUBLE INSURANCE.

Insurance Companies. See 'The Companies' Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, and JOINT-STOCK COMPANY.

Intakers, receivers of stolen goods.

Integer [Lat.] (whole; untouched).

Intendant, a person who has the charge, direction, and management of some office or department.

Intendment of law [intellectus legis, Lat], the understanding, intention, and true meaning of law.—1 Inst. 78.

Intentio, a count.—Bract.

Intentione, a writ that lay against him who entered into lands after the death of a tenant in dower, or for life, &c., and held out to him in reversion or remainder.—F. N. B. 203.

Intentio cœca, mala.—2 Buls. 179.—(A hidden intention is bad.)

Intentio inservire debet legibus, non leges intentioni.—Co. Litt. 314.—(Intention ought to be subservient to the laws; not the laws to the intention.)

Intentio mea imponit nomen operi meo.—Hob. 123.—(My intent gives a name to my act.)

Inter alia (amongst other things).

Inter canem et lupum (between the dog and the wolf), twilight; called also mock shadow, daylight's-gate, and betwixt hawk and buzzard. Cowel.

Intercedere, to become bound for another's debt.—Civ. Law.

Intercommoning, where the commons of two manors lie together, and the inhabitants of both have time out of mind depastured their cattle promiscuously in each. See COMMON.

Inter cuncta leges et percunctabere doctos.—Co. Litt. 232.—(In all things, you will inquire of laws and learned men.)

Interdict, Interdiction, an ecclesiastical censure prohibiting the administration of divine ceremonies, either to particular persons or in particular places, or both. This severe censure has been long disused.

In the civil law interdicts were certain formulæ by which the process ordered or forbade something to be done; they were chiefly employed in disputes as to possession, or quasi possession, and were nearly equivalent to our writ of injunction. For a division of them, see Sand. Just. 589.

Interdiction of fire and water [interdictio ignis et aquæ, Lat.], banishment by an order that no man should supply the person banished with fire or water, the two necessaries of life.

Interesse termini, an executory interest, being a right of entry which a lessee acquires in land by virtue of a demise. It cannot, before entry, be enlarged by a release from the lessor (except the term be created by an assurance under the Statute of Uses, which does not require an entry), because the lessee has no actual estate; yet such a release would extinguish the rent and also the interesse termini. The lessee can assign this interest, but it will not merge in the freehold subsequently acquired.—Walk. Conv. 34, and 3 Pres. Conv. 121.

Interest, a sum of money paid or allowed for the loan or use of some other sum, lent for a certain time according to a fixed rate. The sum lent is called the principal, the sum agreed on as interest is called the rate per cent., and the principal and interest added together is called the amount. It is distinguished into simple and compound. (1) Simple interest is that which is paid for the principal or sum lent, at a certain rate or allowance made by law, or agreement of parties. (2) Compound interest is when the arrears of interest of one year are added to the principal, and the interest for the following year is calculated on that accumulation. See USURY, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90.

At Athens, Solon, amongst other reforms, abolished the law by which a creditor was empowered to sell or enslave a debtor, and prohibited the lending of money upon a person's own body. (Plut. Sol. c. xv.) No other restriction, we are told, was introduced by him, and the rate of interest was left to the discretion of the lender. (Lys. in Theom. xvii.) The only case in which the rate was prescribed by law was in the event of a man separating from his lawful wife, and not refunding the dowry he had received with her. Her trustees or guardians could in that case proceed against him for the principal, with interest, at the rate of eighteen per cent.

The Licinian laws, among the Romans, by which the grievances of debtors were to a certain extent redressed, did not lay any restriction on the rate of interest that might be legally demanded: and it is clear from various circumstances (Niebuhr, ii., p. 603), that the scarcity of money at Rome after the taking of the city by the Gauls had either led to the actual abolition of the old uncial rate (unciarium fenus) of the Twelve Tables, or caused it to fall into disuse. Nine years, however, after the passing of these laws (Liv. vii. 16) the rate of the Twelve Tables was re-established, and any higher rate prohibited by the bill (rogatio) of the tribunes Duilius and Mænius.

In cases of fenus nauticum, however, or bottomry, as the risk was the money-lender's, he might demand any interest he liked while the vessel on which the money was lent was at sea; but after she reached harbor, and while she was there, no more than the usual rate of 12 per cent. on the centesima could be demanded.

Justinian made it the legal rule for fenus nauticum under all circumstances.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Also, a chattel-real, as a lease for years, or a future estate (1 Inst. 46), or indeed any estate, right, or title in realty.—1 Inst. 345.

Interest upon interest, compound interest.

Interest reipublicæ ut pax in regno conservetur, et quæcunque paci adversentur providè declinentur.—2 Inst. 158.—(It concerns the state, that peace be preserved in the kingdom, and that whatever things are averse to peace be prudently declined.)

Interest reipublicæ ne maleficia remaneant impunita.—Jenk. Cent. 31.—(It concerns the state, that crimes should not remain unpunished.)

Interested witness, a witness is not excluded from giving evidence by reason of his interest in the matter in question.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, s. 1.

Interim order, one made in the meantime, and until something is accomplished.

Interlineation, the insertion of any matter in a written instrument after it is engrossed or executed. A deed may be avoided by interlineation, unless a memorandum be made thereof at the time of the execution or attestation. If there be any interlineation or erasure in the jurat of an affidavit, that affidavit cannot be read.—140 R. H. T. 1853; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1552.

Interlocutory, that which is decided during the course of an action or suit, and does not determine it; intermediate; not finally or wholly determinate. Thus, in equity it seldom happens that the first decree can be final and conclude the cause; for, if any matter of fact be strongly controverted, the court is so sensible of the deficiency of trial by written depositions, that it will not bind the parties thereby, but pronounces an interlocutory decree, usually directing the matter to be tried by jury in a court of common law. But see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27. So at common law a judgment in default of the defendant not pleading is interlocutory in all cases in which the sole object of the action is damages, and not until the damages are ascertained by a writ of inquiry before the sheriff, or an order to compute before the master, can a final judgment be signed.

Interloper [fr. inter, Lat., between, and loopen, to run], a person who intercepts the trade of others.

International copyright. By 7 Vict. c. 12 (repelling 1 & 2 Vict. c. 59), it shall be lawful for her Majesty, by any order in council, to direct that, as respects all or any particular class or classes of the following works (namely), books, prints, articles of sculpture, and other works of art, to be defined in such order, which shall after a future time, to be specified in such order, be first published in any foreign country to be named in such order, the authors, inventors, designers, engravers, and makers thereof respectively, their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, shall have the privilege of copyright therein during such period or respective periods as shall be defined in such order, not exceeding, however, as to any of the above-mentioned works, the term of copyright, which authors, inventors, designers, engravers, and makers of the like works respectively, first published in the United Kingdom, may be then entitled to under the copyright acts (see COPYRIGHT), or under any acts which may hereafter be passed in that behalf. See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 58; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 95; and 15 Vict. c. 12.

International law, the law of nations, strictly so called, was in a great measure unknown to antiquity, and is the slow growth of modern times, under the combined influence of Christianity and commerce. When the Roman empire was destroyed, the Christian world was divided into many independent sovereignties, acknowledging no common head and connected by no uniform civil polity. The invasions of the barbarians of the north, the establishment of the feudal system in the middle ages, and the military spirit and enterprise cherished by the crusades, struck down all regular commerce, and surrendered all private rights and contracts to mere despotic power. It was not until the revival of commerce on the shores of the Mediterranean, and the revival of letters and the study of the civil law by the discovery of the Pandects, had given an increased enterprise to maritime navigation, and a subsequent importance to maritime contracts, that anything like a system of international justice began to be developed. It first assumed the modest form of commercial usages; it was next promulgated under the more imposing authority of royal ordinances; and it finally became, by silent adoption, a generally connected system, founded in the natural convenience and asserted by the general comity of the commercial nations of Europe. The system, thus introduced for the purposes of commerce, has gradually extended itself to other objects, as the intercourse of nations has become more free and frequent. New rules, resting on the basis of general convenience and enlarged sense of national duty, have, from time to time, been promulgated by jurists, and supported by courts of justice, by a course of juridical reasoning, which has commanded almost universal confidence, respect, and obedience, without the aid, either of municipal statutes or of royal ordinances, or of international treaties.

It is plain that the laws of one country can have no intrinsic force, proprio vigore, except within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of that country. They can bind only its own subjects, and others who are within its jurisdictional limits; and the latter only while they remain therein. No other nation, or its subjects, are bound to yield the slightest obedience to those laws. Whatever extra-territorial force they are to have is the result, not of any original power to extend them abroad, but of that respect which, from motives of public policy, other nations are disposed to yield to them, giving them effect, as the phrase is, sub mutuæ vicissitudinis obtentu, with a wise and liberal regard to common convenience and mutual benefits and necessities. Boullenois has laid down the same exposition as a part of his fundamental maxims. 'Of strict right,' says he, 'all the laws made by a sovereign have no force or authority except within the limits of his domains. But the necessity of the public and general welfare has introduced some exceptions in regard to civil commerce.' De droit étroit, toutes les lois, que fait un souverain, n'ont force et autorité que dans l'étendue de sa domination; mais la nécessité du bien public et général des nations a admise quelques exceptions dans ce qui regarde le commerce civil (1 Boul. Prin. Gén. p. 4). And, accordingly, it is laid down by all publicists and jurists as an incontestable rule of public law, that one may with impunity disregard the law pronounced by a magistrate beyond his own territory. Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur is the doctrine of the Digest (l. 2, t. 1, l. 20); and it is equally as true in relation to nations as the Roman law held it to be in relation to magistrates. The other part of the rule is equally applicable. Idem est, et si supra jurisdictionem suam velit jus dicere; for he exceeds his proper jurisdiction when he seeks to make it operate extra-territorially as a matter of power. Vattel has deduced a similar conclusion from the general independence and equality of nations, very properly holding that relative strength or weakness cannot produce any difference in regard to public rights and duties; that whatever is lawful for one nation is equally lawful for another; and whatever is unjustifiable in one is equally so in another. And he affirms in the most positive manner (what indeed cannot well be denied), that sovereignty, united with domain, establishes the exclusive jurisdiction of a nation within its own territories, as to controversies, as to crimes, and as to rights arising therein.—B. 2, c. vii., s. 84.

The first and most general maxim or proposition in international jurisprudence is that which has been already adverted to: that every nation possesses an exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction within its own territory.

Another maxim or proposition is, that no state or nation can, by its laws, directly affect or bind property out of its own territory, or bind persons not resident therein, whether they are natural-born subjects or others. This is a natural consequence of the first proposition.

From these two maxims or propositions there flows a third, and that is, that whatever force and obligation the laws of one country have in another, depend solely upon the laws and municipal regulations of the latter; that is to say, upon its own proper jurisprudence and polity, and upon its own express or tacit consent.

Huberus has laid down three axioms, which he deems sufficient to solve all the intricacies of the subject:—I. That the laws of every empire have force only within the limits of its own government, and bind all who are subjects thereof, but not beyond those limits. II. That all persons who are found within the limits of a government, whether their residence is permanent or temporary, are to be deemed subjects thereof. III. That the rulers of every empire, from comity, admit that the laws of every people, in force within its own limits, ought to have the same force everywhere, so far as they do not prejudice the powers or rights of other governments, or of their citizens. Interpellation, a citation or summons.

Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 58. This statute comprehends two classes of persons:—

(1) Persons generally.

After reciting that 'it often happens that a person sued at law for the recovery of money or goods, wherein he has no interest, and which are also claimed of him by some third party, has no means of relieving himself from such adverse claims but by a suit in equity against the plaintiff and such third party, usually called a bill of interpleader, which is attended with expense and delay,' enacts, 'that upon application made by or on behalf of any defendant sued in any of His Majesty's Courts of Law at Westminster, or in the Court of Common Pleas of the county palatine of Lancaster, or in the Court of Pleas of the county palatine of Durham, in any action of assumpsit, debt, detinue, or trover, such application being made after declaration and before plea, by affidavit, or otherwise, showing that such defendant does not claim any interest in the subject-matter of the suit, but that the right thereto is claimed, or supposed to belong to some third party, who has sued, or is expected to sue, for the same; and that such defendant does not in any manner collude with such third party, but is ready to bring into court, or to pay or dispose of the subject-matter of the action, in such manner as the court, or any judge thereof, may order or direct; it shall be lawful for the court, or any judge thereof, to make rules or orders calling upon such third party to appear and to state the nature and particulars of his claim, and maintain or relinquish his claim, and upon such rule or order to hear the allegations as well of such third party as of the plaintiff, and in the meantime to stay the proceedings in such action, and finally, to order such third party to make himself defendant in the same or some other action, or to proceed to trial on one or more feigned issue or issues (see FEIGNED ISSUE); and also to direct which of the parties shall be plaintiff or defendant on such trial, or with the consent of the plaintiff and such third party, their counsel or attornies, to dispose of the merits of their claims and determine the same in a summary manner, and to make such other rules and orders therein, as to costs and all other matters, as may appear to be just and reasonable' (s. 1).

'The judgment in any such action or issue as may be directed by the court or judge, and the decision of the court or judge, in a summary manner, shall be final and conclusive against the parties, and all persons claiming by, from, or under them' (s. 2).

'If such third person shall not appear upon such rule or order to maintain or relinquish his claim, being duly served therewith, or shall neglect or refuse to comply with any rule or order to be made after appearance, it shall be lawful for the court or a judge to declare such third party, and all persons claiming by, from, or under him, to be for ever barred from prosecuting his claim against the original defendant, his executors or administrators (saving nevertheless the right or claim of such third party against the plaintiff), and thereupon to make such order between such defendant and the plaintiff, as to costs and other matters, as may appear just and reasonable' (s. 3).

'No order shall be made in pursuance of this act by a single judge of the Court of Pleas of the said county-palatine of Durham, who shall not also be a judge of one of the said courts at Westminster; and every order to be made in pursuance of this act by a single judge, not sitting in open court, shall be liable to be rescinded or altered by the court, in like manner as other orders made by a single judge' (s. 4).

'If upon application to a judge, in the first instance, or in any later stage of the proceedings, he shall think the matter more fit for the decision of the court, it shall be lawful for him to refer the matter to the court, and thereupon the court shall and may hear and dispose of the same in the same manner as if the proceeding had originally commenced by rule of court instead of the order of a judge' (s. 5).

'All rules, orders, matters, and decisions to be made and done in pursuance of this act (except only the affidavits to be filed), may, together with the declaration in the cause (if any), be entered of record, with a note in the margin expressing the true date of such entry, to the end that the same may be evidence in future times, if required, and to secure and enforce the payment of costs directed by any such rule or order; and every such rule or order so entered shall have the force and effect of a judgment (except only as to becoming a charge on any lands, tenements, and hereditaments), and in case any costs shall not be paid within fifteen days after notice of the taxation and amount thereof given to the party ordered to pay the same, his agent or attorney, execution may issue for the same by fieri facias, or capias ad satisfaciendum, adapted to the case, together with the costs of such entry, and of the execution, if by fieri facias; and such writ and writs may bear teste on the day of issuing the same, whether in term or vacation; and the sheriff or other officer executing any such writ shall be entitled to the same fees, and no more, as upon any similar writ grounded upon a judgment of the court' (s. 7).

This act does not take away the remedy by bill of interpleader; and if proceedings in equity have been instituted, the court will not afterwards interfere.

(2) Sheriffs and other officers.

The act, after reciting that 'difficulties sometimes arise in the execution of process against goods and chattels, issued by or under the authority of the said courts, by reason of claims made to such goods or chattels by assignees of bankrupts, and other persons, not being the parties against whom such process has issued, whereby sheriffs and other officers are exposed to the hazard and expense of actions, and it is reasonable to afford relief and protection in such cases to such sheriffs and other officers,' enacts, 'that when any such claim shall be made to any goods or chattels taken, or intended to be taken, in execution under any such process, or to the proceeds or value thereof, it shall and may be lawful to and for the court from which such process issued, upon application of such sheriff or other officer, made before or after the return of such process, and as well before as after any action brought against such sheriff or other officer, to call before them, by rule of court, as well the party issuing such process as the party making such claim, and thereupon to exercise for the adjustment of such claims, and the relief and protection of the sheriff or other officer, all or any of the powers or authorities hereinbefore contained, and make such rules and decisions as shall appear to be just, according to the circumstances of the case, and the costs of all such proceedings shall be in the discretion of the court' (s. 6).

By the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45, s. 2, 'it shall be lawful for any judge of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, with respect to any such process issued out of any of those courts, or for any judge of the said Court of Common Pleas of the county palatine of Lancaster, or Court of Pleas of the county palatine of Durham (being also a judge of one of the said three superior courts), with respect to process issued out of the said courts of Lancaster and Durham respectively, to exercise such powers and authorities for the relief and protection of the sheriff or other officer as may, by virtue of the said last-mentioned act, be exercised by the said several courts respectively, and to make such order therein as shall appear to be just, and the costs of such proceedings shall be in the discretion of such judge.'—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1380. As to appeals in interpleader cases from the County Courts, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 68.

Interpleader, Bill of. Where two or more persons claim the same debt, duty, or thing from another, by different or separate interests, and he, not claiming any right in the matter, and not knowing to which of the claimants he ought rightly to render such debt, duty, or thing, fears that he may suffer injury from their conflicting claims, he can file a bill of interpleader, which is in its nature an original bill for relief.

The plaintiff should set forth specifically in his bill his clear title to maintain the suit (negativing all personal interest or claim in the subject of the controversy) and also the several claims of the several defendants, that they may appear to be of the same nature and character, and the fit subject of such a bill. Bills of interpleader (at least independently of statutable provisions) do not ordinarily lie, except in cases of privity of some sort between all the parties, such as privity of estate, or title, or contract, and where the claim by all is of the same nature and character. Where the claimants assert their rights under adverse titles and not in privity, and where their claims are of different natures, the bill is not maintainable. Thus, if an estate be put up for sale by auction, and A. becomes the purchaser, and pays his deposit, and then, by order of the same owner, it is put up again for sale, and B. becomes the purchaser, and pays his deposit; such a case is not a proper subject of interpleader if each demand his deposit from the stakeholder; for A. and B. do not claim in privity, and their deposits are distinct. The prayer of the bill is that the defendants may be compelled to set forth their several titles and to interplead, i. e. to contest inter se their respective claims, so that the court may adjudge to whom such debt, duty, or other thing belongs, in order that such plaintiff may be indemnified.—Mitf. Eq. Pl. 48. If actions at law have been commenced against the plaintiff, he may also pray that the claimants be restrained from proceeding until the right be determined; and if any money is due from him he should offer to pay it into court, otherwise either of the defendants may move the court for an order that it be paid into court, all further proceedings to be stayed in the meantime.

The plaintiff must annex to his bill an affidavit that there is no collusion between him and any of the defendants; as without this the bill is demurrable. If the bill be filed by an officer of a company on behalf of the company, he must annex a like affidavit, and add that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the company do not collude with the defendants.

The bill generally praying an injunction to restrain the proceedings of the claimants, or either of them, at law, the interpleading plaintiff may, immediately on filing his bill, accompanied by an affidavit of no collusion, without waiting for the appearance of the defendants, and even before they have been served, move ex parte for an injunction to restrain all proceedings at law commenced against him until further order, offering at the same time to pay the money in dispute into court.

If the defendants do not deny the statements of the bill, the ordinary decree is that the defendants interplead; and the plaintiff then withdraws from the suit. But the defendants, or either of them, are or is at liberty to contest and deny the allegations in the bill, or to set up distinct and independent facts in bar of the suit; and, in such a case, the plaintiff must reply to the answer, and close the proofs in the usual manner, before he can bring the cause to a hearing between himself and the defendants; and at the hearing he can only insist (assuming such to be his right) upon a decree, that the defendants do interplead.—Sto. Eq. Pl. 345. Should the question between the defendants be in a state for decision, the court will then settle it; otherwise an issue is directed to be tried by a jury at law, or it is referred to the chief clerk, whichever course is the better suited to the nature of the case.

The plaintiff is entitled to his costs out of the fund in court, or, there being none, from the defendant, if he wrongfully occasion the suit.

But although a bill of interpleader, strictly so called, lies only where the party applying claims no interest in the matter, yet there are many cases where a bill, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, will lie by a party claiming an interest to ascertain and establish his own rights, where there are other conflicting rights between third persons. Thus, if a plaintiff is entitled to equitable relief against the owner of property, and the legal title thereto is in dispute between two or more persons, so that he cannot ascertain to which it actually belongs, he may file a bill against the several claimants in the nature of a bill of interpleader for his relief.—Sto. Eq. Jur. c. xx. ad fin.

Interregnum, the time during which a throne is vacant in elective kingdoms; for in such as are hereditary, as in England, there can be no interregnum, the sovereign, in his artificial capacity, never dying.

Interrogatory, a question in writing put to a witness, who answers it upon oath; his answer is taken down in writing, and being signed by the witness, is called a deposition.

1 Wm. IV. c. 22, extends the provisions of 13 Geo. III. c. 63, relating to examinations of witnesses in India, to all other colonies and places under the dominion of the Crown, and to all actions in the courts at Westminster.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 329, et seq.

As to interrogatories for the examination of the litigants at law, see C. L. P. A. 1854, ss. 51, 52, and as to interrogatories on an attachment, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1711.

As to plaintiff's interrogatories in Chancery, by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 10, the bill is no longer to contain interrogatories.

Within eight days after the time limited for a defendant's appearance, the plaintiff in any suit commenced by bill may, if he require an answer to it from any defendant, file in the Record Office interrogatories duly prepared and signed by counsel, and engrossed on parchment, for the examination of the defendant or defendants, or such of them from whom he may require an answer, and deliver to the defendant or defendants so required to answer (if appearing in person), or to his or their solicitor (if appearing by one), an office copy (written on paper, and bearing a 5*s.* stamp), of such interrogatories, or of such of them as may be applicable to the particular defendant or defendants; but no defendant can be called upon or required to put in any answer to a bill, unless the interrogatories have been filed, and a copy of them delivered to him or his solicitor, within the time above mentioned, or within such further time as the court may think fit to direct. The copy to be delivered must be examined with the original, and the number of folios counted by the clerk of records and writs, who, on finding that such copy is duly stamped and properly written, is to mark the same as an office copy. When one solicitor appears for several defendants it seems that only one copy of the interrogatories need be served on him for all such defendants, provided the note at the foot is sufficiently explicit.

If a defendant do not appear in person, or by his own solicitor, within the time allowed for that purpose by the rules of the court, and the plaintiff has filed interrogatories for his examination, the plaintiff may deliver a copy of such interrogatories so examined and marked as already mentioned to the defendant, at any time after the time allowed to such defendant to appear, and before his appearance in person or by his own solicitor; or the plaintiff may deliver a copy of such interrogatories duly examined and marked to the defendant or his solicitor, after the appearance of such defendant in person or by his own solicitor, but within eight days after such appearance.

After the time allowed for filing interrogatories for the examination of any defendant, no interrogatories are to be filed for the examination of such defendant without special leave of the court, to be applied for upon notice of motion.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 12, and Consol. Ord. 1860, xi.

Where a defendant is not required to answer and shall not answer a bill, he is, however, to be considered as having traversed its allegations, which must therefore be established by evidence.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 26.

As to defendant's interrogatories for plaintiff's examination, any defendant in any suit, whether commenced by bill or by claim (but in suits commenced by bill which the defendant is required to answer, not until after he shall have put in a sufficient answer to the bill), may, without filing any cross-bill of discovery, file in the record office interrogatories for the examination of a plaintiff, to which must be prefixed a concise statement of the subjects on which a discovery is sought, and deliver a copy of such interrogatories to the plaintiff or his solicitor; and such plaintiff is bound to answer such interrogatories in like manner as if the same had been contained in a bill of discovery filed by the defendant against him on the day when such interrogatories are filed, and as if the defendant to such bill of discovery had on the same day duly appeared; and the practice of the court with reference to excepting to answers for insufficiency, or for scandal, extends and is applicable to answers put in to such interrogatories; provided that in determining the materiality or relevancy of any such answer, or of any exception thereto, the court is to have regard, in suits commenced by bill, to the statements contained in the original bill, and in the answer which may have been put in thereto by the defendant exhibiting such interrogatories for the examination of the plaintiff, and in suits commenced by claim to the statements therein, and in any affidavits which may have been filed either in support thereof or in opposition thereto: provided also, that a defendant, if he shall think fit so to do, may exhibit a cross-bill of discovery against the plaintiff instead of filing interrogatories for his examination.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 19.

It would appear, then, that if a defendant seeks relief from a plaintiff, he must exhibit his cross-bill; should he, however, require a discovery merely from him, but at an early period of the suit, he should file interrogatories pursuant to the just quoted statute, the practice relating to which is the same as in the case of a plaintiff's interrogatories.

Where a defendant deems a plaintiff can give testimony to facts in support of the merits of his defence, he would then examine him as a witness by virtue of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 2.

Interruptio multiplex non tollit præscriptionem semel obtentam.—2 Inst. 654.—(Frequent interruption does not take away a prescription once secured.)

Intervention. A third person, not originally a party to a suit, but claiming an interest in the matter, may interpose at any stage of the suit, in defence of his own interest, whenever it is affected, either as to his person or property. The proceeding is called an intervention, and was peculiar to the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts. It is now practised in suits in the Courts of Probate, Divorce and Admiralty. An intervener must take the cause in which he intervenes as he finds it at the time of his intervention, and can only do what he of right may have done had he been a party in the first instance. The court may relax this rule under special circumstances.

By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, s. 7, the Queen's proctor, with the sanction of the attorney-general, and by leave of the court, may intervene in any suit for the dissolution of marriage, and pray that the petition may be dismissed, or if a decree nisi has been pronounced, may show cause against such decree being made absolute upon the ground of collusion, or any other person may intervene at any stage of the suit and oppose the prayer of the petition, or show cause against the decree nisi, on the ground that the parties have been guilty of collusion, or that material facts have been suppressed. For the mode of proceeding, see the Further Rules, 16 to 21.

In testamentis ratio tacita non debet considerari sed verba solum spectari debent, adeo per divinationem mentis a verbis recedere durum est. (In wills, an unexpressed meaning ought not to be considered, but the words alone ought to be looked to; so hard is it to recede from the words by guessing at the intention.)

Intestate, a person who has left no will. Swinburne, Godolphin, and others of the earlier writers on the subject of wills, apply the term 'intestate' to a person who dies leaving a will, but not appointing an executor; the term testament being formerly applied only to a will which appointed an executor. Intrare mariscum, to drain a marsh or low ground, and convert it into herbage or pasture.

Intrinsecum servitium, common and ordinary duties within the lord's court.—Kenn. Glos.

Intromission, the assuming possession of property belonging to another, either on legal grounds or without such authority, which latter is termed vitious intromission.—Scotch Law.

Intruder. See INTRUSION.

Intrusion, the entry of a stranger after a particular estate of freehold is determined before him in reversion or remainder. Where a tenant for life dies seised of certain lands or tenements, and a stranger enters thereon after such death of the tenant, and before any entry of him in remainder or reversion, such stranger is called an intruder.

The writ of entry on intrusion is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27. See ABATEMENT.

Intrusion, Information of. See INFORMATION.

Inure, to take effect.

Inveritare, to make proof of a thing.

Invest, to give possession, or lay out money. When a trustee, executor, or administrator shall not, by some instruments creating his trust, be expressly forbidden to invest any trust-fund on real securities, in any part of the United Kingdom, or on the stock of the Bank of England or Ireland, or on East India Stock, it shall be lawful for such trustee, executor, or administrator, to invest such trust-fund on such securities or stock; and he shall not be liable on that account as for a breach of trust, provided that such investment shall in other respects be reasonable and proper.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 32.

Investiture, the open delivery of seisin or possession.

Invito domino [Lat.] (without the assent of the lord).

In vocibus videndum non à quo sed ad quid sumatur.—Ellesm: Postn. 62.—(In discourses it is to be seen not from what, but to what, it is advanced.)

Invoice [perhaps corrupted fr. envoyez, Fr., send], a written account of the particulars of goods sent or shipped to a purchaser, factor, &c. with the value, or prices, or charges annexed.

Involuntary manslaughter, the unintentional killing of a person by one engaged in an unlawful, but not felonious, act.—4 Step. Com. 148. See HOMICIDE.

Invultuacio, a species of witchcraft, the perpetrators of which were called vultivoli, and are described by John of Salisbury, De Nugis Curial. l. 1. c. xii. To this superstition Virgil (Pharmaceutria) alludes:—

Limus ut hic durescit, et hæc ut cera liquescit,
Uno eodemque igni, sic nostro Daphnis amore.

Of the practice of this superstition, both in England and Scotland, many instances are to be met with; among the most remarkable that of Eleanor Cobham, Duchess of Gloucester, and Stacey, servant to George, Duke of Clarence.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

I. O. U. a written acknowledgment of a debt, so called because it commences with those letters, which custom has substituted for the words I owe you, because they have the same sound. The following is the usual form of an I. O. U.:—

'To Mr. A. B.

I. O. U. Twenty Pounds.

C. D.

£20. January 1st, 1863.'

It is a common transaction for the lender of money to take an I. O. U. from the borrower.

If it is in the form above set out it requires no stamp, for it is neither a receipt, agreement, nor promissory note. If, however, it contains a promise to pay the money, it must be stamped as a promissory note; or, as an agreement, if it contain terms of agreement, the subject matter of which is of the value of 5*l.* It should be addressed to the creditor by name, but that is not essential to its validity. It is evidence of an account stated with the creditor, if he is named; or, if he is not named, it is primâ facie evidence of an account stated with the person who produces it. It is not negotiable. Issint [Nor.-Fr.] (thus, so).

Issuable plea, a plea on which a plaintiff may take issue, and go to trial upon the merits.

Issuable Terms, Hilary and Trinity, because in them issues are made up for the assizes. But for town-causes, all the four terms are issuable.

Issue [fr. exitus, Lat.], used in several senses:—

(1) The legitimate offspring of parents. The word issue in a will is either a word of purchase or of limitation, as will best answer the intention of the testator, though in the case of a deed it is universally taken as a word of purchase.—2 Fonbl. Eq. 69.

(2) The profits arising from lands or tenements, amerciaments or fines.

(3) Event, consequence, evacuation, sending forth.

(4) The point in question, at the conclusion of the pleadings between contending parties in a suit or action, when one side affirms and the other denies. The cause is then fit for trial, in order that a decision may be made in the matter. The issue must be material, single, and certain in its quality. An issue is either in fact, and tried by a jury, either common or special, or in law, and then determined by the court in banco. A transcript of the pleadings is called, in an issue in law, the demurrer-book, in an issue in fact, simply the issue; it is delivered to the defendant's attorney, who, if it vary from the pleadings, is entitled to make application to the court to have it set right. The record is afterwards made up, if the issue be one in fact, and taken to trial.—Step. Plead. 24; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 305, 916. See Feigned Issues.

Joint-stock Banks are joint-stock companies formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking. Several Acts of Parliament have been passed from time to time for their regulation. See 7 Geo. IV. c. 46; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 45 (as to Joint Stock Banks in Scotland and Ireland); 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49. They are now regulated by 'The Joint-stock Companies' Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, and are subject to the same law as other joint-stock companies, with the exception of the following special provisions:—The Board of Trade may, upon the application of members holding not less than one-third of the shares of the company, appoint an inspector or inspectors to examine into its affairs and report thereon (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 56). No banking company claiming to issue notes in the United Kingdom is entitled to limited liability in respect of such issue (s. 182). Every banking company existing at the date of the passing of the Act, which registers itself as a limited company, must, thirty days at least previous to obtaining a certificate of registration with limited liability, give notice to all its customers of its intention so to register (s. 188). Every limited banking company, before it commences business, and also on the first Monday in February and in August in every year during which it carries on its business, is required to state in a certain form the capital of the company, and the number of shares into which such capital is divided, and the number issued, the calls made and received, and the liabilities of the company on the preceding 1st of January and July respectively, and the assets of the company on such day. A copy of the statement is to be put up in a conspicuous place in the registered office of the company, and in every branch office (s. 44). See Thring's Law of Joint-Stock Companies; Smith's Mercantile Law; and JOINT-STOCK COMPANY.

Joint-stock Company is an association of a large number of persons united together for the common purpose of carrying on a trade or some useful enterprise capable of yielding profit. The common property of the members, applicable to the purposes of the company, is called its joint-stock, and hence the name Joint-stock Company. The capital is generally divided into equal parts called shares. Each member holds one or more of these, and in proportion to the number held by him is entitled to participate in the profits. A due succession of members is kept up by the transfer of shares by living members to others, or by the transmission of the shares of deceased members to their representatives. The management of the affairs of the company is vested in certain of the members called directors; and the general body of shareholders, beyond exercising a control over the acts of the directors upon special occasions, take no active part in the concerns of the company. Originally joint-stock companies were formed by an instrument called a Deed of Settlement, by which the constitution of the company and the conduct of its affairs were regulated. The courts of law and equity considered companies so formed as ordinary partnerships, and the rights and liabilities of the members inter se, and as between themselves and the public, were determined upon the principles applicable to an ordinary partnership.

From this doctrine of the courts in many instances great inconveniences resulted. Thus, courts of law acting upon the rule that one partner cannot maintain an action against a co-partner, held that the directors could not sue the shareholders for calls, and courts of equity, acting upon the rule that a general account must be taken before one partner can be compelled to pay money to another partner, required the whole of the affairs of the company to be thrown into Chancery before a call could be recovered. Moreover, courts of equity declined to entertain suits for determining disputes between members unless the company consented to a dissolution, and a suit for dissolution was rendered so expensive and difficult, by the necessity of making all the members parties to it, as to be practically unavailable. Again, no action could be maintained against a debtor of the company unless all the shareholders were made plaintiffs. These and other inconveniences induced joint-stock companies in many cases to obtain a private Act of Parliament, or a royal patent, giving them some of the privileges of corporations. Several attempts were made by the legislature to deal with the subject generally, see 16 Geo. IV. c. 91; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 94; 1 Vict. c. 73; but these proving to be utterly insufficient to meet the exigency of the case, in 1844 was passed 'An Act for the Registration and Incorporation of Joint-stock Companies,' 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, now repealed. This Act was followed by others amending it and giving facilities for the winding up of joint-stock companies (see a list of them in 25 & 26 Vict. c. 88, Schedule III., pt. 1). These have all been repealed by 'The Companies' Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, the statute by which joint-stock companies are now regulated. The following is an outline of the chief provisions of the Act, which came into force on the 2nd of November, 1862:—The 4th section enacts that no company, association, or partnership, consisting of more than ten persons, shall be formed after the commencement of this Act, for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking, unless it is registered as a company under the Act, or is formed in pursuance of some other Act, or of letters-patent; and no company, association, or partnership, consisting of more than twenty persons, shall be formed after the commencement of this Act for the purpose of carrying on any business that has for its object the acquisition of gain, unless it is registered as a company under this Act, or is formed in pursuance of some other Act, or of letters-patent, or is a company working mines within and subject to the jurisdiction of the Stannaries. The Act is then divided into nine parts.

Part I. relates to the constitution and incorporation of companies and associations. It provides that any seven or more persons associated for any lawful purpose may, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of the Act in respect of registration, form an incorporated company with or without limited liability. A company may be registered in one of three forms: (a) as a 'company limited by shares,' where the liability of each member is limited to the amount unpaid on his shares; (b) as a 'company limited by guarantee,' where the liability of each member is limited to such amount as he undertakes in the memorandum of association to contribute to the assets of the company if it should be wound up; and (c) an 'unlimited company,' where there is no limit to the liability of the members. A form of memorandum of association appropriate to each case is given, which must be accompanied by articles of association providing for the internal management of the company.

Part II. relates to the distribution of the capital and liability of the members of companies and associations formed under this Act.

Part III. relates to the management and administration of companies and associations.

Part IV. relates to the winding-up of companies and associations formed under the Act, and provides for three distinct systems of winding-up :—

(a) A compulsory winding-up, i. e. a winding-up by a court.

(b) A voluntary winding-up, i. e. by the company itself.

(c) A winding-up partly compulsory and partly voluntary.

Part V. relates to the constitution of the registration office.

Part VI. relates to the application of the Act to companies registered under the Joint-stock Companies' Acts of 1856 and 1857 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47 ; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14), and declares that companies formed under those Acts shall be subject to this Act as if they had been formed under it, and that companies registered but not formed under those Acts, shall be subject to this Act in the same manner as companies registered under Part VII.

Part VII. relates to companies authorized to register under this Act.

Part VIII. contains provisions for the winding-up of unregistered companies, which in all cases must be by the court.

Part IX. contains a repeal of previous Acts relating to the formation and winding-up of companies.

To the Act there are three schedules. The first contains a model code for the regulation of companies ; the second, forms to be used in registration, and forms of deeds of association ; the third contains a list of the Acts repealed by Part IX.

Joint-tenancy. This tenancy is created where the same interest in real or personal property is, by the act of the party, passed by the same matter of conveyance or claim in solido, and not as merchandise, or for purposes of speculation, to two or more persons in the same right, either simply, or by construction or operation of law jointly, with a jus accrescendi, that is, a gradual concentration of property from more to fewer, by the accession of the part of him or them that die to the survivors or survivor, till it passes to a single hand, and joint-tenancy consequently ceases.

This jus accrescendi holds place as well in equity as at law. Equitable estates, therefore, are subject to joint-tenancy, and its properties. The trust as well as the term passes to the survivor ; and if the estate of two joint-tenants is assigned in trust for them, or such a trust is raised by implication, the equitable interest follows the nature of the former legal estate.

The courts of law and equity disfavor this mode of holding property beneficially.

During the feudal rigor, however, and when assurances were simple, joint-tenancy was found to be most useful. It was adopted to prevent dower and courtesy attaching. It avoided wardship, primer seisin, and other feudal imposts of the same description ; for the title by the survivorship is paramount. A conveyance was made to the father and son, or to several co-trustees, of whom the interested owner was one, and a descent was thus avoided. By the Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV., c. 105, no title of dower affects a joint estate, whether legal or equitable.

Anciently, joint-tenancy was favored, because it did not induce fractions of estates.

And now, for the purpose of limitations over, it is much more accommodating than a tenancy in common, unless cross-remainders are expressed or implied. The law itself adopts it sometimes, as in the cases of executors, assignees in bankruptcy, and others, though they differ in some respects from simple joint-tenants.

There may be a joint-tenancy for life, or in fee, or in remainder, but not in tail, unless the donees, being male and female, may lawfully marry ; for if not, the donees possess estates for life only, with several inheritances in tail. An estate cannot be granted to two or more jointly and severally, for severally is repugnant, and they take as joint-tenants.

When an estate is granted to two or more persons without any modifying and disjunctive words, they take, according to the common law rule, as joint tenants. For example, if an estate be granted to A. and B. for their lives, they become joint-tenants of the freehold ; if to A. and B. and their heirs, they are then joint-tenants of the fee. While equity recognizes this rule, yet it has laid down many exceptions to it, amongst the most important of which are the following :—

deceased co-mortgagees, until the money be repaid. Equity then treats the two mortgagees as tenants in common. Where a mortgage is made to trustees, who do not appear in that character on the face of the deed (as it is desirable they should not, lest the title to the land be incumbered with notice of their trust), it is usual to insert a clause providing against the application of this rule of equity to their case.

(3) When partners in trade purchase property for the partnership concern, equity treats them as tenants in common, holding the survivor to be trustee of the legal estate for the personal representatives of the deceased partner as to his share. Wares, merchandise, and stock in trade belonging to partners, survive to the representatives of the deceased partner. The lex mercatoria excludes the jus accrescendi for the benefit of commerce, which is pro bono publico, the maxim being jus accrescendi inter mercatores locum non habet.

A joint-tenancy, being created by the convention of parties, must arise out of the same deed, will or claim, for there must exist a unity of title between them which must be by purchase, and not by mere operation of law, and the estate must vest in them at one and the same time; for a joint-tenancy must subsist ab initio; an estate cannot become a joint-tenancy by the happening of any circumstances ex post facto. The same interest must be given to the parties, for one joint-tenant cannot have one estate in the property as for life, and the other another as for years; and they must hold it by the same undivided possession, for each has an undivided moiety of the whole, and not the whole of an undivided moiety, though since the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 12, the possession of one joint-tenant is no longer to be deemed the possession of the other or others.

Joint-tenants being seised per my et per tout, or, as Coke says, totum conjunctim et nihil per se separatim, enjoy a survivorship (jus accrescendi) which is held to be as good as a right by descent, the title of the survivor being paramount. It is a continuation of the estate by the survivorship of the tenants, the estate passing among the joint-owners without any perceptible degree of transition, but the diminution of the number of persons to enjoy it. The last survivor takes the whole, as if the estate had originally been given to him only, unless any of his companions have conveyed away his own share in his lifetime, which, of course, each can do; so a partial alienation is a severance pro tanto, for alienatio rei præfertur juri accrescendi.

The right of survivorship is necessarily reciprocal: for otherwise there would be different degrees of interest in the same estate, which is inconsistent with the nature of joint-tenancy. A body-corporate, therefore, whose existence has no natural termination, cannot be joint-tenant with a natural person; and as survivorship is necessarily included in joint-tenancy, two corporations cannot be joint-tenants together; for both being considered by the law as of perpetual duration, it is impossible for one to survive the other.

If joint-tenants join in a conveyance, each transfers but his own part. The freehold in joint-tenants is so entire that they cannot grant, nor bargain and sell, nor surrender or devise to each other, much less exchange with or enfeoff one another. No right of dower or curtesy attaches to this estate, for the jus accrescendi is preferred to all charges and incumbrances which do not amount to at least a partial alienation of his share as a lease; and a devise by a joint-tenant, during the existence of the joint-tenancy, is void. The maxim is, jus accrescendi præfertur ultimæ voluntati nec-non oneribus. By the Wills' Act, a general devise passes after-acquired property; lands, acquired jure accrescendi, will, consequently, pass.

A curious question sometimes arises as to what is the law in case it cannot be proved which of two or more joint-tenants is the survivor. In one case, indeed, it was given in favor of him who struggled the longer, both being hanged together.—Broughton v. Randall, Cro. Eliz. 502.

By the Roman law the relative strength of the parties, presumable from age and sex, was adopted as the criterion for asserting the priority of right. And the Code Napoleon has adopted the same principle.

By our courts, however, this rule is not considered applicable. Sir W. Wynne in one case (2 Salk. 593), where a father, his children and wife, all perished by shipwreck, considered it more reasonable, in such cases, to consider all the persons as having died at the same instant, and as being incapable of transmitting rights to each other.

The case of General Stanwix, who, with his daughter, perished by shipwreck (which afforded an interesting topic for the pen of Mr. Fearne, who composed, for amusement, an argument for each of the two claimants, published in his posthumous works) was compromised at the instigation of the court. The personal representatives of the daughter were claimants on one side, and those of the father on the other, the former being entitled in case she survived her father. Where one or two persons, who died under similar circumstances, had the legal right and was in possession, the Master of the Rolls, in Mason v. Mason, 1 Mer. 309, held that the representatives of the party not entitled to the possession were bound to prove that he survived the other, in order to be considered entitled; and Lord Hardwicke appears to have acted on the same ground in a case where husband and wife were shipwrecked together, and the husband, to whom a bill of exchange had been given by his wife's father, had agreed to settle it on her three or four years afterwards, but before that period both were lost. His lordship inclined to think that since the husband had the legal right, in order that the representatives of the wife might claim, they must have proved that she survived. So where a husband appointed his wife executrix and residuary legatee, and both perished together, it was held that administration was to be given to the representatives of the husband, the law favoring the last possessor, the proof of survivorship lying on the other side. And where a husband and his wife and child perished in shipwreck together, administration was granted to the husband's effects as of a widower. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, ss. 13, 19.

All emblements go to the survivor. Judgment and crown-debts against a deceased joint-tenant do not affect the estate in the hands of the survivor; but if a joint-tenant alien so as to sever the jointure, or if he become the survivor or sole owner by release, prior judgments against him become available charges on the property.

The severance and destruction of this estate may be effected in several ways, as—

(1) By a voluntary deed of partition among the tenants agreeing to hold the property in severalty, for this is a disunion of their possession, and they have then but a separate interest in the several parts of the land, and the jus accrescendi is gone.

(2) By alienation without partition, as by one joint-tenant either releasing his share to the other, or conveying it away to a third person, for this is a destruction of the unity of title. A covenant to sell by a joint-tenant severs the estate in equity, provided it can be specifically performed, but not at law.

(3) By accession of interest, either by one joint-tenant purchasing the interest of the others, or by his acquiring the whole estate by survivorship, whereby the unity of interest is dissolved.

(4) By a decree in Chancery upon a bill filed by one joint-tenant, a commission issues to divide the land, and when this has been returned, the court directs a compulsory partition, and orders the execution of reciprocal transfers. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 30; and also 41 Geo. III. c. 109, s. 16; and 1 Wm. IV. c. 65, s. 27.

Jointress, or Jointuress, she who has an estate settled upon her by her husband, to hold during her life, at least, provided she survive him.

Jointure. The original law of dower became among our ancestors, with the increase of alienation, highly inconvenient and obstructive of the free course of conveyances. The legislature, by the 27 Henry VIII. c. 10 (the Statute of Uses), set about a method of diminishing the evil by providing a jointure in lieu of dower. By effect of this statute no widow can claim both jointure and dower. Jointure, in its strict acceptation, means a joint estate, limited to both husband and wife; but it is now understood to be a sole estate, limited only to the wife. To a strict legal jointure these six things are requisite:—

(1) The provision for the wife must take effect in possession or profit immediately after her husband's death.

(2) It must be for her own life at least, and not pour autre vie, or for any term of years, or for any smaller estate. But the widow will be bound by the acceptance of a precarious interest if she were adult at the time she agreed to the jointure.

(3) It must be made to herself, and no other in trust for her.

(4) It must be made in satisfaction of the whole, and not of part of her dower.

(5) It must be either expressed or averred to be in satisfaction of dower; and

(6) It may be made either before or after marriage; if made after marriage she may waive it, and claim her dower, unless it be provided by Act of Parliament.

The Statute of Jointures, 11 Henry VII. c. 20, is repealed by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 17, except as to lands comprised in settlements made before the passing of this act.

Judge [fr. juge, Fr.; judex, Lat.], one invested with authority to determine any cause or question in a court of judicature, appointed by the Queen's letters-patent.

To secure the dignity and political independence of the judges of the superior courts at Westminster, it is enacted by 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, that their commissions shall be made, not as formerly, durante bene placito, but quamdiu bene se gesserint, and that it may be lawful to remove them on the address of both Houses of Parliament. By 1 Geo. III. c. 23, the judges are continued in their offices during good behaviour, notwithstanding any demise of the Crown (which was formerly held to vacate their seats), and their full salaries are absolutely secured to them during the continuance of their commissions. Their salaries are regulated by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 116. It is treason to kill 'The Chancellor, &c., or the King's Justices of the one bench or the other, &c., justices in assize, and all other justices assigned to hear and determine, being in their places doing their offices.'—25 Edw. III. c. 2. Judge Advocate, Judge Advocate-General. All general military courts-martial are attended by either the Judge Advocate-General, an officer appointed by letters patent under the Great Seal; by a Judge Advocate appointed by commission under the sign manual; by a deputy Judge Advocate acting by deputation, either general or special, under the hand and seal of the Judge Advocate-General; or by a person appointed by general officers commanding the forces abroad, to execute the office of Judge Advocate, the warrants held by such general officers empowering them to make such appointments. The duties of an officiating Judge Advocate at a court-martial are to provide accommodation for the court, to administer the oaths to the members of the court and to the witnesses, to summons the witnesses, to make a minute of the proceedings, and to advise the court on points of law, of custom and of form, and so far to assist the prisoner, if necessary, as to elicit as full a statement as possible of the facts material to the defence. The proceedings of general courts-martial held at home are transmitted by the officiating Judge Advocate to the Judge Advocate-General, in order that they may be laid before the Crown, together with a statement, by the officiating Judge Advocate, of any circumstances which in his opinion may affect the legality of this decision. The proceedings of courts-martial held abroad are also transmitted to the Judge Advocate-General, and are preserved in his office. See Simmons on Courts-Martial.

In the navy, when a court-martial has been ordered, the person nominated president appoints an officiating Judge Advocate, in the absence of a Judge Advocate or his deputy. His duties are nearly the same as those of the officiating Judge Advocate on military courts-martial. See Thring's Criminal Law of the Navy; 'The Naval Discipline Act, 1861,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 115; and Naval Regulations and Instructions, chap. xi.

Judgment [fr, jugement, Fr.], judicial determination; decision of a court.

The several species of judgments are either:—

(α) Interlocutory, given in the midst of a cause, upon some plea, proceeding, or default, which is only intermediate and does not finally determine or complete the action. See INQUIRY, WRIT OF.

(β) Final, putting an end to the action by an award of redress to one party, or discharge of the other, as the case may be.

By the C. L. P. Act 1852, s. 120, a plaintiff or defendant having obtained a verdict, in a cause tried out of term, shall be entitled to issue execution in fourteen days, unless the judge who tries the cause, or some other judge, or the court, shall order execution to issue at an earlier or later period, with or without terms. By r. 57, H. T. 1853, when a plaintiff or defendant has obtained a verdict in term, or in case a plaintiff has been nonsuited at the trial in or out of term, judgment may be signed and execution issued thereon in fourteen days, unless the judge who tried the cause, or some other judge, or the court, shall order execution to issue at an earlier or later period, with or without terms. By r. 55, H. T. 1853, no rule for judgment shall be necessary; and after the return of a writ of inquiry judgment may be signed at the expiration of four days from such return. A party may, however, be prevented from signing judgment by his opponent moving to set the verdict or nonsuit aside, and have a new trial; or moving to enter a nonsuit; or in arrest of judgment. The unsuccessful party may also move for judgment non obstante veredicto; or for a repleader; or trial de novo. By the C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 95, in all actions where the plaintiff recovers a sum of money, the amount to which he is entitled may be awarded to him by the judgment generally, without any distinction being therein made as to whether such is recovered by way of debt or damages.

All judgments, whether interlocutory or final, shall be entered of record of the day of the month and year, whether in term or vacation, when signed, and shall not have relation to any other day. Provided that it shall be competent for the court or a judge to order a judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc. Every pleading, as well as the declaration, shall be intituled of the day of the month and year when the same was pleaded, and shall bear no other time or date; and every declaration and other pleading shall also be entered on the record made up for trial, and on the judgment roll, under the date of the day of the month and year when the same respectively took place, and without reference to any other time or date, unless otherwise specially ordered by the court or a judge. No entry of continuances, by way of imparlance, curia adviseri vult, vicecomes non misit breve, or otherwise, shall be made upon any record or roll whatever, or in the pleadings. Provided that such regulation shall not alter or affect any existing rules of practice as to the times of proceeding in the cause.—C. L. P. A. 1852–54, and General Rules; H. T. & T. T. 1853.

As soon as judgment is signed by the master, the party in whose favor it is given may immediately sue out execution before the judgment is entered on the roll. The judgment, however, must be entered on the roll and filed in the treasury of the court; 1st, in order to enable the plaintiff to bring debt or revivor, or scire facias on the judgment; 2nd, to proceed against the bail on their recognizance; and 3rd, in case error is brought.

As to judgments affecting lands, &c., the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, enacts, that a judgment already entered up, or to be thereafter entered up, against any person in any of Her Majesty's superior courts at Westminster, shall operate as a charge upon all lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments (including lands and hereditaments of copyhold or customary tenure), of or to which such person shall, at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, be seised, possessed, or entitled for any estate or interest whatever, at law or in equity, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or over which such person shall, at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, have any disposing power which he might, without the assent of any other person, exercise for his own benefit, and shall be binding as against the person against whom judgment shall be so entered up, and against all persons claiming under him after such judgment, and shall also be binding as against the issue of his body, and all other persons whom he might, without the assent of any other person, cut off and debar from any remainder, reversion, or other interest in or out of any of the said lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments; and that every judgment-creditor shall have such and the same remedies in a court of equity against the hereditaments so charged, by virtue of this act, or any part thereof, as he would be entitled to in case the person against whom such judgment shall have been so entered up, had power to charge the same hereditaments, and had, by writing under his hand, agreed to charge the same, with the amount of such judgment-debt and interest thereon: provided that no judgment-creditor shall be entitled to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit of such charge until after the expiration of one year from the time of entering up such judgment, or in cases of judgments already entered up or to be entered up, before the time appointed for the commencement of this act (1st October, 1838), until after the expiration of one year from the time appointed for the commencement of this act; nor shall such charge operate to give the judgment-creditor any preference in case of the bankruptcy of the person against whom judgment shall have been entered up, unless such judgment shall have been entered up one year at least before the bankruptcy: provided also that, as regards purchasers, mortgagees, or purchasers who shall have become such before the time appointed for the commencement of this act, such judgment shall not affect lands, tenements, or hereditaments, otherwise than the same would have been affected by such judgment if this act had not passed: provided also, that nothing therein contained shall be deemed or taken to alter or affect any doctrine of courts of equity whereby protection is given to purchasers, for valuable consideration, without notice.

The 19th section enacts, that no judgment of any of the said superior courts, nor any decree or order in any court of equity, nor any rule of a court of common law, nor any order in bankruptcy or lunacy, shall, by virtue of such act, affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, unless and until a memorandum or minute, containing the name and the usual or last known place of abode, and the title, trade, or profession of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, and the court and the title of the cause or matter in which such judgment, decree, order, or rule shall have been obtained or made, and the date of such judgment, decree, order, or rule, and the amount of the debt, damages, costs, or monies thereby recovered or ordered to be paid, shall be left with the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, who shall forthwith enter the same particulars in a book, in alphabetical order, by the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected by such judgment, decree, order, or rule; and such officer shall be entitled for any such entry to the sum of five shillings; and all persons shall be at liberty to search the same book on payment of the sum of one shilling.

The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, after reciting that it is desirable that further protection shall be afforded to purchasers against judgments, crown-debts, and lis pendens, enacts, 'that no judgment shall hereafter (June 4th, 1839) be docketted under 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, but that all such dockets shall be finally closed immediately after the passing of this act, without prejudice to the operation of any judgment already docketted and entered under the said recited act, except so far as any such judgment may be affected by the provisions thereinafter contained' (s. 1).

'That no judgment already docketted and entered under the said recited act of their late Majesties King William and Queen Mary, shall, after August 1st, 1841, affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments as to purchasers, mortgagees, or others, unless and until such memorandum or minute thereof, as is prescribed in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 19, shall be left with the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, who shall forthwith enter the same in manner thereby directed in regard to judgments; and such officer shall be entitled for any such entry to the sum of five shillings' (s. 2).

'That in addition to the entry by the said last-mentioned act, or by this act required to be made in a book by the senior master of the particulars to be contained in every memorandum or minute left with him of any judgment, decree, or order, rule or order, he shall insert in such book the year and the day of the month when every such memorandum or minute is so left with him' (s. 3).

The 4th section makes judgments, though registered under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, or 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, void after five years from registration, as against purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, unless a fresh registry be made within five years before the execution of the conveyance, settlement, mortgage, lease, or other deed or instrument vesting or transferring the legal or equitable right, title, estate, or interest in or to any such purchaser or mortgagee for valuable consideration, or as to creditors, within five years before the right of such creditors accrued, and so toties quoties, at the expiration of every succeeding five years. The re-entry fee is one shilling. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, ss. 5, 6, 13. (By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s, 22, this provision as to registry is extended to crown debts.)

'That as against purchasers and mortgagees, without notice of any such judgments, decrees, or orders, rules or orders as aforesaid, none of such judgments, decrees or orders, rules or orders, shall bind or affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein, further or otherwise or more extensively in any respect, although duly registered, than a judgment of one of the superior courts aforesaid would have bound such purchaser or mortgagee before the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, where it had been duly docketted according to the law then in force' (s. 3).

'That nothing in the said recited act of her present Majesty, nor in this act contained, shall extend to revive or restore any judgment which shall be extinguished or barred, nor shall the same extend to affect or prejudice any judgment as between the parties thereto, or their representatives, or those serving as volunteers under them' (s. 6).

The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 2, after reciting that doubts had been entertained whether a purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor, having notice of any such judgment, decree, order, or rule as aforesaid, would not in equity be affected thereby, notwithstanding such a memorandum or minute of the same, as in the said act is mentioned, may not have been left with the senior master of the said Court of Common Pleas, enacted, that no such judgment, decree, order, or rule as aforesaid, shall, by virtue of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, at law or in equity, as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, unless and until such a memorandum or minute, as in the said act in that behalf mentioned, shall have been left with the senior master of the said Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, any notice of any such judgment, decree, order, or rule to any such purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor, in anywise notwithstanding. And see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15; and by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, it is enacted that no judgment statute or recognizance to be entered up after the passing of this act shall affect any land (of whatever tenure) as to a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration, or a mortgagee (whether such purchaser or mortgagee have notice of any such judgment, &c.), unless a writ or other due process of execution of such judgment, &c., shall have been issued and registered as hereinafter is mentioned, before the execution of the conveyance or mortgage to him, and the payment of the purchase or mortgage money by him: provided always that no judgment, &c. entered up after the passing of this act, nor any writ of execution or process thereon, shall affect any land of whatever tenure as to a bonâ fide purchaser or mortgagee, although execution or other process shall have issued thereon and have been duly registered, unless such execution or other process shall be executed and put in force within three calendar months from the time when it was registered (s. 1).

The registry required of the writ of execution or other due process is to be made by a memorandum or minute referring to the judgment, &c., so as to correct the registry of the writ of execution or other process therewith (s. 2). The effect of these sections was to place freehold, copyhold, and customary estates on the same footing as leasehold estates as against purchasers and mortgagees in respect of judgments, &c. Sects. 3 & 4 of the same statute (passed in consequence of a decision of the Master of the Rolls in Fuller v. Redman, 26 Beav. 600, that under the existing law an administrator who had paid simple contract debts could not be allowed them against a judgment-creditor, though the judgment was unregistered when the payment was made, and though he had neither notice or knowledge of its existence) enact that no judgment which has not been duly entered or docketted so as to bind lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as against purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, shall have any preference against heirs, executors, or administrators, in their administration of their ancestors, testators, or intestates' effects (s. 3). No registered judgment shall have any such preference unless, at the death of the testator or intestate, five years shall not have elapsed from the date of the entry thereof on the docket, or from the only or last re-registry thereof; but it shall be deemed sufficient to secure such preference if such a memorandum as was required in the first instance is again left with the senior master of the Common Pleas within five years before the death of the testator or intestate, although more than five years shall have expired since the last previous registration before such memorandum was left (s. 4).

In order to bind lands in Middlesex or Yorkshire, it is necessary to file a memorial of the judgment in the registry-office of such counties respectively; until this is done the lands will not be affected or bound by the judgment.

As to registering judgments of the Palatinate Courts to bind lands in the Counties Palatine, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15.

The release from a judgment of part of any hereditaments charged therewith shall not affect the validity of the judgment as to the hereditaments remaining unreleased, or as to any other property not specifically released, without prejudice, nevertheless, to the rights of all persons interested in the hereditaments or property remaining unreleased, and not concurring in or confirming the release (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 11).

As to the entry of satisfaction on Crown debts and on judgments, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 115.

As to judgments becoming a charge on public stock and shares in companies by order of a judge, the 14th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, enacts, 'that if any person against whom any judgment shall have been entered up in any of Her Majesty's superior courts at Westminster shall have any Government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares of or in any public company in England (whether incorporated or not), standing in his name in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, it shall be lawful for a judge of one of the superior courts, on the application of any judgment-creditor, to order that such stock, funds, or annuities, or shares, or such of them or such part thereof respectively as he shall think fit, shall stand charged with the payment of the amount for which judgment shall have been so recovered, and interest thereon; and such order shall entitle the judgment-creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favor by the judgment-debtor; provided that no proceedings shall be taken to have the benefit of such charge until after the expiration of six calendar months from the date of such order.'

And 'in order to prevent any person against whom judgment shall have been obtained from transferring, receiving, or disposing of any stock, funds, annuities, or shares thereby authorized to be charged for the benefit of the judgment-creditor under an order of a judge,' it is further enacted by s. 15, 'that every order of a judge charging any Government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares in any public company under this act, shall be made in the first instance ex parte and without any notice to the judgment-debtor, and shall be an order to show cause only; and such order, if any Government stock, funds, or annuities standing in the name of the judgment-debtor in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, is to be affected by such order, shall restrain the Governor and Company of the Bank of England from permitting a transfer of such stock in the meantime and until such order shall be made absolute or discharged; and if any stock or shares of or in any public company standing in the name of the judgment-debtor in his own right or in the name of any person in trust for him, is or are to be affected by any such order, shall in like manner restrain such public company from permitting a transfer thereof; and that if, after notice of such order to the person or persons to be restrained thereby, or in case of corporations, to any authorized agent of such corporation, and before the same order shall be discharged or made absolute, such corporation or person or persons shall permit any such transfer to be made, then and in such case the corporation or person or persons so permitting such transfer shall be liable to the judgment-creditor for the value or amount of the property so charged and so transferred, or such part thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy his judgment; and that no disposition of the judgment-debtor in the meantime shall be valid or effectual as against the judgment-creditor; and further, that, unless the judgment-debtor shall, within a time to be mentioned in such order, show to a judge of one of the said superior courts sufficient cause to the contrary, the said order shall, after proof of notice thereof to the judgment-debtor, his attorney or agent, be made absolute: provided that any such judge shall, upon the application of the judgment-debtor, or any person interested, have full power to discharge or vary such order, and to award such costs upon such application as he may think fit.'

A creditor who causes his debtor to be taken or charged in execution thereby relinquishes all claim to any charge or security to which he may be entitled under these acts (s. 16).

The 17th sect. enacts that every judgment-debt shall carry interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the time of entering up the judgment, or from the time of the commencement of this act, in cases of judgments then entered up, and not carrying interest, until the same shall be satisfied; and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment.

Where there are cross judgments in the same, or different actions in the same, or different courts between parties substantially the same, the one may be set off against the other. This may be effected by applying to the court in which the opposite party has obtained judgment, for a rule to show cause why satisfaction should not be entered on the roll, on the applicant's acknowledging satisfaction for the same amount in his judgment, or vice versâ if the applicant's judgment be less, the other party's attorney being first satisfied his lien upon the judgment for costs in that particular case.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 711.

The following are the several species of judgments most usually occurring in practice:—

(1) Judgment, on plea in abatement. If it be for the plaintiff upon verdict, it is peremptory, quod recuperet, and therefore, in actions for damages, if the jury do not assess them, a trial de novo must be awarded. But if it be on demurrer, or on replication of nul tiel record, it is not final, but merely a respondeas ouster. Judgment for the defendant is, that the writ be quashed, unless the matter pleaded in abatement is some temporary disability, such as infancy, &c., in which case the judgment is, that the plaintiff must remain without day, until, &c.—Tidd, 642; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 904.

(2) Judgment in ejectment. See EJECTMENT.

(3) Judgment on a cognovit. If the cognovit be made unconditionally, the plaintiff may, of course, sign judgment and sue out execution as soon as he pleases. If there be conditions inserted in it, judgment must be in strict pursuance thereto. See COGNOVIT.

(4) Judgment in default of appearance or for want of a plea. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 970.

(5) Judgment on demurrer. It is either interlocutory or final, in the same manner as judgment by default. If a defendant plead several matters to the same or several counts of a declaration, and the plaintiff demur to some of the pleas, and take issue upon others; if the defendant succeed upon any of the pleas demurred to, and that plea be an answer to the whole action, the plaintiff shall not have judgment upon the issues in fact, should they be found for him; but the only judgment that shall be entered is nil capiat per breve.—Ibid. 921; and 1 Saund. 80, n. (1).

(6) Judgment de melioribus damnis. See DE MELIORIBUS DAMNIS.

(7) Judgment in error. See ERROR.

(8) Judgment against executors or administrators. In an action against an executor or administrator, suggesting a devastavit, the judgment against the defendant shall be de bonis propriis, and so if he plead a plea which he knows to be false, and also if he be made liable and charged as assignee; but otherwise the judgment would be de bonis testatoris.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1220.

(9) Judgment against heirs or devisees. If an heir have aliened the lands previously to the suing out of the writ, he is expressly rendered liable for the specialty debts of his ancestor, to the amount of the lands aliened, by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 47, s. 6. And an action is maintainable against a devisee (s. 2), rendering wills in fraud of creditors void. And the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, renders the lands liable to every kind of debt.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1227.

(10) Judgment against prisoners. The plaintiff shall proceed to trial or final judgment against a prisoner in the term next after issue is joined, or at the sittings or assizes next after such term, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order, and shall cause the defendant to be charged in execution within the term next after such trial or judgment. Otherwise the prisoner may be discharged or superseded. R. 124, H. T. 1853.

(12) Judgment non obstante veredicto. Where the defence put upon the record is not a legal defence to the action in point of substance, and the defendant obtain a verdict, the court, upon motion, will give the plaintiff leave to sign judgment notwithstanding the verdict, provided the merits of the case be very clear. But where the plea contains no confession of the cause of action, the proper course is to award a repleader, and not to give judgment non obstante veredicto. A defendant cannot obtain this judgment in any case: he must move in arrest of judgment. The motion must be made within four days from the time of trial, if there are so many days in term; it cannot in any case be moved for after the expiration of the term, provided the jury precept be returnable in the same term. The judgment is interlocutory; after which a writ of inquiry must be executed, and final judgment signed, as in ordinary cases. If the defendant have succeeded on any of his pleas he will be entitled to retain his verdict on them; and there must be a trial de novo; the successful party is entitled to the costs of the material issues.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 145; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1538.

(13) Judgment of non pros. It is a final judgment for costs, signed by a defendant only, whenever a plaintiff, in any stage of the cause, neglects to prosecute his action, or part of it, within the times limited by the rules of the court. See DECLARATION.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1466.

(14) Judgment as in case of nonsuit. With respect to judgment by default in not proceeding to trial, the Act passed in the fourteenth year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Second, c. 17, intituled, 'An Act to prevent inconveniences arising from Delays of Causes after Issue joined, so far as the same relates to Judgment as in the Case of a Nonsuit,' is repealed, except as to proceedings taken or commenced thereupon before the commencement of this Act.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 100.

Where any issue is or shall be joined in any cause, and the plaintiff has neglected or shall neglect to bring such issue on to be tried, that is to say, in town causes where issue has been or shall be joined in, or in the vacation before any term, for instance, Hilary Term, and the plaintiff has neglected or shall neglect to bring the issue on to be tried during or before the following term and vacation, for instance, Easter Term and vacation, and in country causes where issue has been or shall be joined in, or in the vacation before, Hilary or Trinity Term, and the plaintiff has neglected or shall neglect to bring the issue on to be tried at or before the second assizes following such term, or if issue has been or shall be joined in, or in the vacation before, Easter or Michaelmas Term, then, if the plaintiff has neglected or shall neglect to bring the issue on to be tried at or before the first assizes after such term, whether the plaintiff shall in the meantime have given notice of trial or not, the defendant may give twenty days' notice to the plaintiff to bring the issue on to be tried at the sittings or assizes, as the case may be, next after the expiration of the notice; and if the plaintiff afterwards neglects to give notice of trial for such sitting or assizes, or to proceed to trial in pursuance of the said notice given by the defendant, the defendant may suggest on the record that the plaintiff has failed to proceed to trial, although duly required so to do (which suggestion shall not be traversable, but only be subject to be set aside if untrue), and may sign judgment for his costs; provided that the court or judge shall have power of extending the time for proceeding to trial, with or without terms (s. 101).—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1484.

(15) Judgment upon nul tiel record. The judgment for the plaintiff is interlocutory or final, just as it is upon demurrer or default; but the defendant's judgment would be final. A rule for judgment is not now necessary.

Where a defendant shall plead a plea of judgment recovered, he shall, in the margin of such plea, state the date of such judgment, and if such judgment shall be in a court of record, the number of the roll on which such proceedings are entered, if any; and in default of his so doing, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to sign judgment as for want of a plea; and in case the same be falsely stated by the defendant, the plaintiff, on producing a certificate from the proper officer, or person having the custody of the records or proceedings of the court where such judgment is alleged to have been recovered, that there is no such record or entry of a judgment as therein stated, shall be at liberty to sign judgment as for want of a plea. H. T. 1853, r. 10; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 927.

(16) Judgment in replevin. See REPLEVIN.

(17) Judgment in scire facias. The judgment is the same as in ordinary cases. See REVIVOR.

(18) Judgment on warrant of attorney. Judgment may be entered upon a warrant of attorney, at the time therein specified for that purpose; and if the warrant were given to secure the payment of money, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should delay the signing of the judgment until default be made in the payment, unless that be expressly stipulated for in the defeazance. If the warrant specify any particular time at which the judgment is to be signed, it cannot be entered up at any other time. Within a year and a day from the date of a warrant, judgment may be entered up as of course; but leave to enter up judgment on a warrant of attorney above one and under ten years old, must be obtained by order of a judge made ex parte; and if ten years old or more, upon a summons to show cause. The application for such leave is founded upon an affidavit, stating the consideration for the warrant of attorney, its execution, the amount remaining due to the plaintiff, and alleging positively that the defendant was alive at a certain time therein mentioned.—H. T. 1853, r. 26; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 938.

(19) In criminal cases, judgment, unless any matter be offered in arrest thereof, follows upon conviction, being the pronouncing of that punishment which is expressly ordained by law. 4 Bl. Com. c. xxix.

Judicandum est legibus non exemplis.—4 Co. 33.—(We are to judge by the laws, not by examples.)

Judicatores terrarum, persons in the county palatine of Chester, who, on a writ of error, were to consider of the judgment given there, and reform it, otherwise they forfeited 100*l.* to the Crown by custom.—Jenk. Cent. 71.

Judices non tenentur exprimere causam sententiæ suæ.—Jenk. Cent. 75.—(Judges are not bound to explain the reason of their sentence.)

Judices pedaneos, judges chosen by the litigants.—Civ. Law.

Judicial Acts. Numerous statutes give summary power to justices of the peace, and declare that certain acts shall only be valid if done by two magistrates. If it be only a ministerial act, it is not requisite that the two magistrates should be together at the time of doing the act; if it be judicial, they must.

Judicial authority, the power of a judge.

There is a wide distinction between a special authority to act under particular circumstances and a judicial authority to act in particular cases. So long in either case as the party acts within the limits of his authority, he is, of course, justified in what he does, and in either case, if he plainly exceed the limits of his authority, he is without justification; the material difference is this, that in the former case, i. e. where he has a mere authority to execute, it is open to inquiry whether facts existed which warranted his act; in the latter, where he acts judicially in a matter within his jurisdiction, his adjudication is usually conclusive upon the question, whether the particular facts warranted that judgment or did not, and to protect him from an act of trespass.—3 Stark. Evid. 1140 q.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, a tribunal established in its present form by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 41; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38, for the disposal of appeals and such other matters as the Queen in council may refer to them.

'It is admirably adapted,' said Lord Lyndhurst, 'for the business it has to perform. There are various kinds of law agitated and discussed, considered and decided before the tribunal. Questions of civil and ecclesiastical law come before it. There are judges who have been brought up in practising and administering the civil and ecclesiastical laws; and when questions of this kind arise, their attendance is required, and they form part of the court for deciding these questions. Then there are questions of what in England is called equity. There are judges from the equity courts members of this tribunal; and when questions of that kind are discussed, their attendance is required, and they form part of the court. Again, questions of common law are considered and decided. There are members of that court who are judges of common law; and they attend on these occasions to assist in decision. Nay, more, there are questions of Hindoo and Mahometan law discussed before that tribunal; the result of which is of the utmost importance to the parties. The court has then the assistance of persons, who, having practised as judges in India, are familiar with such questions.'—Debates, April 12, 1842.

Judicial documents, proceedings relating to litigation. They are divided into: (1) judgments, decrees, and verdicts; (2) depositions, examinations, and inquisitions taken in the course of a legal process; (3) writs, warrants, pleadings, bills, and answers, &c. which are incident to judicial proceedings.—1 Stark. Evid. 252.

Judicial sale and ranking. When there are so many adjudications in process against an estate that it may be considered as bankrupt, while the debtor does not come within the class of persons liable to mercantile bankruptcy, it is usual to sweep all the operations into one process, thus called.—Scotch Law.

Judicial separation, the proceeding in the Divorce Court which has taken the place of a divorce à mensâ et thoro. See MARRIAGE.

Judicial writs, writs issuing from the court in which proceedings are commenced under its seal, and tested in the name of its chief judge, as distinguished from original writs which issue out of the Court of Chancery.

Judici officium suum excedenti non paretur.—Jenk. Cent. 139.—(To a judge exceeding his office, there is no obedience.)

Judici satis pœna est quod Deum habet ultorem.—1 Leon. 295.—(It is punishment enough for a judge, that he has God as his avenger.)

Judicia in curiâ regis non adnihilentur, sed stent in robore suo quousque per errorem aut attinctum adnullentur.—2 Inst. 539.—(Let not judgments in the King's Court go for naught, but let them remain in force until annulled by error or attaint.)

Judicia in deliberationibus crebro matures-cunt, in accelerato processu nunquam.—3 Inst. 210.—(Judgments become frequently matured by deliberations: never by hurried process.)

Judicia posteriora sunt in lege fortiora.—8 Co. 97.—(The latter decisions are the stronger in law.)

Judicia sunt tanquam juris dicta, et pro veritate accipiuntur.—2 Inst. 537.—(Judgments are, as it were, the words of the law, and are received as truth.)

Judiciis posterioribus fides est adhibenda.—13 Co. 14.—(Credit is to be given to the later decisions.)

Judicis est judicare secundum allegata et probata.—Dyer, 12.—(It is the duty of a judge to decide according to facts alleged and proved.)

Judicis officium est opus diei in die suo perficere.—2 Inst. 256.—(It is the duty of a judge to finish the work of each day, within that day.)

Judicis officium est ut res ita tempora rerum quærere, quæsito tempore tutus eris.—Co. Litt. 171.—(It is the duty of a judge to inquire as well into the time of things as into things themselves; by inquiring into the time, you will be safe.)

Judicium à non suo judice datum nullius est momenti.—10 Co. 76.—(A judgment given by an improper judge is of no moment.)

Judicium est quasi juris dictum.—Co. Litt. 39 a and 168 a.—(Judgment is, as it were, the voice of law.)

Judicium non debet esse illusorium; suum effectum habere debet.—2 Inst. 341.—(A judgment ought not to be illusory; it ought to have its consequence.)

Judicium redditur in invitum, in præsumptione legis.—Co. Litt. 248.—(Judgment, in presumption of law, is given against an unwilling party.)

Judicium semper pro veritate accipitur.—2 Inst. 380.—(Judgment is always taken for truth.)

Judicium Dei (judgment of God), a term applied by our ancestors to the now prohibited trials of secret crimes; as those by arms and single combat; and the ordeals, or those by fire or red-hot ploughshares, by plunging the arms into boiling water, or the whole body into cold water; which were founded on the belief that God would work a miracle rather than suffer truth and innocence to perish. Si super defendere non possit, judicio Dei, scil. aquâ vel ferro, fieret de eo justitia. These customs were a long time kept up even among Christians; and they are still now in use among some nations. Trials of this sort were usually held in churches in presence of the bishops, priests, and secular judges; after three days' fasting, confession, communion, and many adjurations and ceremonies, described at large by Du Cange.—Encyc. Lond.

Judicium parium, the judgment of one's peers.

Jugulator, a cut-throat or murderer.

Jugum terræ, a yoke of land, containing half a plough-land.—Domesday; Co. Litt. 5 a.

Juncare, to strew rushes.—Pat. 14 Ed. I.

Juncaria. See JONCARIA.

Junta, or Junto [Ital.], a select council for taking cognizance of affairs of great consequence requiring secrecy; a cabal or faction.

Jura ecclesiastica limitata sunt infra limites separatos.—3 Bulst. 53.—(Ecclesiastical laws are limited within separate bounds.)

Jura eodem modo destruuntur quo constituuntur.—(Laws are abrogated by the same means as those by which they are made.)

Jura personarum (the rights of persons).

Jura publica anteferenda privatis.—Co. Litt. 130.—(Public rights are to be preferred to private.)

Jura publica ex privato promiscue decidi non debent.—Co. Litt. 181 b.—(Public rights ought not to be promiscuously determined in analogy to a private right.)

Jura regis specialia non conceduntur per generalia verba.—Jenk. Cent. 103.—(The special rights of the king are not granted by general words.)

Juramenta corporalia, corporal oaths.

Juramentum est indivisibile, et non est admittendum in parte verum et in parte falsum.—4 Inst. 279.—(An oath is indivisible; it is not to be received as partly true and partly false.)

Jurare est Deum in testem vocare, et est actus divini cultus.—3 Inst. 165.—(To swear, is to call God to witness, and is an act of religion.)

Jura regalia, royal rights; royal prerogatives. See 1 Bl. Com. 241, et seq.; Bac. Abr. Prerogative. As to these rights in the county of Durham, see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 45.

Jura rerum (the rights which a person may acquire in things).

Jura sanguinis nullo jure civili dirimi possunt. Bacon.—(The rights of blood can be taken away by no civil law.)

Jura summa imperii (the supreme rights of dominion).

Jurato credito in judicio.—3 Inst. 79.—(In judgment, credit is given to a sworn witness.)

Juratores debent esse vicini, sufficientes, et minus suspecti.—Jenk. Cent. 141.—(Jurors ought to be neighbors, of sufficient estate, and free from suspicion,)

Jurat, the memorandum of the time, place, and person before whom an affidavit is sworn. There must be neither erasure nor interlineation in it. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1609, and Smith's Ch. Pract.

Jurata, the jury-clause in a Nisi Prius record. The entry jurata ponitur in respectu, is abolished.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 104.

Juration, the act of swearing; the administration of an oath.

Jurator, a juror.

Juratores sunt judices facti.—Jenk. Cent. 61.—(Juries are the judges of fact.)

Juratory caution, a proceeding in Scotch law.

Jurats, officers in the nature of aldermen, sworn for the government of many corporations.

Jure divino (by divine right).

Jure emphyteutico (by the law of rents and services).

Juri non est consonum quod aliquis accessorius in curiâ regis convincatur antequam aliquis de facto fuerit attinctus.—2 Inst. 183.—(It is not consonant to justice, that any accessory should be convicted in the King's Court, before anyone has been attainted of the fact.)

Juridical, acting in the distribution of justice.

Juridical days, days in court on which the laws are administered.

Jurisconsult [fr. jurisconsultus, Lat., abbrev. jctus.], one who gives his opinion on cases of law; a master of the Roman jurisprudence.

Jurisconsulti, or Jurisprudentes, men who studied the forms and, in time, the principles of civil law, and expounded them for the benefit of their friends and dependants. See Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Jurisdiction, legal authority; extent of power; declaration of the law.

There are three sorts of inferior jurisdictions: (1) To hold pleas, which is the lowest, in which case a person may either sue there or in the Queen's Courts. (2) The cognizance of pleas, by which an exclusive right is vested in the lord of a franchise to hold pleas in matters arising within his jurisdiction. (3) An exempt jurisdiction, as where the Crown grants to some city that its inhabitants shall be sued within such city, and not elsewhere.—3 Salk. 79.

Jurisdictio est potestas de publico introducta cum necessitate jurisdicendi.—10 Co. 73, and 4 Inst. Proœm.—(Jurisdiction is a power introduced concerning the public, with the necessity of expounding the law.)

Jurist, a civil lawyer, a civilian.

Juris utrum, an abolished writ which lay for the parson of a church, whose predecessor had alienated the lands and tenements thereof. F. N. B. 48.

Jurnedum, a day's travelling.

Juror, one who serves on a jury.

Juror's Book, a list of persons qualified to serve on juries.

Jury [fr. jurata, Lat.; juré, Fr.], a company of men sworn to deliver a verdict upon such evidence of facts as shall be delivered to them touching the matter in question. 'In this recess of the jury,' observes Hale (Com. Law, c. 12, s. 11), 'they are to consider the evidence, to weigh the credibility of the witnesses and the force and efficacy of their testimonies; wherein, as I before said, they are not precisely bound to the rules of the civil law, viz. to have two witnesses to prove every fact, unless it be in cases of treason, nor to reject one witness because he is single; or always to believe two witnesses, if the probability of the fact does not upon other circumstances reasonably encounter them; for the trial is not here simply by witnesses, but by jury; nay, it may so fall out, that a jury upon their own knowledge may know a thing to be false that a witness swore to be true, or may know a witness to be incompetent or incredible, though nothing be objected against him, and may give their verdict accordingly.'

Trial by jury is, no doubt, an institution of progressive growth, and its principle may be traced to the earliest Anglo-Saxon times. One of the judicial customs of the Saxons was, that a man might be cleared of an accusation of certain crimes, if an appointed number of persons (juratores), came forward and swore to a veredictum that they believed him innocent of the allegation. It is remarkable that for accusations of any consequence among the Saxons on the continent, twelve juratores were the number required for an acquittal. Similar customs may be observed in the laws of the continental Angli and Frisiones, though the number of juratores varied in certain cases; for in the laws of the Ripuarii we find that in certain cases the oaths of even seventy-two persons were necessary for an acquittal.

Dr. Pettengal in his inquiry into the use and practice of juries among the Greeks and Romans, deduces the origin of juries from these ancient nations. He begins with determining the meaning of the word δικασταί in the Greek, and judices in the Roman writers. 'The common acceptation of these words (says he), and the idea generally annexed to them, is that of presidents of courts, or, as we call them, judges; as such they are understood by commentators, and rendered by critics.' Dr. Middleton, Archbishop Potter, and other philologists so render these terms. It is submitted that this is an erroneous signification, for the presidents of the courts in criminal trials at Athens were the nine archons, the one presiding being called ἡγεμὼν δικαστηρίου, or president of the court. The archon, properly so called, had belonging to his department all pupillary and heritable causes; the βασιλεύς, or rex sacrorum, the chief priest, all cases where religion was concerned; the polemarchus or general, all military cases; and the six thesmothetæ, the other ordinary suits. Whenever, then, the ἄνδρες δικασταί are addressed by the Greek orators, as we find in the speeches of Demosthenes, Æschines, and Lysias, they are not to be understood to be the presiding magistrates, but men whose duty it was, after hearing the witnesses and other evidence, to report their opinion and verdict to the president, who then declared it. The term ἄνδρες δικασταί, as used by Greek orators, being equivalent to the term gentlemen of the jury, as used by counsel at the English bar when addressing a jury.

So likewise among the Romans the judices never signified judges of the bench or presidents of the court, but a body or order of men, whose office in the courts of judicature was distinct from that of the prætor or judex quæstionis, which answered to our judge of the bench; and was the same with the archon, or ἡγεμὼν δικαστηρίου of the Greeks; whereas the duty of the judices consisted in being impannelled, challenged, and sworn to try uprightly the case before them; and when they had agreed upon their opinion or verdict, to deliver it to the president, who was to pronounce it. This kind of judicial process was developed in the Athenian polity of Solon, and thence copied into the Roman republic.

When the Romans were settled in Britain, as a province, they carried with them their jura and instituta, their laws and customs, hence the Britains, like the Germans and Gauls, learned the Roman laws and customs, and, upon the irruption of the northern nations into the southern countries of Europe, the Roman institutions remained when the power that introduced them was destroyed. Indeed Montesquieu tells us, that under the first race of kings in France, about the fifth century, the Romans that remained and the Burgundians their new masters lived together under the same Roman laws and police, and particularly the same forms of judicature. And, speaking of those times, he mentions the paires or hommes de fief, homagers or peers, whom, in the same chapter, he calls juges, judges, or jurymen; so that we hence see how at that time the hommes de fief or men of the fief, were called peers, and those peers were judges or jurymen. These were the same as are called in the laws of the Confessor pers de la tenure, the peers of the tenure, or homagers, out of whom the jury of peers were chosen to try a matter in dispute between the lord and his tenant, or any other point of controversy in the manor. So, likewise, in all other parts of Europe where the Romans had been, the Goths succeeding them continued to make use of the same laws and institutions which they found to have been already established.

All persons between twenty-one and sixty, possessing the necessary qualification (presently stated), may be jurors, with the following exceptions: viz. aliens, unless on a jury de medietate linguæ; persons attainted of treason, felony, or infamous crime, unless pardoned; outlaws, excommunicated persons, or women, unless on a writ de ventre inspiciendo.

Those exempted from serving are peers, judges of the courts of record at Westminster, clergymen in holy orders, qualified Roman Catholic clergymen, qualified Protestant dissenting clergymen, serjeants and barristers at law actually practising, doctors and advocates of the civil law actually practising; attorneys and proctors duly admitted and actually practising; officers of the superior courts, coroners, gaolers, and keepers of houses of correction; members and licentiates of the Royal College of Physicians in London, actually practising; surgeons who are members of one of the Royal Colleges of Surgeons in London, Edinburgh, or Dublin, and actually practising; apothecaries certificated by the court of examiners of the Apothecaries' Company, and actually practising; officers of the navy and army on full pay; pilots licensed by the Trinity House of Deptford, Hull, or Newcastle; masters of ships in the buoy and light service, and pilots licensed by the lord warden of the cinque ports, or under any act of Parliament or charter in any other port; the household servants of her Majesty; officers of the customs or excise; sheriffs' officers, high constables, parish clerks, and persons in the service of the Post-office.

In Middlesex, no person shall be returned to serve on a jury at Nisi Prius, who has served as a juror in either of the two preceding terms or vacations, having the sheriff's certificate of having so served; and no person shall be returned to serve on a jury at the assizes, who has before served on a jury in Yorkshire within four years; in Wales, or in the county of Hereford, Cambridge, Huntingdon, or Rutland, within one year; or in any other county within two years; having the sheriff's certificate of having so served, which certificate the sheriff is bound to give to every common juror serving or attending as such, but not to grand or special jurors.—6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 2; and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71.

Every man between the ages of twenty-one and sixty, who shall have, within the county in which he resides, in his own name or in trust for him, 10*l.* by the year, above reprizes, in lands or tenements of freehold, copyhold, or customary tenure, or of ancient demesne, or in rents issuing out of such lands or tenements, as in lands, tenements, and rents taken together in fee simple, fee-tail, or for the life of himself or some other person; or who shall have, within the same county, 20*l.* by the year, above reprizes, in lands or tenements held by lease for twenty-one years or longer, or for a term of years determinable on any life or lives, or who, being a householder, shall be rated or assessed to the poor-rate or to the inhabited house-duty, in Middlesex, on a value of not less than 30*l.*, or in any other county, on a value of not less than 20*l.*, or who shall occupy a house containing not less than fifteen windows, shall be qualified to serve on juries.—6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 1.

In London a juror must be a householder, or the occupier of a shop, warehouse, counting-house, chambers, or office, for the purpose of trade or commerce within the said city, and have lands, tenements, or personal estate of the value of 100*l.* (s. 50).

All those described in the jurors book as esquires, or persons of higher degree, or as bankers or merchants, shall be qualified and liable to serve on special juries, and the sheriff or under-sheriff shall set down their names in alphabetical order, in a list to be called 'the special jurors' list,' and shall prefix to each name a number, which numbers shall also be written out on distinct pieces of parchment or card, and put into a drawer or box, to be kept for the purpose of nominating special juries (s. 31).

If any man, summoned to attend on a jury, shall not attend in pursuance of such summons, or being thrice called shall not answer to his name; or if any such man, or any talesman, after being called, shall be present, but not appear, or after appearance shall wilfully withdraw himself from the presence of the court, the court shall set such fine upon him as the court shall think fit, and in the case of a viewer not less than 10*l.* unless some reasonable excuse be proved by oath or affidavit; or, upon such default, at the execution of a writ of inquiry, the under-sheriff, &c. may set a fine not exceeding 5*l.* (s. 53).

In civil causes a jury may be either common or special. In criminal causes there are both the grand and petit jury. See GRAND JURY; SPECIAL JURY; and Juries' Act 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 107.

Jury-box, the place in court where the jury sit.

Jury-man, one who is impannelled on a jury.

Jury process, the writ for the summoning of a jury. They were the distringas juratores, or habeas corpora juratorum, and the venire juratores facias now abolished. A jury is summoned by precept. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 344.

Jury-women. Women are impannelled as a jury in two cases only: (1) upon a writ de ventre inspiciendo, which see; (2) where a female prisoner is condemned to be executed, and pleads pregnancy, as a ground to postpone the completion of the sentence until after her confinement. Upon this a jury of matrons, or discreet women, is formed to inquire into the truth of the plea; should they bring in their verdict that the prisoner is enceinte, the execution will be stayed until after the birth of the child, and sometimes the Crown will commute the punishment to perpetual exile. It would, perhaps, be better, if the matter were submitted to three or more medical men.

It is said in the text-books, that if a woman have once had the benefit of this reprieve, and been delivered, and afterwards become pregnant again, she shall not be entitled to a further respite, but may be hanged before the child is quick!

The grave error as to quickening has been entirely exploded, for medical science has demonstrated the fact, that the child lives from the moment of conception and that motion is only imparted to it by quickening. This being so, by hanging the mother at any period of the gestation, the child is destroyed, and seeing that the respite is for the purpose of saving the innocent babe, the second child is surely as much an object for the law's humanity as the first. Should such an instance now happen, so great an injustice could not be perpetrated, as to slay the helpless child for the crime of the guilty mother.

Jus, law, right, equity, authority, and rule.

A Roman magistratus generally did not investigate the facts in dispute in such matters as were brought before him; he appointed a judex for that purpose and gave him instructions. Accordingly the whole civil procedure was expressed by the two phrases Jus and Judicium; of which the former comprehended all that took place before the magistratus (in jure), and the latter all that took place before the judex (in judicio). Originally, even the magistratus was called judex, as, for instance, the consul and prætor (Liv. iii. 55); and under the empire, the term judex often designated the præses.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

All law (jus) is distributed into two parts—Jus Gentium and Jus Civile—and the whole body of law peculiar to any state is its Jus Civile (Cic. de Orat. i. 44). The Roman law, therefore, which is peculiar to the Roman state, is its Jus Civile, sometimes called Jus Civile Romanorum, but more frequently designated by the term Jus Civile only, by which is meant the Jus Civile of the Romans.

The Jus Gentium is viewed by Gaius as springing out of the Naturalis Ratio, common to all mankind, which is still more clearly expressed in another passage (i. 89), where he uses the expression 'omnium civitatum jus,' as equivalent to the Jus Gentium, and as founded on the Naturalis Ratio.

The Naturale Jus and the Jus Gentium are therefore identical. Cicero (Off. iii. 5), opposes Natura to Leges, where he explains Natura by the term Jus Gentium, and makes Leges equivalent to Jus Civile.

In the Partitiones (c. 37), he also divides Jus into Natura and Lex.

There is a threefold division of Jus made by Ulpian and others, which is as follows:—Jus Civile; Jus Gentium, or that which is common to all mankind; and Jus Naturale, which is common to man and beasts. The foundation of this division seems to have been a theory of the progress of mankind from what is commonly termed a state of nature; first to a state of society, and then to a condition of independent states. This division had, however, no practical application, and must be viewed merely as a curious theory.

The Jus Civile of the Romans is divided into two parts—Jus Civile in the narrower sense; and Jus Pontificium, or the law of religion. This opposition is sometimes expressed by the words Jus and Fas (Fas et jura sinunt.—Virg. Georg. i. 269); and the law of things not pertaining to religion, and of things pertaining to it, are also respectively opposed to one another by the terms Res Juris Humani et Divini (Instit. ii. tit. 1).

The terms Jus Scriptum and Non Scriptum, as explained in the Institutes (i. tit. 2), comprehended the whole of the Jus Civile; for it was all either Scriptum or Non Scriptum, whatever other divisions there might be (Ulp. Dig. l. tit. 1, s. 6). Jus Scriptum comprehended everything, except that 'quod usus approbavit.' This division of Jus Scriptum and Non Scriptum does not appear in Gaius. It was borrowed from the Greek writers, and seems to have little or no practical application among the Romans.

There is another division of the matter of law which appears among the Roman jurists, viz. the Law of Persons, the Law of Things, which is expressed by the phrase 'jus quod ad res pertinet;' and the Law of Actions, 'jus quod ad actiones pertinet' (Gaius, i. 8).—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Jus accrescendi (the right of survivorship). See JOINT-TENANCY.

Jus accrescendi inter mercatores locum non habet, pro beneficio commercii.—Co. Litt. 182. (The right of survivorship does not exist among merchants, for the benefit of commerce.)

Jus accrescendi præfertur oneribus.—Co. Litt. 185.—(The right of survivorship is preferred to incumbrances.)

Jus accrescendi præfertur ultimæ voluntati.—Co. Litt. 185 b.—(The right of survivorship is preferred to the last will.)

Jus ad rem, an inchoate and imperfect right; such as a parson promoted to a living acquires by nomination and institution.

Jus æsneciæ, the right of primogeniture.

Jus albinatus, the droit d'aubaine, which see.

Jus Anglorum, the laws and customs of the West Saxons, in the time of the Heptarchy, by which the people were for a long time governed, and which were preferred before all others.

Jus civile, the interpretation of the laws of the twelve tables, and now, of the whole system of the Roman laws.

Jus civitatis, the freedom of the city of Rome. It differs from Jus Quiritium, which comprehended all the privileges of a free native of Rome. The difference is much the same as between denization and naturalization with us.

Jus commune, the common law.

Jus coronæ, the right of the Crown.

Jus curialitatis Angliæ, the courtesy of England, which see.

Jus deliberandi, the right which an heir has in Scotch law, of deliberating for a certain time whether he will represent his predecessor.

Jus descendit et non terra.—Co. Litt. 345.—(the right descends, and not the land.)

Jus devolutum, the right of the church of presenting a minister to a vacant parish, in case the patron shall neglect to exercise his right within the time limited by law.

Jus disponendi, the right to call upon a trustee to execute conveyances of the legal estate as the cestui que trust directs.—Lewin on Trusts, 595.

Jus dividendi [Mid. Lat.], the right of disposing of realty by will.—Duc.

Jus duplicatum, the right of possession as well as the right of property of a thing.

Jus est norma recti; et quicquid est contra normam recti est injuria.—3 Buls. 313.—(Law is the rule of right; and whatever is contrary to the rule of right, is an injury.)

Jus ex injuriâ non oritur.—4 Bing. 639.—(A right does not arise out of a wrong.)

Jus feciale, the law of nations.—Roman Law.

Jus fiduciarium, a trust.

Jus fodiendi, a right of digging.

Jus gentium, the law of nations.

Jus gladii, the right of the sword; the executory power of the sovereign.

Jus habendi, the right to be put in actual possession of property.—Lewin on Trusts, 585.

Jus habendi et retinendi, a right to have and to retain the profits, tithes, and offerings, &c. of a rectory or parsonage.

Jus hæreditatis, the right of inheritance. See DESCENT.

Jus honorarium, the body of Roman law, which was made up of edicts of the supreme magistrate, particularly the prætors.

Jus imaginis, the right of using pictures and statues amongst the Romans. It had some resemblance to the right of bearing a coat of arms amongst us.

Jus in personam, a right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give or procure, to do or not to do, something.

Jus in re, a complete and full right; a real right, or a right to have a thing to the exclusion of all other men.

Jus in re inhærit ossibus usufructuarii.—(A right in the thing cleaves to the person of the beneficiary.)

Jusjurandi forma verbis differt, re convenit; hunc enim sensum habere debet, ut Deus invocetur.—Grotius, l. 2, c. xiii., s. 10.—(The form of taking an oath differs in language, agrees in meaning; for it ought to have this sense, that the Deity is invoked.)

Jusjurandum inter alios factum nec nocere nec prodesse debet.—4 Inst. 279.—(An oath made in another cause ought neither to hurt nor profit.)

Jus liberorum, a privilege granted to such persons in ancient Rome as had three children, by which they were exempted from all troublesome offices.

Jus mariti, the right to his wife's movable estate which a husband acquires by virtue of the marriage.

Jus merum, pure or mere right.

Jus naturale est quod apud omnes homines eandem habet potentiam.—7 Co. 12.—(Natural right is that which has the same force among all men.)

Jus nec inflecti gratiâ, nec frangi potentiâ, nec adulterari pecuniâ potest: quod si non modo oppressum, sed desertum aut negligentiâ asservatum fuerit, nihil est quod quisquam se habere certum, aut à patre accepturum, aut liberis esse relicturum, arbitretur.—Cic.—(Favor ought not to be able to bend justice, power to warp it, nor money to corrupt it; for if it be overborne, or abandoned, or negligently observed, no one can feel secure that he will receive the inheritance transmitted by his ancestors, or be able to leave his own estate to his children.)

Jus non habenti, tute non paretur.—Hob. 146. (It is safe not to obey him who has no right.)

Jus non patitur ut idem bis solvatur.—(Law does not suffer that the same thing be twice paid.)

Jus Papirianum, the laws of Romulus, Numa, and other kings of Rome, collected by Sextus Papirius, who lived in the time of Tarquin the Proud.

Jus pascendi, the right of grazing.

Jus patronatûs, a commission granted by a bishop to some persons, usually his chancellor and others, of competent learning, to inquire who is the rightful patron of a church.—3 Step. Com. 71, 447, 532.

Jus possessionis, a right of possession.

Jus postliminii [Lat., fr. post, after, and limen, the threshold], the right in virtue of which persons and things taken by an enemy are restored to their former state on their coming again into the power of the nation to which they belonged, persons being re-established in their former rights, and things being restored to the original owner. See Vattel by Chit. 391; Sand. Justin. 132; Smith's Dict. of Antiq. 782.

Jus præsentandi est incorporale.—Co. Litt. 85.—(The right of presentation is incorporeal.)

Jus prætorium, the discretion of the prætor in Roman law, as distinguished from the leges or standing law.—See CIVIL LAW.

Jus precarium, a precarious or courteous right for which the remedy was only by intreaty or request.

Jus presentationis, a right of presenting.

Jus preventionis, the preferable right of jurisdiction acquired by a court in any cause to which other courts are equally competent by having exercised the first act of jurisdiction.—Scotch Law.

Jus privatum, the civil or municipal law of Rome.

Jus publicum privatorum pactis mutari non potest.—(A public right cannot be altered by the agreements of private persons.)

Jus publicum et privatum quod ex naturalibus præceptis aut gentium aut civilibus est collectum; et quod in jure scripto jus appellatur, id in lege Angliæ rectum esse dicitur.—Co. Litt. 158.—(Public and private law is that which is collected from natural principles, either of nations or in states; and that which in written law is called jus, in the law of England is said to be right.)

Jus recuperandi, intrandi, &c., a right of recovering and entering land, &c.

Jus relictæ, the right of a widow in her deceased husband's personalty; if there be children, she is entitled to a third of it; if there be none, to a half.

Jus respicit æquitatem.—Co. Litt. 24.—(Law regards equity.)

Jus superveniens auctori accrescit successori. (A right growing to a possessor accrues to the successor.)

Jus tertii, the right of a third person to attach money belonging to his debtor, &c. in the hands of another person.

Jus testamentorum pertinet ordinario.—4 H. 7, 13 b.—(The right of testaments belongs to the ordinary.)

Jus triplex est; proprietatis, possessionis, et possibilitatis.—(Right is threefold; of property, of possession, and of possibility.)

Jus venandi et piscandi (the right of hunting and fishing.)

Jus vendit quod usus approbavit.—Ellesm. Postn. 35.—(The law dispenses what use has approved.)

Justa, a certain measure of liquor, being as much as was sufficient to drink at once.—Mon. Angl. t. 1, p. 149.

Justice [fr. justitia, Lat.], the virtue by which we give to every man what is his due, opposed to injury or wrong. It is either distributive, belonging to magistrates, or commutative, respecting common transactions among men.

Justicements, all things appertaining to justice.

Justicer, administrator of justice.

Justices, officers deputed by the Crown to administer justice and do right by way of judgment. The judges of the superior courts are sometimes called justices, but the word is now chiefly applied to petty magistrates who sit to administer summary justice in minor matters, and who are commonly called justices of the peace. 'Men,' according to Lord Cowper, 'sometimes illiterate, and frequently bigoted and prejudiced.'—2 Reeves, 468.

The Queen's Majesty is, by her office and dignity, the principal conservator of the peace within all her dominions, and may give authority to any other to see the peace kept, and to punish such as break it; hence it is called the Queen's peace. Also, all the superior judges are conservators of the peace; but justices of the peace, properly so called, are appointed by the Queen's special commission under the Great Seal, the form of which was settled by all the judges in 1590, and continues, with little alteration, to this day. This appoints them all, jointly and severally, to keep the peace in the county named; and any two or more of them to inquire of and determine felonies and other misdemeanors in such county committed, in which number some particular justices, or one of them, are directed to be always included, and no business done without their presence, the words of the commission running thus:—Quorum aliquem vestrum, A., B., C., D., &c., unum esse volumus, whence the justices so named are usually called justices of the quorum. When any justice named in the commission intends to act under it, he sues out a writ of dedimus potestatem from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, empowering certain persons therein named, to administer the usual oaths to him, i. e. an oath of office and of qualification as to estate, to which are added the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, which done, he is at liberty to act. These justices (some particular classes of them excepted) act gratuitously, receiving neither salary nor fees.

The 18 Geo. II. c. 20, enacts that every justice of the peace acting for a county (except such privileged persons as are therein excepted) must have in possession, and for his own benefit, an estate, either legal or equitable, of freehold, copyhold, or customary tenure, in fee, for life, or such term of years as in the act specified, of the clear yearly value of 100*l.* or a reversion or remainder expectant upon such lease as in the act mentioned, with reserved rents of the clear yearly value of 300*l.* per annum. To prevent improper practices, the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 33, provides that no attorney or solicitor shall be capable of being a justice of the peace for any county during such time as he shall practise as an attorney or solicitor. The office subsists during the Crown's pleasure, and is determinable (1) by demise of the Crown; (2) by express writ under the great seal; (3) by writ of supersedeas; (4) by a new commission; (5) by accession to the office of sheriff, during the year of the shrievalty.

As to justices in boroughs, see 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 27; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 105; and in and near the metropolis, 10 Geo. IV. c. 44; 2 & 3 Vict. cc. 47, 71, & 94; and generally, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 84; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 73; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 77.

The power, office, and duty of a justice of the peace depend on his commission, and on the several statutes which define his jurisdiction. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, defines the jurisdiction of justices at quarter sessions.

Justices, Lords of Appeal in Chancery. See CHANCERY.

Justice-seat, the principal court of the forest.

Justiceship, rank or office of a justice.

Justiciable, proper to be examined in courts of justice.

Justiciar, an officer instituted by William the Conqueror; a lord chief justice.

Justiciarii tanquam justi in concreto, justiciarii de banco dicti, nunquam judices de banco.—Co. Litt. 71 b.—(Justices, from 'justi in concreto,' called justices of the bench, never judges of the bench.)

Justiciary, Chief, an office of high importance in our early history. He presided in the king's court and in the exchequer, and his authority extended over all other courts. He was ex officio regent of the kingdom in the king's absence. Writs ran in his name and were tested by him. The last who filled the office and bore the title of Capitalis Justitiarius Angliæ was Philip Basset, temp. Hen III.

Justiciary, High Court of, the supreme criminal court of Scotland, composed of five of the lords of session, added to the lord justice-general and justice-clerk; of whom the lord justice-general, and in his absence the lord justice-clerk, is president. Its jurisdiction extends to the whole of Scotland. It has also the power of revising the sentences of all the Scottish inferior criminal courts, and from it there is no appeal whatever.

Justiciatus, judicature; prerogative.

Justicies, a writ directed to the sheriff in some special cases, by virtue of which he may hold plea of debt in his county-court for a large sum; whereas, by his ordinary power, he is limited to sums under 40*s.*—F. N. B. 117; 3 Bl. Com. 36.

As the sheriff cannot, by this process, or the judgment to be obtained thereupon, arrest the defendant's body, but only take his goods; and as the cause may be removed at the defendant's pleasure into the superior courts, this process is not much in use.

Justifiable homicide, the killing of a human creature, without incurring any legal guilt. It is of various kinds:—

(1) The due execution of public justice, in putting a malefactor to death who has forfeited his life by the laws of his country.

(2) It may be committed for the advancement of public justice, as in the following instances:—(α) Where an officer or his assistant, in the due execution of his office, either in a criminal or civil case, arrests, or attempts to arrest, a person who resists, and is killed in the struggle. (β) In case of a riot or rebellious assembly, officers endeavouring to disperse the mob are justified in killing them, both at common law and by the Riot Act, 1 Geo. I. c. 5. (γ) Where the prisoners in a gaol assault the gaoler or officer, and he in his defence kills any of them, it is justifiable, for the sake of preventing an escape. (δ) Where an officer or his assistant, in the due execution of his office, arrests, or attempts to arrest, a person for felony, or a dangerous wound given, and he having notice thereof, flies, and is killed by such officer or assistant in pursuit. (ε) Where, upon such offence as last described, a private person, in whose sight it has been committed, arrests or endeavours to arrest the offender, and kills him in resistance or flight, under similar circumstances.

(3) When committed for the prevention of any forcible or atrocious crime, but not if the crime is unaccompanied by force.

(4) Where two persons being shipwrecked, get on the same plank, but finding it not able to save them both, one of them thrusts the other from it, whereby he is drowned. This is justifiable upon the great universal principle of self-preservation.—4 Step. Com. 136.

Justification, a maintaining or showing a sufficient reason in court why the defendant did what he is called upon to answer. See 1 Selw. N. P. 32.

Justificators, a kind of compurgators, or those who by oath justified the innocence or oaths of others, as in the case of wager of law.

Justifying bail, proving the sufficiency of bail or sureties in point of property, &c.

Justifying security. Administrators in certain cases are required by the Court of Probate to give justifying security, i. e. the sureties to the administration bond must, in an affidavit, swear that they are, after the payment of their debts, worth a sum specified. Justifying security is required by the court, according to the circumstances of each particular case, subject to the general rule, that whenever administration is granted in default of the appearance of persons cited, but not personally served with the citation, or for the use and benefit of a lunatic or person of unsound mind, unless it is granted to a committee appointed by the Court of Chancery, justifying security must be given. See Probate Court N. C. B. Rules, r. 42; 1 Williams on Executors, 473; and Waddilove's Digest, 26.

Justinianist, a civilian; one who studies the civil law.

Justitia, a statute-law, or ordinance. Also, a jurisdiction, or the office of a judge.

Justitia debet esse LIBERA, quia nihil iniquius venali justitiâ; PLENA, quia justitia non debet claudicare; et CELERIS, quia dilatio est quædam negatio.—2 Inst. 56.—(Justice ought to be unbought, because nothing is more hateful than venal justice; full, for justice ought not to halt; and quick, for delay is a certain denial.)

Justitia est duplex; viz. severè puniens et verè præveniens.—3 Inst. Epil.— (Justice is double; punishing with severity, and preventing with verity.)

Justitia est virtus excellens et Altissimo complacens.—4 Inst. 58.—(Justice is excellent virtue, and pleasing to the Most High.)

Justitiâ firmatur solium.—3 Inst. 140.—(By justice the throne is established.)

Justitia nemini neganda est.—Jenk. Cent. 178.—(Justice is to be denied to none.)

Justitia non est neganda, non differenda.—Jenk. Cent. 93.—(Justice is neither to be denied nor delayed.)

Justitia non novit patrem nec matrem, solam veritatem spectat justitia.—1 Bulst. 199.—(Justice knows neither father nor mother; justice regards truth alone.)

Justitia piepoudrous, speedy justice.—Bract. 333 b.

Justitiam facere, to hold a plea of anything.

Justitium, a ceasing from the prosecution of law, and exercising justice in places judicial.—Cowel.

Justs, or Jousts, exercises between martial men and persons of honor with spears on horseback; differing from tournaments, which were military exercises between many men in troops.—24 Hen. VIII. c. 13.

Justum non est aliquem antenatum mortuum facere bastardum, qui pro totâ vitâ suâ pro legitimo habetur.—8 Co. 101.—(It is not just to make one born before marriage, who all his life has been accounted legitimate, a bastard after his death.)

Juvenile Offenders, trial and punishment of. See 10 & 11 Vict. c. 82; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 59; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 37; and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 67, s. 1 (5). The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 87, amending 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86, enforces contributions not exceeding 5*s.* a week, by parents or stepparents, for the maintenance of juvenile offenders in reformatory schools.

Juverna, an ancient name of Ireland.

Juxta formam statuti (according to the form of the statute).

K.

Kabani, a person who, in oriental states, supplies the place of our notary-public. All obligations, to be valid, are drawn by him; and he is also the public weigh-master; and everything of consequence ought to be weighed before him.—Encyc. Lond.

Kabin, a species of marriage among the Turks and Persians, which is not considered as binding for life, but is solemnized on condition that the husband allows the wife a certain sum of money in case of a separation.—Ibid.

Killythstallion, a custom by which lords of manors were bound to provide a stallion for the use of their tenants' mares.—Spelm.

Kin, or Kindred [fr. cynren, Sax.], relation either of consanguinity or affinity.

There are two degrees of either kindred; the one in the lineal or direct line ascending or descending, and the other in the collateral or indirect line.

The reckoning of degrees of kindred or relationship is as follows:—

I. Lineal.

- (a) Consanguinity
  - (1) Ascending. — Father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, great grandfather, great grandmother; and so on, ad infinitum.
  - (2) Descending. — Son, daughter, grandson, granddaughter; and so on, ad infinitum.
- (β) Affinity
  - (1) Ascending. — Father-in-law, mother-in-law, or step-father, step-mother.
  - (2) Descending. — Son-in-law, daughter-in-law, or step-son, step-daughter.

II. Collateral.

- (a) Consanguinity — Brother, sister, brother's children, sister's children, uncle, aunt, &c.
- (β) Affinity — Brother's wife, sister's husband, uncle's wife, aunt's husband, &c.

The right of representation of kindred for the purposes of distribution of personalty, in the descending line, reaches beyond the great grand-children of the same parents; but in the collateral line it is not allowed to reach beyond brother's and sister's children. Our law agrees in its computation with the civil and ecclesiastical laws, as to the right line, and with the civil as to collaterals, in computing who are entitled to administration and distribution of the personal property of intestates.

There are several rules to know the degrees of kindred; in the ascending line, take the son and add the father, and it is one degree ascending; then add the grandfather, and it is a second degree; a person added to a person in the line of consanguinity making a degree; if there are many persons, take away one, and you have the number of degrees, as if there be four persons, it is the third degree; if five, the fourth, &c.; so that the father, son, and grandchild, in the descending line, though three persons, make but two degrees. To know in what degree of kindred the sons of two brothers stand, begin with the grandfather, and descend to one brother, the father of one of the sons, which is one degree; then descend to his son, the ancestor's grandson, which is a second degree; and then descend again from the grandfather to the other brother, father of the other of the sons, which is one degree, and descend to his son, &c., which is a second degree: thus reckoning the person from whom the computation is made, it appears there are two degrees, and that the sons of two brothers are distant from each other two degrees; for in what degree either of them is distant from the common stock, the person from whom the computation is made, they are distant between themselves, in the same degree; and in every line the person must be reckoned from whom the computation is made. If the kindred are not equally distant from the common stock, then in what degree the most remote is distant, in the same degree they are distant between themselves, and so the line of the most remote makes the degree.—Wood's Inst. 48.

Kin-bote, compensation for the murder of a kinsman.—Old Saxon Law.

Kindlie, a tenant's right to have a renewal of his lease.—Scotch term.

Kindred, relation by birth or marriage; cognation; consanguinity; affinity. See KIN.

King [a contraction of the Teutonic word cuning, or cyning, the name of sovereign dignity. In the primitive tongue it signifies stout, or valiant; the kings of most nations being, in the beginning, chosen by the people on account of their valor and strength.—Verstegan. Camden derives the word from the Saxon cyning, and that from can, power, or ken, knowledge, wherewith every monarch is supposed to be invested. The Latin rex, the Scythian reix, the Punic resch, the Spanish rey, and the French roi, come all, according to Postel, from the Hebrew rosch, chief, or head], monarch; supreme governor.

Bacon uses the word in the feminine gender. He says: 'Ferdinand and Isabella, Kings of Spain, recovered the great and rich kingdom of Granada from the Moors.' See QUEEN.

King-craft, the art of governing.

King de facto et de jure. See DE FACTO.

King-geld, a royal aid; an escuage.

King's Advocate. See ADVOCATE, QUEEN'S.

King's Bench. See QUEEN'S BENCH.

King's Bench Prison, now called the Queen's Prison.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 22; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 7; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 60.

Kings of Arms, the principal herald of England was of old designated king of the heralds, a title which seems to have been exchanged for king of arms about the reign of Henry IV.

The kings of arms at present existing in England are three: Garter, Clarenceux, and Norroy, besides Bath, who is not a member of the college. Scotland is placed under an officer called Lyon king of arms, and Ireland is the province of one named Ulster.

King's Books, they contain the Valor Beneficiorum, i. e. value of every ecclesiastical benefice, and preferment, according to which valuation, the first fruits and tenths are collected and paid, and the clergy rated. This value was certified by certain commissioners, pursuant to 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3, confirmed by 1 Eliz. c. 4.—2 Step. Com. 553.

King's Household. See CIVIL LIST.

King's Silver, the money which was paid to the king, in the Court of Common Pleas, for a license granted to a man to levy a fine of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to another person; and this must have been compounded, according to the value of the land, in the alienation-office, before the fine would have passed.—2 Inst. 511. See FINE.

King's Stores. See PUBLIC STORES.

King's Widow, a widow of the king's tenant-in-chief, who was obliged to take oath in Chancery that she would not marry without the king's leave.

Kingdom, the territories subject to a monarch, either king or queen.

Kinsfolk, relations; those who are of the same family.

Kinsman, a man of the same race or family.

Kinswoman, a female relation.

Kintal, or Kintle [fr. centum, Lat.], a hundred pounds in weight. See QUINTAL.

Kintledge, a ship's ballast. See KENTLAGE.

Kiorckiowariandes, churchwardens.—Swedish word.

Kipper-time, the space of time between the 3rd and 12th of May, in which fishing for salmon in the Thames, between Gravesend and Henley-on-Thames, was forbidden.—Rot. Parl. 50 Edw. III.

Kirby's Quest, an ancient record remaining with the remembrancer of the Exchequer, so called from its being the inquest of John de Kirby, treasurer to King Edward I.

Kirk [fr. cyrce, Sax.; κυριακή, Gk.], a church. Scotch term.

Kirk-note, or Kirk-mote, a meeting of parishioners on church affairs.

Kirk-officer, the beadle of a church in Scotland.

Kirk-sessions, a petty ecclesiastical sessions in Scotland, consisting of the minister, elders, and deacons of a parish.

Kist, stated payment, instalment of rent.—Indian.

Kleptomania [fr. κλέπτω, Gk., to steal, and μανία, frenzy], insanity in the form of an irresistible propensity to steal.

Knaveship, a portion of grain, given to a mill-servant from tenants who were bound to grind their grain at such mill. See THIRLAGE.

Knight [fr. ἱππότης, Gk.; eques, Lat.; cniht, Sax.; chevalier and cavalier, Fr.; cavagliere, Ital.; caballiere, Span.; ritter, Germ. Its etymology has puzzled the most profound and learned antiquaries; its origin, however, appears to have arisen from the Greek, or some more ancient language from which the Greek itself and all other languages were derived. Chryses, in the beginning of the Iliad, addresses the chieftains by the appellation of ἐϋκνήμιδες Ἀχαιοί; an honorable epithet often used by Homer in both his epic poems. Now, the word ἐϋκνήμιδες cannot be applied but to horsemen, as it means bene ocreati, well-booted, the use of boots or greaves being, at that time, and indeed to a very late period, exclusively confined to men who were in the habit of riding. From κνήμη, the leg, from which is derived the English word knee (or vice versâ, from knee, a more ancient word perhaps from which the Greeks derived their κνήμη), arose κνημίς, a boot, part of the usual accoutrement of a horseman. Therefore it is not improper to conclude that the word knight is derived from κνημίς, the boot which covered the knee and leg, κνήμη, and that its proper meaning is 'a man wearing boots to be used on horseback.' The address of the priest of Apollo might be translated, 'knights of Greece.' But the Greeks had another expression for the same meaning, of which our word knight seems to be still a nearer representative, not as to etymology, but as to signification. Ἱππότης, and in the Doric dialect, ἱππότα (which the Mæonian bard introduced when the quantity of his line required it) was used also as a title of great honor for those warriors who had long experienced the fatigues of the field, and were generally seen on horseback at the head of their respective phalanx. The veteran Nestor is often and nearly always distinguished by this epithet. And the same epithet is bestowed upon Phyleus. This title of knight or horseman was also given in another way to other chieftains: ἱππόδαμος is applied to Diomedes, and several others, and means more especially a man skilled in taming and leading a horse. We have not, however, any particular data to guess whether this title was bestowed upon them by their generals or superiors, or merely acquired by their long and distinguished exploits; but it seems obvious that it was owing to one of these causes. It is clear, besides, that the word used to denote the degree of knighthood in the dialects of other nations, is also derived from that useful animal who shares with the brave the fatigues and dangers of war—the horse], a title of honor next to baronets, entitling the person on whom it is conferred to be styled sir, and his wife lady. A knight is now made by the sovereign touching him with a sword as he kneels, and saying, 'Rise, Sir—.' Encyc. Lond.

Knightencourt, a court which used to be held twice a year by the Bishop of Hereford.

Knightenguild, an ancient guild or society formed by King Edgar.

Knighthood, the character or dignity of a knight.

This institution gave rise to three others, each of which is only a deviation from itself: (1) The primitive objects of chivalry induced men to enter into intimate associations, whence sprung the several orders of knighthood. From these, by the degeneracy usually befalling all establishments, are derived the orders still subsisting in modern Europe. (2) The primitive dignity of chivalry gave birth to that species of knighthood as at present conferred. The two species here mentioned, however, are severally distinguished by historians as regular, and honorary; of these the first comprehend such as still adhere to their constitutions, as in requiring vows of celibacy, &c., and the second those which are merely titular. The Teutonic Order is an example of the former; the Order of the Garter of the latter. (3) The union of chivalry with the feudal system, and the decay of both, gave rise to knight-service, and the compulsion of landowners to become knights or pay a fine. By 16 Car. I. c. 20, no man can be compelled to take the Order of Knighthood. See Sir H. N. Nicholas' History of the Orders of Knighthood of the British Empire.

Knight-marshal, an officer in the royal household who has jurisdiction and cognizance of offences committed within the household and verge, and of all contracts made therein, a member of the household being one of the parties.

Knight-service, formerly the most universal and most honorable species of tenure, being entirely military; a feudal tenure. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24. See TENURE.

Knights Bachelors [fr. bas chevalier, Fr.], the most ancient though lowest order of knighthood.—1 Bl. Com. 404. See BAS-CHEVALIERS.

Knights Banneret [milites vexillarii, Lat.], those created by the sovereign in person on the field of battle. They rank, generally, after Knights of the Garter.—1 Bl. Com. 403.

Knights of the Bath [milites balnei, Lat.], an order instituted by Henry IV., and revived by George I. They are so called from the ceremony formerly observed of bathing the night before their creation.—Dugd. Antiq. of Warw. 531.

Knights of the Chamber [milites cameræ, Lat.], those that are created in the sovereign's chamber in time of peace, and not in the field. 2 Inst. 666.

Knights' fee, [feodum militare, Lat.], twelve plough-lands, the value of which was 20*l. per annum* (2 Inst. 596). Selden contends that it was as much as the king was pleased to grant upon condition of having the service of a knight.—Tit. of Hon. p. ii. c. v., ss. 17 & 26. See TENURE.

Knights of the Garter [equites garterii, vel periscelidis, Lat.], otherwise called Knights of the Order of St. George. This order was founded by Edward III. A. D. 1344. They form the highest order of knights. See GARTER.

Knights of St. Patrick, instituted in Ireland by George III. A. D. 1763. They have no rank in England.

Knights of the Post, hireling witnesses.

Knights of the Shire, members of Parliament representing counties or shires, in contradistinction to citizens or burgesses, who represent boroughs or corporations. A knight of the shire is so called, because, as the terms of the writ for election still require, it was formerly necessary that he should be a knight. This restriction was coeval with the tenure of knight-service, when every man who received a knight's fee immediately of the Crown, was constrained to be a knight; but at present any person may be chosen to fill the office who is not an alien. The money qualification is abolished by 21 Vict. c. 26.

Knights of the Thistle. This order is said to have been instituted by Achaius, King of Scotland, A.D. 819. The better opinion, however, is that it was instituted by James V. in 1534, was revived by James VII. (James II. of England) in 1687, and re-established by Queen Anne in 1703. See Penny Cyclopædia and Nicholas' History of the Orders of Knighthood of the British Empire. They have no rank in England.

Knopa, a knob, nob, bosse, knot.

Know-men, or just-fast-men, the Lollards in England.

Koran, or Alcoran, the Mohammedan book of faith. It contains both the ecclesiastical and secular laws by which Mohammedans are governed; and its chief civil provisions, if, indeed, this distinction can be made in the written law, relate to marriage and its incidents, divorce, fornication, and adultery, incest, inheritances, bastardy, wills, contracts, homicide, larceny, retaliation, injuries, law of peace and war. The Koran is by Mohammedans in general regarded as the fundamental part of their civil law, and the decisions of the Sonna, among the Turkish, and of the Imaums, among the Persian sects, together with the decisions of the great doctors, form the rule and precedent in judicial cases; in the secular tribunals these precedents are, however, departed from when not consonant with equity; whence arises the real distinction between the written and common laws—the former more strictly confined to ecclesiastical, and the latter applicable to civil cases. In the latter, which is more modern, the principles of the Roman Civil Law may often be traced, while the former is more directly referable to the Old Testament. The law of the Mohammedans ruled at one period of history no contemptible portion of the habitable globe, viz., Persia, Syria, Egypt, Africa, and Spain. For the characteristics of the Koran, see 2 Hall. M. A. 115.

Ksar, a czar.—Milton.

Kushoon, Cushoon, a body of military, corresponding nearly to our term brigade, varying from one to six or eight thousand men.—Indian.

Kut-Kubala, a mortgage-deed or deed of conditional sale, being one of the customary deeds or instruments of security in India as declared by Regulation 17 of 1806, which regulates the legal proceedings to be taken to enforce such a security. It is also called Bye-bil-wuffa. See a form 8 W. Rep. 29.

Kymortha [Welsh], waster, rhymer, minstrel, or other vagabond who makes assemblies and collections.—Barr. on Stat. 360.

Kyst, Kysta, or Kyste [Sax.], a chest or coffin.

Kyth [fr. cognatus, Lat.], kin or kindred.

L.

Laas [fr. laqueus, Lat. by met., fraud], a net, gin, or snare.

Label [fr. labellum, Lat.], anything appendent to a larger writing, as a codicil; a narrow slip of paper or parchment affixed to a deed or writ, in order to hold the appending seal.

Labina, watery land.—Old Records.

Labor. It is in the physical world always and solely employed in putting objects in motion; the properties of matter, the laws of nature, do the rest. Labor is indispensable to production, but has not always production for its effect. There is much labor, and of a high order of usefulness, of which production is not the object. Labor has accordingly been distinguished into productive and unproductive. Productive is employed in creating permanent utilities, whether embodied in human beings or in any other animate or inanimate objects. Unproductive does not terminate in the creation of material wealth, and, however largely or successfully practised, does not render the community and the world at large richer in material products, but poorer by all that is consumed by the laborers while so employed.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 33.

The greatest improvements in the productive powers of labor, and the greater part of the skill, dexterity, and judgment with which it is anywhere directed or applied, seem to have been the effects of the division of labor. 'Labor,' observed Adam Smith (Wealth of Nat. b. 1, c. v.) 'is the real measure of the exchangeable value of all commodities.'

Labor, hard, this punishment is said to have been introduced by 5 Anne, c. 6, and is frequently added to the sentence of imprisonment.

Laborariis, an ancient writ against persons who refused to serve and do labor, and who had no means of living; or against such as, having served in the winter, refused to serve in the summer.—Reg Orig. 189.

Laborers, servants in husbandry or manufactures, not living intra mœnia. These are sometimes engaged by the day or week, but are understood to be hired for a year where no particular time is limited, and the wages are so much per annum. And with respect to these, regulation is made by various Acts of Parliament, which vest in the justices of the peace, the power of compelling persons not having any visible livelihood to go out to service in husbandry, or in certain specific trades, for the promotion of honest industry; and also empower the justices to determine differences arising between such laborers and their masters. See 23 Edw. III.; 25 Edw. III. st. 1; 12 Ric. II. c. 3; 13 Ric. II. st. 1, c. 8; 7 Hen. IV. c. 17; 4 Edw. IV. c. 1; 23 Hen. VI. c. 13; 3 & 4 Edw. VI. c. 22; 5 Eliz. c. 4; 1 *Jac. Laborers' Dwellings. For facilitating the erection of healthful and commodious dwellings for the laboring classes by public companies, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 132, was passed. As to Scotland, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 95.

Lacerta, a fathom.—Old Records.

Laches [fr. lâcher, Fr., to loosen], slackness, negligence.

It is laid down generally as a maxim, that no laches or negligence shall be imputed to an infant; but this is chiefly true of the exemption that he enjoys from the ordinary bar by lapse of time. It cannot safely be understood in a much larger sense.—Co Litt. 380 b.

The law determines that, in the Sovereign, there can be no negligence or laches. Nullum tempus occurrit regi was formerly the standing maxim on all occasions, and no delay in resorting to his remedy was held to bar the king's right. From this doctrine it followed, not only that the civil claims of the Crown received no prejudice by the lapse of time, but that criminal prosecutions for felonies or misdemeanors (which are always brought in the Sovereign's name) might be commenced, at any distance of time from the commission of the offence. And all this is, in general, still law; but by statute it has been in modern times largely qualified; for by 9 Geo. III. c. 16, the Crown is now barred from its civil right in suits relating to landed property by the lapse of sixty years; and by 32 Geo. III. c. 58, is barred in informations for usurping corporate offices or franchises by the lapse of six years; and by 7 Wm. III. c. 3, an indictment for treason (except for an attempt to assassinate the sovereign) must be found within three years after the commission of the act of treason.

Lac, Lack, Laak, or Lauk, in Indian computation 100,000. The value of a lac of rupees is about 12,500*l.* sterling.

Lacta, a defect in the weight of money.—Law Latin.

Lacuna, a ditch or dyke; a furrow for a drain; a blank in a writing.—Old Records.

Lad, purgation, exculpation. There were three kinds:—(1) That wherein the accused cleared himself by his own oath, supported by the oaths of his consacramentals (compurgators), according to the number of which the lad was said to be either simple or threefold; (2) Ordeal, which see; (3) Corsned, which see.

Also, a service which consisted in supplying the lord with beasts of burthen; or, as defined by Roquefort: Service qu'un vassal devoit à son seigneur, et qui consistoit à faire faire quelques voyages par ses bêtes de somme.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Lada [fr. lathian, Sax.], a lath or inferior court of justice; also a course of water; or a broad-way.

Lade, or Lode, the mouth of a river.

Laden in bulk, freighted with a cargo which is neither in casks, boxes, bales, nor cases, but lies loose in the hold, being defended from wet or moisture by a number of mats and a quantity of dunnage. Cargoes of corn, salt, &c., are usually so shipped.

Lading. See Bill of Lading.

Lady [fr. hlæf dig, Sax., loaf-day, which words have in time been contracted into the present appellation. As to the original application of this expression, it may be observed, that heretofore it was the fashion for families whom God had blessed with affluence to live constantly at their mansions in the country, and for the lady of the manor, once a week or oftener, to distribute to her poor neighbors, with her own hands, a certain quantity of bread. The practice which gave rise to this title is now as little known as the meaning of it; it may be, however, from that hospitable custom, that to this day ladies in this kingdom serve the meat at their own tables], a woman of rank. The title properly belongs to the wives of knights, and of all degrees above them, except the wives of bishops.—Encyc. Lond.

Lady-court, the court of a lady of the manor.

Lady-day, the 25th of March in every year, being the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin, and one of the usual quarterly days for the payment of rent, &c.

Lady's Friend, an officer of the House of Commons, whose duty it was to take care that a husband, who sued for a divorce, made a suitable provision for his divorced wife, if the House of Lords had not provided for it. A parliamentary divorce has been superseded by a dissolution of marriage by the Divorce Court.

Ladyship, the title of lady.

Lædorium, reproach.

Læsæ majestatis, Crimen, the crime of treason.—Glanville, l. 1, c. ii.

Læsio ultra dimidium vel enormis, the injury sustained by one of the parties to an onerous contract when he had been overreached by the other to the extent of more than one-half of the value of the subject matter of the contract, e. g. when a vendor had not received half the value of property sold, or the purchaser had paid more than double value.—Colq. Rom. Civ. Law, s. 2094.

Læsione fidei, suits pro, proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts for spiritual offences against conscience, for non-payment of debts, or breaches of civil contracts. By entertaining them the clergy attempted to turn the spiritual courts into tribunals for the administration of equity; but these suits were prohibited by the Constitutions of Clarendon.—10 Hen. II. c. 15.

Læt [fr. litus, lidus, letus], one of a class between servile and free.—Palgrave, i. 354.

Lætare Jerusalem, Easter-offerings, so called from these words in the hymn of the day. They are also denominated quadragesimalia.

Læthe, or Lathe, a division or district peculiar to the county of Kent.—Spelm.

Lafordswic [fr. hlaford, Sax., lord, and swic, betrayal], a betraying of one's lord or master.

Laga, law.—Old term.

Lagan [fr. liggan, Sax.], goods tied to a buoy and sunk in the sea; also a right which the chief lord of the fee had to take goods cast on shore by the violence of the sea.—Bract. l. 3, c. ii.

Lage-day, a day of open court; the day of the county-court.

Lage-man, a juror.

Lagen, a measure of six sextarii.—Fleta, l. 2, c. viii.

Lagh [fr. laga, Sax.], law. Obsolete.

Lagh-lite, a breach of law; a punishment for breaking the law.

Lagon. See LAGAN.

Lagotrophy [fr. λαγώς, Gk., a hare, and τρέφω, to nourish], a warren of hares.—Encyc. Lond.

Lagu, law; also used to express the territory or district in which a particular law was in force, as Dena lagu, Mercna lagu, &c., which may be looked upon as abbreviated forms of the district under Danish law, Mercian law, &c., without supposing, with Bishop Nicholson, that in these instances the word lagu does not stand for law, but for regio provinciæ.—See Præfatio ad Wilkins & L. Anglo-Sax. p. 16.

Lahman, or Lagemannus, an old word for a lawyer.—Domesday I. 189.

Lah-slit, a mulct for offences committed by the Danes.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Laia, a roadway in a wood.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, p. 483.

Laic [fr. λαός, Gk., people], one who is not in holy orders, or not engaged in the ministry of religion.

Lair-wite, or Lairesite, a fine for adultery or fornication, anciently paid to the lords of some manors.

Laird, a lord of a manor in Scotland.

Laity [fr. λαός, Gk., people], the people as distinguished from the clergy.

The laity are divisible into three states:—

(1) Civil, which includes all the nation, except the clergy, the army, and the navy. It is subdivided into:—

(α) Nobility, as dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons.

(β) Commonalty, as knights of the garter, knights-bannerct, baronets, knights of the bath, knights-bachelors, esquires, gentlemen, yeomen, tradesmen, artificers, and laborers.

(2) Military, consisting, by the standing constitutional law, of the militia of each county raised from among the people, officered by the principal landowners, and commanded by the lord-lieutenant. The more disciplined occasional troops of the kingdom are kept on foot only from year to year, by Parliament; and during that period, are governed by martial law, or arbitrary articles of war formed at the pleasure of the Crown.

(3) Maritime, consisting of the officers and mariners of the British Navy, who are governed by express and permanent laws, or the articles of the Navy, established by Act of Parliament. 1 Bl. Com. cc. xii. & xiii.

Lambards' Archaionomia, a work printed in 1568 containing the Anglo-Saxon laws, those of William the Conqueror and of Henry I.

Lambards' Eirenarcha, a work upon the office of a Justice of Peace, which, having gone through two editions, one in 1579, the other in 1581, was reprinted in English in 1599. The office of these magistrates had become burdensome, owing to the increase of laws, and the multitude of concerns they were to determine on. It was very necessary that some pains should be taken to smooth the way towards the attainment of the requisite knowledge by some well-digested treatise. The criminal law is treated, by this author, in a very different way from any who went before him. It has none of the concise starchness discovered in the compilations of Stannforde and Fitzherbert; but discourses more at large in the liberal style, which few writers upon the law had condescended to imitate since the time of Bracton, Fleta, and Britton.—5 Reeves, 245.

Lambeth Degrees. See CANTERBURY, ARCHBISHOP OF.

Lame Duck, a person unable to meet his engagements.—Stock Exchange cant term.

Lammas [said to be derived from a custom by which the tenants of the Archbishop of York were obliged, at the time of mass, on the 1st of August, to bring a live lamb to the altar. In Scotland they are said to wean lambs on this day. It may be corrupted from latter-math. Others derive it from a Saxon word, signifying loaf-mass, because on that day our forefathers made an offering of bread composed of new wheat], the gule or 1st of August, and the second of the four cross quarter-days of the year. Encyc. Lond.; Wheat. Com. Pr.

Lancaster, a county of England erected into a palatine in the reign of Edward III. and granted by him to his son John for life, that he should have jura regalia and a king-like power to pardon treasons, outlawries, &c., and make justices of the peace and justices of assize within the county, and all processes and indictments to be in his name. It is now vested in the Crown. See COUNTY PALATINE. The northern and southern divisions of this county are two different venues.

Lanceti, vassals who were obliged to work for their lord one day in the week, from Michaelmas to autumn, either with fork, spade, or flail, at the lord's option.—Spelm.

Land [fr. terra, Lat., fr. terrendo, because it is ploughed], in its restrained sense, means soil, but in its legal acceptation it is a generic term, comprehending every species of ground or earth, as meadows, pastures, woods, moors, waters, marshes, furze, and heath; it includes also messuages (i. e. dwelling-houses with some adjacent land assigned to the use of them, usually called a curtilage), tofts (i. e. places where houses formerly stood), crofts (derived from the old English word creaft, meaning handy-craft, because such grounds are usually manured by the skilful hand of the owner; they are small enclosures for pasture, &c., adjoining to dwelling-houses), mills, castles, and other buildings, for with the conveyance of the land, the structures upon it pass also. And besides an indefinite extent upwards, it extends downwards to the globe's centre, hence the maxim:—Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cœlum et ad inferos, or more curtly expressed, Cujus est solum, ejus est altum. But although the term 'land' includes everything on its surface, as well as under or over it, yet it must be understood with the exception of royal mines, i. e. mines of gold and silver, which belong by prerogative to the Queen, who has the privilege of entering upon the lands of a subject, and digging and carrying away such ores; in this country, however, no mines of gold or silver have yet been discovered, so that this branch of the revenue has been hitherto valueless. A slight intermixture of gold and silver will not constitute a royal mine, it being enacted by 1 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 30, s. 4, and 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 6, that no mine of copper, tin, iron, or lead, should be adjudged to be a royal mine, although gold and silver might be extracted from them, but that the king, or persons claiming royal mines under his authority, may have the ore (other than tin-ore in the counties of Devon and Cornwall), paying for the same a price stated in the act, which is called a right of pre-emption. This is not that prerogative of purveyance and pre-emption by which the Crown could buy up provisions and other necessaries through the intervention of purveyors, at an appraised valuation, in preference to all others and even without the owner's consent, as well as forcibly impressing carriages and horses to do the king's business, however inconvenient to the proprietor, upon paying him a settled price; for all these grievances were abolished by the 12 Car. II. c. 24. The pre-emption mentioned above is for the protection of the subject, preserving, at the same time, the just rights of the revenue. The rate of purchase is provided by the 55 Geo. III. c. 134. In customary or copyhold lands (the nature of which has been already explained) neither the lord of the manor, who possesses the freehold, nor his tenant who enjoys the surface, can open new mines without a special custom, or an express compact. In the case of Bourne v. Taylor, reported in 10th volume of East, p. 205, the reader will find discussed the leading cases on this subject.

In modern statutes of any importance, a glossary-clause is introduced explaining the extent of the meaning of many technical words and phrases made use of in them, which words and phrases have very often, in their ordinary signification, a more confined, and, in many cases, a different meaning. Every considerable statute thus carries its own peculiar dictionary, the effect of which is evidently to produce doubt, confusion and perplexity. It really becomes a very serious question whether there should not be passed a general glossarial statute, exactly defining such technical terms, by which their meaning in every subsequent Act of Parliament, should be ascertained and interpreted. However, we find in the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, commonly called the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act, the word 'land' thus defined:—It is to extend, so far as its enactments are concerned, or where the nature of the provision, or the context of the act, shall not exclude such construction, to 'manors, advowsons, rectories, messuages, lands, tenements, tithes, rents, and hereditaments, of any tenure (except copy of court-roll), and whether corporeal or incorporeal, and any undivided share thereof, but when accompanied by some expression including or denoting the tenure by copy of court-roll, it shall extend to manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments of such tenure, and any undivided share thereof.' There are also definitions of the word 'land' to be found in the Dower Act (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105), and in the Inheritance Act (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106), where it is provided to extend to money to be laid out in the purchase of land. This last phrase requires explanation:—It is a great principle of equity that money agreed or directed to be laid out in the purchase of land is considered, in the Court of Chancery, as land, because there is recognised the maxim, 'Whatever is agreed to be done, is considered as actually done.' The true meaning of which maxim is this:—That equity will treat the subject, as to collateral consequences and incidents, in the same manner as if the final acts contemplated by the parties had been executed exactly as they ought to have been done, and not as the parties might have executed them. Such money, then, has all the incidents of real estate—it is no longer considered as personal estate—it descends to the heir-at-law, and is not distributable among the next of kin; but if the purposes for which it was directed fail, this will destroy the 'transubstantiated real quality,' and it will result back into personalty. The Fines and Recoveries Act thus fixes the extent of the expression 'money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands;' it is to include 'money, whether raised or to be raised, and whether the amount thereof be or be not ascertained, and shall extend to stocks, and funds, and real and other securities, the produce of which is directed to be invested in the purchase of lands; and the lands to be purchased with such money or produce shall extend to lands held by copy of court-roll, and also to lands of any tenure in Ireland, or elsewhere out of England, where such lands, or any of them, are within the scope or meaning of the trust or power directing or authorising the purchase.'

Landa, an open field; a field cleared from wood.—Old Records.

Land-agende, Land-hlaford, or Land-rica, a proprietor of land; lord of the soil.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Land-boc [Sax.] (libellus de terrâ, Lat.), the deed or charter by which lands were held.

Land-ceap, a fine paid in some places on the alienation of lands.

Landea, a ditch, in marshy lands, to carry water into the sea.—Du Cange.

Landefricus, a landlord; a lord of the soil.

Landegandman, an inferior tenant of a manor.

Land-gabel, a tax or rent issuing out of land. Spelman says, it was originally a penny for every house. This land-gabel, or land-gavel, in the register of Domesday, was a quit-rent for the site of a house, or the land whereon it stood; the same with what we now call ground-rent.

Landgrave [fr. land, Germ., earth, and graff, or grave, judge or count], a name formerly given to those who executed justice on behalf of the German emperors, with regard to the internal policy of the country. It was applied, by way of eminence, to those sovereign princes of the empire who possess by inheritance certain estates called landgravates, of which they received the investiture from the emperor.—Encyc. Lond.

Landholder, one who holds lands.

Landimers [agrimensores, Lat.], measures of land.

Landirecta, rights which charged the land, whoever possessed it. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

Land-jobber, one who buys and sells land for other men.

Landlord, he of whom lands or tenements are holden; who has a right to distrain for rent in arrear, &c.—Co. Litt. 57.

Landlord and Tenant, one of the common relationships of social life, out of which arise sundry rights, duties, liabilities, and remedies. Consult Woodf., Coote, or Smith, on Landlord and Tenant.

Land-man [fr. terricola, Lat.], a terretenant.

Land-mark, an object fixing the boundary of an estate or property.

Land-reeve, a person whose business it is to overlook certain parts of a farm or estate; to attend, not only to the woods and hedge-timber, but also to the state of the fences, gates, buildings, private roads, drift-ways, and water-courses; and likewise to the stocking of commons, and encroachments of every kind, as well as to prevent or detect waste and spoil in general, whether by the tenants or others; and to report the same to the manager or land-steward.—Encyc. Lond.

Land-revenues of the Crown. The greatest part of these have been from time to time granted by successive sovereigns to lords of manors and others, who now, for the most part, hold the prerogative rights of estrays, waifs, and felons' goods, as their own absolute property. These grants having greatly impoverished the patrimony of the Crown, an act was passed in the reign of Queen Anne, whereby it was declared that all future grants or leases by the Crown for any longer term than thirty-one years, or three lives, should be void. 1 Anne, st. 1, c. 7, amended and continued by the 34 Geo. III. c. 75. At the commencement of the reign of Geo. III. the hereditary revenues of the Crown, arising from renewals, fines, unclaimed estrays, escheats from manors held in capite, and such like, being very uncertain, with all other hereditary revenues, were given up by His Majesty to the aggregate funds; and in lieu thereof His Majesty received 800,000*l.* a-year for the maintenance of his civil list.—1 Geo. III. c. 1. By subsequent acts, 34 Geo. III. c. 75, 48 Geo. III. c. 73, 52 Geo. III. c. 161, these hereditary revenues were put under the management of commissioners styled 'Commissioners of His Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land-Revenues.' This arrangement was confirmed by 1 Geo. IV. c. 1. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 42.

Land-steward, a person who overlooks or has the management of a farm or estate.

Landsturm [Germ., fr. land and sturm, storm or alarm], a military force in Prussia, consisting of all males above the age of thirty-nine capable of bearing arms, liable to be called out only in case of invasion. See LANDWEHR.

Land-tax, a tax laid upon land and houses, which has superseded all the former methods of taxing either property or persons in respect of their property, whether by tenths or fifteenths, subsidies on land, hydages, scutages, or talliages. Although generally a charge upon a landlord, yet it is a tax neither on landlord nor tenant, but on the beneficial proprietor, as distinguished from the mere tenant at rack-rent; and if a tenant have to any extent a beneficial interest, he becomes liable to the tax, pro tanto, and can only charge the residue on his landlord. Houses and buildings appropriated to public purposes are not liable to land-tax. As to its origin and inequality, see 3 Hall. Cons. Hist. p. 135.

The sum fixed by 38 Geo. III. c. 5, to be paid for the land-tax in Great Britain, is 2,037,627*l.* 9*s.* 0¼*d.* which is now made perpetual. To this time the land-tax acts had been annual; but by 38 Geo. III. c. 60, after reciting that it may materially conduce to strengthen public credit, that the duty now payable for one year on land should be made perpetual, subject to redemption by purchase on conditions therein set forth; it was enacted, that the several sums charged by virtue of an act, 38 Geo. III. c. 5, granting an aid for the service of the year 1798, on the respective counties, &c. in respect of the manors, messuages, &c. to be raised and paid within one year from the 25th March, 1798, shall, after the expiration of the said term (allowing for certain specified exceptions), continue and be raised and paid after the 25th March in every year, for ever. And all powers and provisions contained in the said act shall be in full force and be duly executed, subject to the regulations and conditions of redemption or purchase mentioned in it. Provided always that none of the provisions in this act contained shall extend to any sums charged by the said act upon personal estates and perquisites of office; which sums shall, after the 25th of March, 1799, be ascertained, raised, collected, and paid, according to the directions of an act to be passed for that purpose (39 Geo. III. c. 3). It is also enacted, that the land-tax not purchased by proprietors shall be sold to other persons, in whose hands it is converted into a fee-farm rent, with all the remedies for rent reserved upon a lease, subject to redemption by the person in possession or having any beneficial or future interest in the lands; provided that, in such cases, all such lands whereon the land-tax so purchased shall be charged, shall, until such redemption take place, be subject to a new assessment of the land-tax from year to year by an equal rate, according to the value thereof in common with each other, without any power in such purchaser to exonerate the same from such land tax, or to fix the rate of land-tax to be charged thereon. Also, where the whole tax in any place shall not be sold, such lands as are not exonerated by this act from such land-tax, shall continue subject to a new assessment yearly and from year to year, by an equal rate, according to the value thereof, not exceeding in any year 4*s.* in the pound on such annual value. It is also enacted that, in case persons entering into any contract for the redemption or purchase of any land-tax shall neglect to complete their contract, such contract shall be void, and the tax be revived, and again assessed and collected; and the persons thus making default shall forfeit not exceeding one-sixteenth part of the consideration. Where land-tax, remaining unsold, shall exceed 4*s.* in the pound on the annual value, the same shall be subject to an abatement in the manner directed by the said act. By the 42 Geo. III. c. 116, the provisions of the several acts for the redemption of the land-tax are repealed from the 24th of June, 1802, from which date all contracts are to be entered into, and made according to that act, which was rendered more effectual by 43 Geo. III. c. 51.

The sum assessed upon every tenant for land-tax is to be paid by the tenant, who may make a proportional deduction out of all rents to which he is liable; and disputes concerning the adjustment of this proportion are to be settled by the commissioners; but all agreements on the subject are valid between the parties, and it has now become the general practice, both in leases and grants of rent, to stipulate that no such deduction shall be made.

The following statutes for the better regulation of land-tax, and its redemption, have been passed:—39 Geo. III. cc. 6, 108; 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 30; 41 Geo. III. cc. 28, 72; 42 Geo. III. c. 116; 45 Geo. III. c. 77; 46 Geo. III. c. 133; 49 Geo. III. c. 67; 50 Geo. III. c. 58; 51 Geo. III. c. 99; 52 Geo. III. c. 80; 54 Geo. III. c. 173; 57 Geo. III. c. 100; 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 123; 5 Geo. IV. c. 14; 4 Geo. IV. c. 68; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 75; 9 Geo. IV. c. 38; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 127; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 95; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 121; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 11; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 60; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 20; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 80; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 17; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 57, 58; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 37; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 79; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 62; 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 74, 111, 117; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 85; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 80; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 46; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 101.—St. Leonard's V. and P. p. 268.

Land-tenant, he that possesses land let, or has it in his manual occupation; in fact, a terre-tenant.

Land-waiter, an officer of the custom-house, whose duty is, upon landing any merchandise, to examine, taste, weigh, or measure it, and to take an account thereof. In some ports they also execute the office of a coast-waiter. They are likewise occasionally styled searchers, and are to attend and join with the patent searcher in the execution of all cockets for the shipping of goods to be exported to foreign parts; and, in cases where drawbacks on bounties are to be paid to the merchant on the exportation of any goods, they, as well as the patent-searchers, are to certify the shipping thereof on the debentures.—Encyc. Lond.

Landwehr [Germ.], a military force in Prussia somewhat like our militia.

Langeman, a lord of a manor.—1 Inst. 5.

Langeolum [fr. lana, Lat.], an under garment made of wool, formerly worn by the monks, which reached to their knees.—Mon. Angl. p. 419.

Languidus, sick, in ill health; a return made by a sheriff to a writ, when the removal of a person in his custody would endanger his life.

Lanis de crescentia Walliæ traducendis absque custuma, &c. an ancient writ that lay to the customer of a port to permit one to pass wool without paying custom, he having paid it before in Wales.—Reg. Orig. 279.

Lano niger, a sort of base coin, formerly current in this kingdom.—Mem. in Scac.

Lapidation, the act of stoning a person to death.

Lapis marmorius, a marble stone about twelve feet long and three feet broad, placed at the upper end of Westminster Hall, where was likewise a marble chair erected on the middle thereof, in which our sovereigns anciently sat at their coronation dinner, and at other times the Lord Chancellor; over this marble table are now erected the Courts of Chancery and Queen's Bench.

Lapis pacis. See OSCULUM PACIS.

Lapse [fr. lapsus, Lat.], error, failing in duty. A benefice is said to lapse when the patron does not exercise his right of presentation within six calendar months (182 days) after the avoidance of the benefice, exclusive of the day of the avoidance. Lapse, then, is a devolution of the rights of patronage from a neglectful patron to the bishop as ordinary, to the metropolitan as superior, and to the sovereign as patron-paramount of all the benefices in the realm.

The patron must generally take notice of the avoidance of a benefice at his peril. Should the avoidance of a benefice, however, arise in consequence of an act of the ordinary or incumbent (such as deprivation, resignation, or refusal of the presentee on account of simony, illiterature, &c.), the six calendar months are to be reckoned from the time of notice given personally to the patron by the bishop, and not from the time of avoidance.

Lapse is an intransferable trust for the patron, and he that is to present by lapse is, as it were, negotiorum gestor, or a kind of attorney made by law to do that for the patron which it is supposed he would do himself if there were not some hindrance; and, therefore, the collation by lapse is in right of the patron and for his turn.

The law of lapse, which is a spiritual forfeiture, has three gradations, ab inferiore ad superiorem.

(1) After the neglect of the patron, the bishop of the diocese in whose precincts the vacant benefice is situated, may collate, unless the sovereign is patron.

(2) After the expiration of the second half-year, or at the end of one year from the time the patron is bound to take notice of the avoidance, the presentation irretrievably lapses or devolves from the ordinary to his immediate superior, or from the bishop of the diocese to the archbishop of the province, whose duty it is to see that the parishioners have divine service.

If the ordinary be patron of the benefice, it lapses to the metropolitan at the end of six calendar months, as the bishop cannot have a second six calendar months to satisfy his own neglect as patron.

If the bishop do not collate his own clerk immediately to the living, and the patron presents, though after the six calendar months are elapsed, yet his presentation is good, and the bishop is bound to institute the patron's clerk (2 Inst. 273). If the bishop suffer the presentation to lapse to the metropolitan, the patron also has the same advantage if he present before the archbishop has filled up the benefice.

(3) If the ordinary is remiss in providing an incumbent, and the metropolitan in like manner does not present within six calendar months, the Crown may present when it pleases. But if, during the delay of the Crown, the patron himself present and his clerk is instituted, the sovereign, indeed, by presenting another, may turn out the patron's clerk, or, after induction, may remove him by bringing a quare impedit; but if he do not, and the patron's clerk die incumbent, or is canonically deprived, the Crown loses the right, which was only to the next or first presentation.—7 Rep. 28. But see Doctor and Student, p. 219.

No lapse will take place in the following instances:—(1) Where the bishop refuses or neglects to examine and admit the patron's clerk, without good reason assigned or notice given; he is then styled a disturber by the law, and shall not have any title to present by lapse, for no man can take advantage of his own wrong. (2) If the right of presentation be litigious and contested, and an action be brought to try the title, making the bishop a defendant, no lapse can occur until the question of right be decided.

Lapsed Devise. Unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, such real estate or interest therein as shall be comprised or intended to be comprised in any devise in such will contained, which shall fail, or be void by reason of the devisee's death in the testator's lifetime, or by reason of such devise being contrary to law, or otherwise incapable of taking effect, shall be included in the residuary devise (if any) contained in such will.—1 Vict. c. 26, s. 25.

And a devise of the testator's land, or of his land in any place, or in the occupation of any person mentioned in his will, or otherwise described in a general manner, and any other general devise which would describe a customary, copyhold, or leasehold estate, if the testator had no freehold estate which could be described by it, shall be construed to include the customary, copyhold, or leasehold estate of the testator, or his customary, copyhold, or leasehold estates, or any of them to which such description shall extend, as the case may be, as well as freehold estates, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will (s. 26).

The following devises will not lapse:—

Where any person to whom any real estate shall be devised for an estate-tail, or an estate in quasi entail, shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue, who would be inheritable under such entail, and any such issue shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the testator's death, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will (s. 32).

And where any person, being a child or other issue of the testator, to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person, shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue, and any of such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the testator's death, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the testator's death, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will (s. 33). See Jarman on Wills.

Lapsed Legacy. If a legatee die before a testator, the legacy is generally a lost or lapsed legacy, and sinks into the residuum, but see the 33rd section of 1 Vict. c. 26. If a contingent legacy be left to a stranger, as when he attain, or if he attain, the age of twenty-one, and he die before that time, it is a lapsed legacy, even though he survive the testator.—2 Wms. Ex. 1084.

Larceny [fr. larcin, Fr.; latrocinium, Lat.], contracted for latrociny, the unlawful taking and carrying away of things personal, with intent to deprive the rightful owner of the same. The statute law of England and Ireland relating to larceny and other similar offences is consolidated by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. Larceny is either simple or accompanied with circumstances of aggravation.

(1) Simple larceny, at common law, or plain theft. To constitute the offence there must be an unlawful taking, which implies that the goods must pass from the possession of the true owner, and without his consent; where there is, then, no change of possession, or a change of it by consent, or a change from the possession of a person without title to that of the true owner, there cannot be a larceny. If a delivery be obtained from the owner by a person having animus furandi at the time, and he afterwards unlawfully appropriates the goods in pursuance of that intent, it is larceny. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 74, whoever shall steal a chattel or fixture let to be used by him in or with any house or lodging, is liable to the penalties of simple larceny; and by s. 3, any bailee of any chattel, money, or valuable security who shall fraudulently take or convert the same to his own use, or the use of any person other than the owner thereof, shall be guilty of larceny, although he shall not break bulk or otherwise determine the bailment. There must not be only a taking, but a carrying away (cepit et asportavit). A bare removal from the place in which he found the goods, though the thief does not quite make off with them, is a sufficient asportation or carrying away. It must be of personal goods, and not of the realty or things adhering thereto, or savouring thereof. The taking and carrying away must be with intent to deprive the owner of the thing taken, or, as it is expressed, animo furandi. Larceny may be committed of a thing the owner of which is unknown, provided it appear that there is some person other than the taker in whom the ownership resides. Larceny was formerly divided into petit, where the value of the property was not more than twelve pence, and grand, where it exceeded that amount; but now this distinction has been abolished (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 2). The punishment for simple larceny is in ordinary cases penal servitude for the term of three years, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement, and if the offender be a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping (s. 4). If the offender has been previously convicted of felony, either on indictment or on summary conviction, the term of penal servitude may be increased to ten years (s. 7). If he has been previously convicted of an indictable misdemeanor under the act, or has been twice summarily convicted of certain specified offences, the term of penal servitude may be increased to seven years (ss. 8 & 9). Simple larceny is in certain cases punishable with greater severity, for whosoever shall steal any horse, mare, gelding, colt, or filly, or any bull, cow, ox, heifer, or calf, or any ram, ewe, sheep, or lamb, is liable to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen or less than three years, or to be imprisoned not more than two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement (s. 10); and whosoever shall steal to the value of 10*s.* any woollen, linen, or cotton yarn, or any goods of silk, woollen, linen, cotton, alpaca, or mohair, or of any one or more of those materials mixed with each other, or mixed with any other material, whilst laid, placed, or exposed during any stage, process, or progress of manufacture, in any building, field, or other place, is liable to the same punishment (s. 62).

(2) Larceny in a dwelling-house. Whosoever shall steal in any dwelling-house any chattel, money, or valuable security to the value of 5*l.* or more, shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for not more than two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 60); and whosoever shall steal any chattel, money, or valuable security in a dwelling-house, and shall, by any menace or threat, put any one being therein in bodily fear, shall be liable to the same punishment (s. 61).

(3) Larceny from the person. It is either,

(α) Privately stealing, as picking a person's pocket without his knowledge.

The offence of robbing any person, or stealing any chattel, money, or valuable security from the person of another, is punishable by penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen and not less than three years, or imprisonment for not more than two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement (s. 40). On trial for robbery the jury may convict of an assault with intent to rob (s. 41), which is punishable by penal servitude for three years or imprisonment for not more than two years, &c. (s. 42). Whosoever shall, being armed with any offensive weapon or instrument, rob or assault with intent to rob any person, or shall, together with one or more other person or persons, rob or assault with intent to rob any person, or shall rob any person, and at the time, or immediately before or after such robbery, shall wound, beat, strike, or use any other personal violence to any person, shall be liable to penal servitude for life or any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for not more than two years, &c. (s. 43). (In addition to which punishment the offender, if a male, may, by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 44, be sentenced to be once, twice, or thrice privately whipped, subject to certain provisoes in the act contained.) Whosoever shall by any means attempt to choke, suffocate, or strangle any person, or by any means calculated to choke, suffocate, or strangle, attempt to render any person insensible, unconscious, or incapable of resistance, with intent in any of such cases thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit, or to assist any other person in committing any indictable offence, is punishable in the same manner (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 21). By 26 & 27 Vict. c. 44, in connection with the offence of stealing from the person, the statute also provides for the punishment of the following offences:—Sending, &c. letters, &c. demanding money, &c. with menaces (s. 44); demanding money, &c. by menaces or force with intent to steal (s. 45); sending, &c. letters accusing or threatening to accuse of any crime punishable by death or penal servitude for not less than seven years, or of assault with intent to commit, or with an attempt to commit, a rape, or of any infamous crime, with intent to extort money, &c. (s. 46); accusing or threatening to accuse of any of the last-mentioned crimes with intent to extort, &c. (s. 47); inducing, by violence or threats, to execute deeds, &c. with intent to defraud (s. 48), as to which see THREATENING LETTERS.

(5) Larceny by clerks, servants, or agents. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 7, whosoever, being a clerk or servant, or being employed for the purpose, or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, shall steal any chattel, money, or valuable security belonging to, or in the possession or power of his master, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding fourteen years, nor less than three, or to be imprisoned (with or without hard labor or solitary confinement) for a term not exceeding two years, and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping, once, twice, or thrice, if the court think fit, in addition to the imprisonment. Embezzlement is distinguished from this offence as being committed in respect of property which is not, at the time, in the actual or legal possession of the owner. See EMBEZZLEMENT.

(6) Larceny in relation to the post-office. By 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 36, s. 25, every person employed under the post-office, who shall, contrary to his duty, open or procure or suffer to be opened, or wilfully detain, or delay, or procure or suffer to be detained or delayed, a post-letter, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, as to the court shall seem meet. By s. 26 (as modified as to the punishment by ss. 41 & 42; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3), every person so employed who shall steal or for any purpose embezzle, secrete, or destroy a post-letter, shall be guilty of felony, punishable with penal servitude for not more than seven years, or less than three years, or imprisonment not exceeding two years; and if the letter contain any chattel, money, or valuable security, then with penal servitude for life, or any term not less than three years, or with imprisonment (with or without hard labor) for any term not exceeding four years. By s. 32, every person so employed, who shall steal, or for any purpose embezzle, secrete, or destroy, or wilfully detain or delay in the course of conveyance or delivery by post, any printed votes or proceedings in parliament, or any printed newspaper, or other printed paper sent by the post without covers, or in covers open at the sides, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. The above provisions apply only to offences committed by persons in the employ of the post-office; but by ss. 27 & 28 (as altered as to the punishment by the statute referred to), every person who shall steal out of a post-letter any chattel, or money, or valuable security, or shall steal a post-letter-bag, or a post-letter from a post-letter-bag, or from a post-office or officer of the post, or a mail, or shall stop a mail with intent to rob or search the same, shall be guilty of felony, and may be sentenced to penal servitude for life, or any term not less than three years, or imprisonment (with or without hard labor) not exceeding four years. By s. 29 (as altered &c.), every person who shall steal or unlawfully take away a post-letter-bag sent by a post-office-packet, or a letter out of any such bag, or shall unlawfully open any such bag, shall be guilty of felony, and may be sentenced to penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years, or less than three years, or imprisonment (with or without hard labor) for three years. By s. 30 (as altered, &c.), every receiver of a post-letter, post-letter-bag, chattel, money, or valuable security, feloniously stolen under the post-office acts, knowing the same to have been so stolen, shall be guilty of felony, and may be sentenced to penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or imprisonment (with or without hard labor and solitary confinement) for not more than four years. By s. 31, every person who shall fraudulently retain or wilfully secrete, or keep, or detain, or being required by an officer of the post-office, shall neglect or refuse to deliver up a post-letter which ought to have been delivered to any other person, or a post-letter-bag, or post-letter which shall have been sent, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable with fine and imprisonment. By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 88, s. 4, every officer of the post-office who shall grant or issue any money-order with a fraudulent intent, shall be guilty of felony; he is liable, at the discretion of the court, to penal servitude for not more than seven and not less than three years, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

(7) Larceny from ships, docks, wharves, or quays. Any person stealing any goods or merchandise in any vessel, barge, or boat in any haven, or in any port of entry or discharge, or upon any navigable river or canal, or in any creek belonging to, or communicating with any such haven, port, river, or canal; or stealing any goods or merchandise from any dock, wharf, or quay adjacent to any such haven, port, river, canal, or creek, is liable to penal servitude for not more than fourteen years or less than three years, or may be imprisoned for not more than two years, &c. (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 63). See as to larceny generally, 4 Step. Com. 196–222; Roscoe's Crim. Evid.. 560, et seq.

Lardarius regis, the king's larderer or clerk of the kitchen.—Cowel.

Larding money [fr. lardarium, Lat.] In the manor of Bradford, in Wilts, the tenants pay to their lord a small yearly rent by this name, which is said to be for liberty to feed their hogs with the masts of the lord's woods, the fat of a hog being called lard; or it may be a commutation for some customary service of carrying salt or meat to the lord's larder.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, p. 321.

Larons, thieves.

Lascar, a native Indian sailor.

Lashite, or Lashlite, a kind of forfeiture during the government of the Danes in England. Encyc. Lond.

Last [fr. hlæstan, Sax.; lest, Fr.], a burden; a weight or measure of fish, corn, wool, leather, pitch, &c.

Lastage, or Lestage [fr. lastagium, Lat.], a custom exacted in some fairs and markets to carry things bought whither one will, by the interpretation of Rastal. But it is more accurately taken for the ballast or lading of a ship. Also, custom paid for wares sold by the last, as herrings, pitch, &c.

Lastatinus, an assassin or murderer.

Last-court, a court held by the twenty-four jurats in the marshes of Kent, and summoned by the bailiffs, whereby orders are made to lay and levy taxes, impose penalties, &c. for the preservation of the said marshes.—Encyc. Lond.

Last-heir, he to whom lands come by escheat for want of lawful heirs; that is, in some cases the lord of whom the lands were held, but in others the sovereign.—Bract. l. 7, c. xvii.

Last resort, a court from which there is no appeal.

Lata culpa dolo æquiparatur (gross negligence is tantamount to fraud).

Latching, an underground survey.

Latent [fr. latens, Lat.], hidden; concealed; secret.

Latent ambiguity. See AMBIGUITY.

Latera, sidesmen, companions, assistants.

Laterare, to lie sideways, in opposition to lying endways, used in descriptions of lands.

Lath, or Lathe, a part of a county. In some counties there is an intermediate division between the shire and the hundred, as lathes in Kent, and rapes in Sussex; each of them containing three or four hundreds. In Ireland the arrangement was different. 'If all that tything failed, then all that lath was charged for that tything; and if the lath failed, then all that hundred was demanded for them; and if the hundred, then the shire, who would not rest until they found that undutiful fellow who was not amenable to law.'—Spencer's Ireland.

Lathreeve, Ledgreeve, or Trithin-greve, an officer under the Saxon government, who had authority over a lathe.

Latimer [fr. latinier, Fr. q. d. latiner], an interpreter, according to Coke (2 Inst. 575). It is suggested that it should be latiner, because he who understood Latin might be a good interpreter. Camden makes it signify a Frenchman or interpreter.—Britan. f. 598.

Latin, the language of the ancient Romans. There are three sorts of law Latin:—(1) Good Latin, allowed by grammarians and lawyers. (2) False or incongruous Latin, which in times past would abate original writs; though it would not make void any judicial writ, declaration, or plea, &c. (3) Words of art, known only to the sages of the law, and not to grammarians; called lawyers' Latin.—1 Lit. Abr. 146. But proceedings are now written in English.—4 Geo. II. c. 26.

Latinarius, an interpreter of Latin.

Latitat (he lies hid), a writ, whereby all personal actions were originally summoned to answer in the Queen's Bench; so called because it is supposed by the writ that the defendant lurks and lies hid, and cannot be found in the county of Middlesex (in which the court is holden) to be taken by bill, but has gone into some other county to the sheriff of which this writ was directed to apprehend him there.—F. N. B. 78; Termes de la Ley; 2 Bl. Com. 286. Abolished by the 2 Wm. IV. c. 39.

Lator [fr. latus, Lat.], a bearer, a messenger. Cole.

Latro, he who has the sole jurisdiction de latrone in a particular place (mentioned in Leg. W. I.) See INFANGENTHEF.

Latrocination [fr. latro, Lat., a robber], the act of robbing; a depredation.

Latrocinium, the prerogative of adjudging and executing thieves; also, larceny, theft.—Old Charter.

Latrociny, larceny.

Latter-math, a second mowing, the aftermath.

Laudare, to advise or persuade; to arbitrate.

Laudatio, testimony delivered in court concerning an accused person's good behaviour and integrity of life. It resembled the practice which prevails in our trials, of calling persons to speak to a prisoner's character. The least number of the laudatores among the Romans was ten.

Laudator, an arbitrator.

Laudaturque domus, longos qui prospicit agros.—9 Co. 58 b.—(The house is praised which looks over long fields.)

Laudibus (de) Legum Angliæ. Sir John Fortescue, who had been some time chief justice of the king's bench in the reign of Henry VI., is said to have written this work, while in exile with the Prince of Wales, and others of the Lancastrian party, in France. Sir John was then made chancellor; and in that character he supposes himself holding a conversation with the young prince on the nature and excellence of the laws of England compared with the civil law and the laws of other countries. He considers at length the mode of trying matters of fact by jury, and shows how it excels that by witnesses. He informs us, that some of our princes wished to introduce the civil law merely for the sake of governing in the arbitrary way allowed by that law, which declares, quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem. He then proceeds to examine some other points of difference between the civil and common law, always deciding in favor of our own. He concludes his book with a short account of the societies where the law of England was studied, the degrees and ranks in the profession, with the manner in which they were conferred; to these are subjoined some short remarks on the conduct and delay of suits.

This treatise seems to be intended as an introduction to some more particular work on the English law; the object of it being rather to take off the discredit which some civilians had endeavoured to throw on it, and to promote a more general acquaintance with it among persons who did not study it professionally. It is written in a tolerable Latin, and displays sentiments upon liberty and limited government, which one would hardly expect to find in a writer of this period. There runs through the whole an air of probity and piety, that conciliates the attention of the reader, in spite of the many scraps quoted from the Fathers, which are interspersed profusely, and often very much out of season. This is the principal work of our author, to whom we are indebted for some others of less note.—4 Reeves, p. 113.

Laudimium, the fiftieth part of the value of an estate, paid by a new proprietor to the tenant for investiture or leave of possession.—Civil Law.

Laudum, an arbitrament or award.

Laughe, frank-pledge.—2 Reeves, 17.

Launcegay, a kind of offensive weapon, now disused, and prohibited by 7 Ric. II. c. 13.

Laund, or Lawnd, an open field without wood.

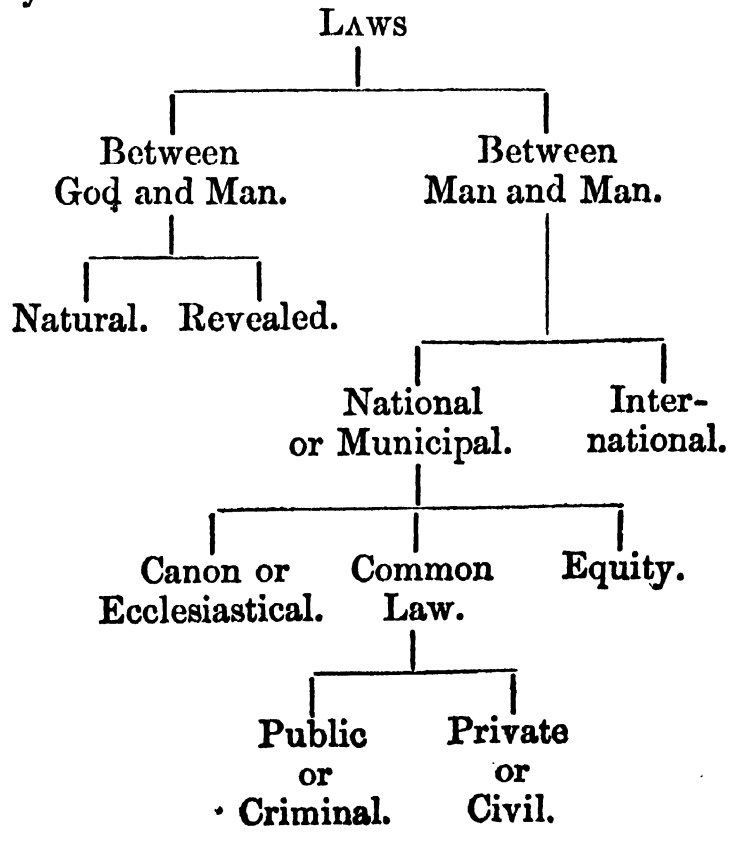
Laureate, or Laureat [fr. laurus, Lat.], an officer of the household of the sovereign, whose business formerly consisted only in composing an ode annually, on the sovereign's birthday, and on the new year; sometimes also, though rarely, on occasion of any remarkable victory.—Warton's Hist. of English Poetry. The annual birthday ode has been discontinued for many years; the laureate, as such, chiefly confines himself to the celebration of important events in which the family of the sovereign is personally interested.

Laureation, a term in the Scottish universities, used for the act of taking up the degree of a master of arts, to which the students are admitted after four years' study. Dr. Johnson states that upon these occasions a flowery crown is used, in imitation of laurel among the ancients.

Laurels, pieces of gold, coined in 1619, with the king's head laureated; hence the name.



Lavatorium, a laundry or place to wash in; a place in the porch or entrance of cathedral churches, where the priest and other officiating ministers were obliged to wash their hands before they proceeded to Divine service.

Lavina. See LABINA.

Law [fr. lage, lagea, or lah, Sax.; lawe, Belg.; loi, Fr.; legge, Ital.; leg, Span. and Port.; laugh, Erse; lex, fr. ligo, Lat., to bind], a rule of action to which men are obliged to make their moral conduct conformable. It is an authoritatively inflexible rule, enforcing justice—a compulsive director of human duty. Law is a moral science, for its end is the accomplishment of justice, and justice is simply practical virtue.

The design and object of laws is to ascertain what is just, honorable, and expedient; and, when that is discovered, it is proclaimed as a general ordinance, equal and impartial to all. This is the origin of law, which, for various reasons, all are under an obligation to obey; but, especially, because all law is the invention and gift of Heaven, the sentiment of wise men, the correction of every offence, and the general compact of the state; to live in conformity with which is the duty of every individual in society. Demos. Orat. 1 contr. Aristogit.

Law arbitrary, opposed to immutable, a law not founded in the nature of things, but imposed by the mere will of the legislature.

Law of arms [fr. lex armorum, Lat.], the ordinances regulating proclamations of war, leagues and treaties, &c.

Lawday, a court-leet, or view of frank-pledge.

Lawing of dogs, expeditation.

Lawless court [quia dicta sine lege, Lat.], a tribunal held on King's Hill, at Rochford, in Essex, on Wednesday morning next after Michaelmas-day, yearly, at cock-crowing, at which court they whisper, and have no candle, nor any pen or ink, but a coal; and he that owes suit or service there, and appears not, forfeits double his rent.—Cam. Brit.

Lawless man [exlex, Lat.], an outlaw.

Law of marque, where they that are driven to it take the shipping and goods of that people of whom they have received wrong, and cannot get ordinary justice, when they can take them within their own bounds and precincts.—27 Edw. III. st. 2, c. 17. See LETTERS OF MARQUE.

Law martial, the military law.

Law merchant [lex mercatoria, Lat.], that part of the law of England which governs mercantile transactions. It is founded upon the general custom of merchants of all nations, which, though different from the general rules of the common law, has been gradually engrafted into it and made to form part of it. See 1 Bl. Com. 67, 273; 1 Step. Com. 56; and Introduction to Smith's Merc. Law. See COMMERCE.

Law-monger, a pettifogger, or low dealer in law.

Law of the staple, the law merchant.

Law spiritual [lex spiritualis, Lat.], the ecclesiastical law, or law christian.—Co. Litt. 344.

Law-suit, an action or litigation.

Laws, expiring, Continuance Act, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 95.

Laws of Oleron, a maritime code said to have been drawn up by Richard I. at the Isle of Oleron, whence their name. They are constantly quoted in proceedings before the Admiralty Courts, as are also the Rhodian Laws.—Co. Litt. 11. See OLERON.

Lawyer, a person learned in the law, as an advocate, counsel, or attorney.

Lay [fr. λαός, Gk.], not clerical; regarding or belonging to the people, as distinct from the clergy.

Lay-Corporations, bodies-politic; they are either (1) Civil, erected for temporal purposes, or, (2) Eleemosynary, for charitable purposes.

Lay-days, running or consecutive days; a term used as to the time of loading and unloading ships, &c. See DEMURRAGE.

Lay-impropriators, lay persons to whose use ecclesiastical benefices have been annexed. At the dissolution of the monasteries by Stat. 27 Hen. VIII. c. 28, and 31 Hen. VIII. c. 13, the appropriations of the several parsonages which belonged to them were given to the king. The same had been done in former reigns when the alien priories were dissolved and given to the Crown. From these two roots have sprung all the lay impropriations or secular parsonages, they having been afterwards granted out from time to time by the Crown to laymen. See 1 Bl. Com. 386; 3 Step. Com. 22. See APPROPRIATION.

Lay-investiture of bishops, putting a bishop into possession of the temporalities belonging to his bishopric.

Lay-fee, lands held in fee of a lay-lord, as distinguished from those lands which belong to the church.

Laye [fr. ley, old Fr.], law.

Layman, one of the people, and not one of the clergy.

Lay-people, jurymen. Obsolete.

Laystall [Sax.], a place for dung or soil.

Lazaret, or Lazaretto, places where quarantine is to be performed by persons coming from infected countries; to escape from them is felony.—6 Geo. IV. c. 78, s. 21.

Lazzi, persons of a servile condition.—Saxon term.

Lea, or Ley, a pasture.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Leading, that which is to be followed, as a leading counsel, leading case, or Leading question, a question which suggests to a witness the answer which he is to make—a suggestive interrogation.

It is not easy to lay down any precise general rule as to what are leading questions: on the one hand it is clear that the mind of the witness must be brought into contact with the subject of inquiry; on the other, that he ought not to be prompted to give a particular answer, or to be asked any question, to which yes or no would be conclusive. But how far it may be necessary to particularise, in framing the question, must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case.

Objections can be taken to leading questions, but ought not to be wantonly or captiously made, since it is, to some extent, always necessary to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of inquiry. The court has discretion to regulate the mode in which a witness-in-chief shall be examined, in order best to answer the purposes of justice. There is no fixed rule which binds counsel to a particular mode of examining him; if a witness by his conduct show himself decidedly adverse, it is in the discretion of the court to allow cross-examination. The situation of the witness, and the inducements under which he may labor to give an unfair account, are material considerations in this respect.

Leading questions are allowed on cross-examination.—1 Stark Evid. 169.

League [fr. ligue, Fr.; ligo, Lat.], a treaty of alliance between different states or parties. It may be offensive or defensive, or both. It is offensive when the contracting parties agree to unite in attacking a common enemy; defensive when the parties agree to act in concert in defending each other against an enemy. Also a measure equal to three English miles, or 300 geometrical paces.

Leakage, an allowance made to merchants for the leaking of casks or the waste of liquors.

Leal, loyal, belonging to law.

Leap-year. See BISSEXTILE.

Lease [either from locatio, Lat., the letting of property, or laisser, Fr., to let, or leapum or leasum, Sax., to enter lawfully], sometimes also called Demise (demissio), is a conveyance of property for life, or years, or at will, by one who has a greater interest in the property. The person conveying is called the lessor, who is possessed of the reversion (as to a reversion being essential to a lease, see Platt on Leases, 9, et seq.); he to whom the property is conveyed, the lessee. The consideration is usually the payment of a rent or other annual recompense, expressly covenanted in the deed to be paid by the lessee, but this is not indispensable. The proper operative words are 'demise, lease, and to farm let' (ad firmam tradidi), which strictly means to let upon payment of a certain rent in farm, i.e. in agricultural produce, the word 'farm,' or 'feorme,' being Saxon, meaning provisions. Farm now generally means land hired to cultivate, upon payment of a money-rent; but any other expressions evincing the intent of the parties will suffice.

If a lease be for life, livery of seisin must be given to the lessee, unless he take by way of use. And under a lease for years, the lessee must enter into the leased premises (unless, of course, he take by way of use) for before entry, he has only an interesse termini by virtue of his common law assurance, a right which can be assigned, but not surrendered, and which will never prevent the merger of two estates by its interposition, nor itself occasion a merger. The interest in a term in futuro is also called interesse termini.

All leases required by the Statute of Frauds, or any other law, to be in writing, must be by deed.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 3. But all leases not exceeding the term of three years from the making thereof, whereupon the rent reserved to the landlord during such term shall amount unto two-third parts, at the least, of the full improved value of the thing demised, may be by parol or verbal contract.—29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 2. See Platt on Leases, or Woodf. Land. and Tenant. By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 7, the person entitled to the benefit of a covenant on the part of a lessee or mortgagor to insure against loss or damage by fire shall, on loss or damage by fire happening, have the same advantage from any then subsisting insurance relating to the building covenanted to be insured, effected by the lessee or mortgagor in respect of his interest under the lease or in the property, or by any person claiming under him, but not effected in conformity with the covenant, as he would have from an insurance effected in conformity with the covenant. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 6, the waiver of the benefit of a covenant or condition in a lease by a lessor, his heirs, &c., is not to be deemed to extend to any instance or any breach of covenant or condition other than that to which such waiver shall specially relate, nor to be a general waiver of the benefit of any such covenant or condition unless an intention to that effect shall appear.

Lease and release, a mode of conveyance which derived its effect from the Statute of Uses, and operated by transmutation of possession, compounded of a lease for a year, at common law, or a bargain and sale for a year under the Statute of Uses, and a common law release. This compound conveyance originated thus: The Statute of Enrolments (27 Hen. VIII. c. 16) seemed to be confined to cases where an estate of inheritance or freehold, or the use thereof, was to be made or take effect by reason only of a bargain and sale; it was therefore concluded that if a bargain and sale were first made for an estate less than freehold, as for one year, and then the inheritance or freehold were superadded by a separate deed of release, the transaction could not be affected by the statute; and that such release to the bargainee would be valid, without his entry upon the lands, as a consequence of the strong words in the Statute of Uses, which converts all vested uses at once into legal estates. The convenience and general applicability of the lease and release recommended and established it as a common assurance. For it was preferable to a bargain and sale, and to a covenant to stand seised to uses, because it affected a transfer of the legal estate under the rules of the common law, and therefore the declaration of uses upon it needed not to be confined to persons from whom a consideration moved. It was also preferable to a bargain and sale, and still more to a feoffment, because no additional ceremony was necessary to its operation; but the transfer of property in land might have been effected by it in any part of the world, as instantaneously as the payment of money. And where the subject of conveyance was land in reversion or remainder, it was also preferable to a mere deed of grant, as it made it unnecessary for the grantee, if his title were called in question, to prove that there was a peculiar estate in existence at the time of the grant.

It was immaterial to the operation of the release whether the previous estate for a year were created by a bargain and sale under the Statute of Uses, or by a lease at common law, perfected by the entry of the lessee. In either case, the conveyance operated by transmutation of possession. It transferred a seisin to the releasee; and if the use had been declared to him, he took an estate, not by virtue of the Statute of Uses, but in the course of possession at the common law. But if the use had been declared to any other person or persons, then it was executed by the statute. When the release was founded upon a bargain and sale for a year, it was necessary that the person making the conveyance should be capable of standing seised to a use. But if the releasor were incapable of standing seised to a use, then the estate for a year should have been created by a lease at common law, accompanied by an actual entry on the part of the lessee.

If a lease and release had been made to D. and his heirs, to the use of K. and his heirs, to the use of, or in trust for M. and his heirs, D. would have taken the seisin, K. the use or legal estate, and M. the equitable or beneficial interest; K. would therefore have been a trustee for M. the cestui que trust, or beneficiary.

By 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21, every instrument purporting to be a release of a freehold estate, and expressed to be made in pursuance of that act, shall be as effectual for all purposes as if a bargain and sale, or lease for a year had been executed, although such bargain and sale or lease for a year shall not in fact have been executed. The stamp upon such bargain and sale or lease for a year was abolished by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, s. 6. The conveyance is, therefore now called a statutory release.—See 4 Reeves, 355; Wat. Conv. 343; 2 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 73; Burton's Comp. 50; 1 Hayes's Conv. 77.

Leasehold, a dependent tenure derived either from a freehold or a copyhold estate.

Leases and sales of settled estates. The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, which came in force on Nov. 1st, 1856 (s. 46), for the purpose of facilitating leases and sales of settled estates, empowers the Court of Chancery to authorize leases of any settled estate, provided such lease take effect in possession at or within one year next after its making; and do not exceed for an agricultural or occupation lease twenty-one years, for a mining lease or a lease of an easement forty years, or for a building lease ninety-nine years, unless the court otherwise direct; and do reserve the best rent without fine; and provided that where the lease is of any earth, coals, stone, or mineral, there be set aside and invested, when and so long as the person for the time being entitled to such rent is entitled to work it for his own benefit one-fourth, and otherwise three-fourth parts thereof, the lease making provision ensuring such application; and provided such lease do not authorize the felling of any trees, except for clearing; and be by deed and counterpart, and contain a condition for re-entry on non-payment of the rent for a period not less than twenty-eight days after it becomes due.

The court may authorize leases either by approving of particular leases, or by ordering that powers of leasing should be vested in trustees (ss. 2–10).

The court may authorize a sale of the whole or any part of any settled estates, except inalienable entails under 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 20, or where the reversion is vested in the Crown (s. 42), or of any timber (not being ornamental timber) growing on any such settled estates. When any land is sold for building purposes, the consideration may be a rent issuing out of such land. Rights of winning mineral or coal may be reserved, and portions of the land dedicated to roads and drains (ss. 11–15).

Application to the court to exercise these powers is to be by petition, with the concurrence of the persons beneficially and legally interested. The prayer of the petition may be granted, saving the rights of any non-consenting parties. Notice of the application must be given to all the trustees, and advertised in such newspapers as a judge at chambers may direct. No application is to be granted where a similar application has been rejected on its merits by parliament, or reported against by the judges. For preventing fraud or mistake, notice of the exercise of these powers is to be placed on the settlement or otherwise, as the court may think proper. Where any order relates to land in a register-district, a duplicate or memorial of it is to be registered in the local register (ss. 16–22; Consol. Ord. 1860, xli., part 3).

The court may appoint trustees to receive monies arising from sales or to be set aside out of the rents reserved on mining leases, and apply them to the redemption of land-tax, the discharge of incumbrances, the purchase of hereditaments, or the payment to any person becoming absolutely entitled. Until monies can be so applied, they are to be invested in Exchequer Bills or Three per Cent. Consols, and the dividends paid to the parties interested. The powers under this act are not to be exercised if an express declaration or manifest intention that they shall not be exercised is contained in the settlement, or may reasonably be inferred therefrom or from extrinsic circumstances or evidence, and the court is not to authorize any act which the settlor could not have authorized. Costs may be a charge on the settled estate (ss. 23–29).

The act also empowers a tenant for life, or for years determinable with his life, or for any greater estate, either in his own right or that of his wife, of any settled estates, unless the settlement expressly declare otherwise, and also a tenant by the courtesy or in dower or in right of a wife seised in fee of any unsettled estates, without applying to the court, to lease any part thereof, except the principal mansion-house and its demesnes, for twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, by deed and counterpart, reserving the best rent (without fine), which shall be incident to the immediate reversion, sans waste, with usual and proper covenants, and a condition of re-entry on non-payment for a period not less than twenty-eight days of the rent reserved and on non-observance of any of the covenants or conditions.

Such lease will be valid against the lessor and expectants under the same settlement, and as to unsettled estates, against claimants through the wife or husband of the lessor.

The 32 Hen. VIII. c. 28, is repealed, except as to leases made in right of churches (ss. 33–35).

The provisions of this act shall extend to all settlements, whether made before or after it shall come in force, except those as to demises to be made without application to the court, which shall extend only to settlements made after this act shall come in force (s. 44).

The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 77, amends and extends 'The Settled Estates Act, 1856,' 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, and enacts that 'for the purposes of the definitions of "settlement" and "settled estates" contained in s. 1 of the said act, all estates or interests in remainder or reversion not disposed of by the settlement and reverting to a settlor, or descending to the heir of a testator, shall be deemed to be estates coming to such settlor or heir under or by virtue of the settlement' (s. 1). 'The term "building lease" in the said act shall be deemed to include a repairing lease, so that no repairing lease shall be made for a term exceeding sixty years' (s. 2). 'All the powers to authorize and to grant leases contained in the said act and this act shall be deemed to include powers to the lords of settled manors to give licenses to their copyhold or customary tenants to grant leases of lands held by them of such manors to the same extent and for the same purposes as leases may be authorized or granted of freehold hereditaments under the said act and this act' (s. 3). The power given to the court by s. 2 of the said act 'to extend the term thereby prescribed for building leases, where it shall be satisfied that it is the usual custom of the district, and beneficial to the inheritance, to grant building leases for longer terms, shall be extended and may be exercised with respect to all the other leases in the same section mentioned, except agricultural leases, provided the court shall be satisfied that it is the usual custom of the district, and beneficial to the inheritance to grant such leases for longer terms' (s. 4). 'The power conferred by s. 5 of the said act to surrender leases granted under the provisions of the said act shall be deemed to extend to all leases whether granted in pursuance of the said act, or otherwise' (s. 4). 'Whenever a married woman is resident out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery of England, or the Court of Chancery of Ireland respectively, as the case may be, her examination, under s. 38 of the said act, may be made by any person appointed for that purpose by the court, whether he is or is not a solicitor of the court; and the appointment of any such person, not being a solicitor, shall afford conclusive evidence that the married woman was at the time of such examination resident out of the jurisdiction of the court' (s. 6). (See Turner v. Turner, 2 De Gex. and J. 534.) Power to rescind general rules and orders is extended (s. 7), and the demises under s. 38 of the said act, in the case of unsettled estates, are to be valid, against the wife of any husband making such demise of estates to which he is entitled in right of such wife (s. 8). See Woodf. Land. and Ten. 35.

Leasing, or Lesing, gleaning.

Leasing-making, slanderous and untrue speeches to the disdain, reproach, and contempt of the sovereign, his council and proceedings, or to the dishonor, hurt, or prejudice of the sovereign or his ancestors.—Scotch Acts, 1584, 1585, 1703, c. 4.

Leccator, a debauched person.

Lecherwite, Lairwite, or Legerwite [fr. legun, Sax., to lie with; wite, penalty], a fine for adultery or fornication, anciently paid to the lords of certain manors.—4 Inst. 206. See LAIR-WITE.

Le congres, a species of proof on charges of impotency in France, coitus coram testibus. Abolished A. D. 1677.

Lecturer [fr. prælector, Lat.], an instructor, a reader of lectures; also a clergyman who assists rectors, &c. in preaching, &c. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 59, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127, s. 12.

Lectureship, the office of a lecturer.

Ledger-book, a book in the prerogative courts, which is considered as their rolls.

Ledgreve, or Ledgrave. See LATHREEVE.

Ledo, the rising water; increase of the sea.

Leet, Court, the view of frank-pledge, which is a court of record, held once in the year, and not oftener, within a particular hundred, township or manor, before the steward of the leet; being the king's court, granted by charter to the lords of certain hundreds and manors. Its original intent was to view the frank-pledges, that is, the freemen within the liberty; besides this, the preservation of the peace, and the chastisement of divers minute offences against the public good, are the objects both of the court-leet and the sheriff's tourn, which have exactly the same jurisdiction, one being only a larger species of the other, extending over more territory, but not over more causes. All freeholders within the precinct are obliged to attend them, and all persons commorant, i. e. lying therein. But persons under twelve and above sixty years old, peers, clergymen, women, and the Crown's tenants in ancient demesne, are excused from attendance; all others being bound to attend upon the jury, if required, and make their due presentments. It was also anciently the custom to summon all the king's subjects, as they respectively grew to the years of discretion and strength, to come to the court-leet, and there take the oath of allegiance. The other general business of the leet and tourn was to present by jury all crimes whatsoever that happened within their jurisdiction. Both the tourn and leet have been for a long time in a declining way, and latterly have fallen into almost total desuetude, and their business has gradually devolved upon the quarter sessions and justices out of sessions.—4 Step. Com. 401. See COURT LEET.

Leets, or Lects, meetings appointed for the nomination or election of ecclesiastical officers. Scotch term.

Lega, or Lacta, the allay of money.—Spelm.

Legable [fr. legabilis, Lat.], capable of being bequeathed.

Legacy [fr. legatum, Lat.], a legacy is a gift of personalty by will, and, arising as it does from the mere bounty of the testator, it is postponed to the claims of creditors. There are four kinds of legacies:—(1) General, when it does not amount to a bequest of any particular thing or money, as distinguished from all others of the same kind; as if a testator give A. a diamond ring, not referring to any particular diamond ring as distinguished from others. (2) Specific, when it is a bequest of a particular thing, or sum of money, or debt, as distinguished from all others of the same kind, as if a testator give B. 'my diamond ring.' (3) Demonstrative, when it is in its nature a general legacy, but there is a particular fund pointed out to satisfy it, as if a testator bequeath 1,000*l.* out of his Reduced Bank Three per Cents. And (4) Cumulative, or substitutional, when a testator by the same testamentary instrument, or by different testamentary instruments, has bequeathed more than one legacy to the same person, and the question arises whether he intended the second legacy to be cumulative, i. e. in addition to the first, or substitutional for it. If by different instruments he has given legacies of equal, greater, or lesser sums to the same person, the court considering that he who has given more than once must, primâ facie, be intended to mean more than one gift, awards to the legatee all the legacies. If, however, they are not given simpliciter, but the motive of the gift is expressed, and in such instruments the same motive is expressed, and also the same sum is given, the court considers these two coincidences as raising a presumption that the testator did not by a subsequent instrument mean another gift, but a repetition only of the former gift. And where the same specific thing or corpus is given, either in the same instrument or in different instruments, it can only be a repetition. Where the legacies in the same instrument, whether a will or a codicil, are given simpliciter and are of equal amount, one only will be good, the repetition being considered to arise from forgetfulness; nor will small differences in the way in which the gifts are conferred afford internal evidence that the testator intended that they should be cumulative. Where, however, the legacies given by the same instrument are of unequal amount, they will be considered cumulative. When two legacies of equal amount are given by one instrument, parol evidence is admissible to show that the testator intended the legatee to take both, for that is in support of the apparent intention of the will; but where the court does not raise the presumption—for instance where legacies of equal amount are given simpliciter by different instruments — parol evidence is not admissible to show that the testator intended the legatee to take one only, for that is in opposition to the will. See Mr. Justice Aston's judgment in Hooley v. Hatton, 1 Bro. C. C. 390 n. (1772), and 2 Tudor's Lead. Cases, 246–261. See CUMULATIVE LEGACIES.

In deciding upon the validity and interpretation of purely personal legacies, courts of equity implicitly follow the rules of the civil law as recognised and acted on in the spiritual courts. But in legacies chargeable on land, they for the most part follow the rules of the common law as to the validity and interpretation thereof. A specific legacy assented to by an executor may be recovered by an action at law. A legacy not exceeding 50*l.* can be recovered in the county court.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 65, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 1.

If a legacy be bequeathed to a person to be paid or payable at the age of twenty-one, or any other age or certain determinate term, and the legatee die before that age, this is such an interest vested in the legatee immediately on the testator's death, that it goes to his executor or administrator, it being debitum in præsenti, though solvendum in futuro, the time being annexed to the payment and not to the gift itself; but if a legacy be bequeathed to a person at twenty-one, or if, or when, or in case, or provided he shall attain twenty-one, or at any future definite period, and he die before that age or period, the legacy lapses, these expressions being construed as annexing the time to the substance of the legacy, so that the right of the legatee is made to depend upon his being alive at the time fixed for its payment. The giving of interest on a legacy to a legatee, let the interest be ever so small, or a provision for his maintenance until the time for payment of the legacy, provided it be equal in amount to the interest, vests the legacy; but not, it seems, where the legacy is payable out of land, much less where anything appears on the will to show the legacy was not intended to vest.

While it is a general rule that if a legatee die in the lifetime of the testator the legacy is lapsed and falls into the residue, except he have been a child of the testator who has left children, it is also a general rule that a trust-legacy does not lapse by the death of the trustee in the testator's lifetime, but that it survives for the benefit of the cestui que trust.

A general legacy will not, if the personal assets are sufficient, be liable to ademption, except in the case of a legacy to a child where a subsequent portion is given by the parent or person in loco parentis. (See SATISFACTION.) In the case, however, of a specific legacy, if the thing specifically bequeathed be not in existence at the time of the testator's death, the legacy is adeemed. A specific legacy of goods at a particular place will generally be adeemed by their removal, unless such removal be temporary or accidental, fraudulent, or on account of fire. If a debt, specifically bequeathed, be received by the testator, it will be adeemed, since there would not then exist anything upon which the will could operate. A partial receipt of a debt will, however, only be an ademption, pro tanto.

Where a partner in trade makes a provision out of his share for his family, and afterwards renews the partnership, by which, perhaps, his interest is varied, yet it is not a revocation, since it would occasion great confusion. See 1 Vict. c. 26, ss. 23, 24; Roper on Legacies; and 2 Wm. Exs. 947.

In the Roman law a legacy was an injunction given to the heir to pay or give over a part of the inheritance to a third person. For its four kinds see Sand. Just. 318, et seq., or Cum. Civ. Law, 160.

Legacy duty, a tax paid to government on legacies. The Legacy Duty Acts are 36 Geo. III. c. 52; 45 Geo. III. c. 28; 55 Geo. III. c. 184; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51.

Legal, lawful; according to law.

Legal assets. See ASSETS.

Legal debts, those that are recoverable in a court of common law, as debt on a bill of exchange, a bond, or a simple contract. See DEBTS.

Legal estates. See ESTATES.

Legal reversion, the period of seven years within which a proprietor is at liberty to redeem land adjudged from him for debt.—Scotch Law.

Legal tender. See TENDER.

Legalis homo, a person who stands rectus in curiâ, neither outlawed, excommunicated, nor infamous.

Legalis moneta Angliæ, lawful money of England.—1 Inst. 207.

Legality, or Legalness, lawfulness.

Legalize, to authorize; to make lawful.

Legally, lawfully; according to law.

Legamannus. See LAGEMAN.

Legantine, or Legatine constitutions, ecclesiastical laws enacted in national synods, held under the Cardinals Otho and Othobon, legates from Pope Gregory IX. and Pope Clement IV. in the reign of King Henry III. about the years 1220 and 1268.

Legatary [fr. legatum, Lat.], a legatee.

Legate [fr. legare, deligare, Lat., to send], a deputy; an ambassador, the Pope's nuncio.

There are three kinds:—(1) Legates à latere, being such as the Pope commissions to take his place in councils, and so called, because he never gives this office to any but his favourites and confidants, who are always à latere at his side. (2) Legates de latere, or legati dati, those entrusted with apostolical legation, and acting under a special commission. (3) Legates by office, or legati nati, those that were legates by virtue of their offices, as in England the Archbishop of Canterbury, in former times.—Encyc. Lond.

Legatee, one who has a legacy left to him.

Legation, an embassy or mission.

Legator, one who makes a will, and leaves legacies.

Legatos violare contra jus gentium est.—(It is contrary to the law of nations to injure ambassadors.)

Legatum, a legacy given to the church, or an accustomed mortuary.—Cowel.

Legatum morte testatoris tantum confirmatur, sicut donatio inter vivos traditione solâ.—Dyer, 143.—(A legacy is confirmed by the death of a testator, in the same manner as a gift from a living person is by delivery alone.)

Legatus regis vice fungitur à quo destinatur, et honorandus est sicut ille cujus vicem gerit.— 12 Co. 17.—(An ambassador fills the place of the king by whom he is sent, and is to be honored as he is whose place he fills.)

Legem facere, to make law upon oath.

Legem ferre, or rogare [Lat.], to propose a law.—Rom.

Legem habere, to be capable of giving evidence upon oath.

Legem sciscere [Lat.], to give consent and authority to a proposed law, applied to the consent of the people.—Rom.

*Legem terræ amittentes perpetuam infamiæ notam inde meritò incurrunt.—*3 Inst. 221.—(Those who lose the law of the land, justly incur the perpetual note of infamy.)

Leger, Leiger, or Ledger [fr. legger, Dut., to lie], anything that lies in a place; as, a leger-book, a book that lies in a counting-house; leger-ambassador, a resident ambassador.

Legergild. See LAIRWITE.

Leges Angliæ sunt tripartitæ: jus commune, consuetudines, ac decreta comitiorum.—(The laws of England are threefold: Common Law, customs, and decrees of Parliament.)

*Leges figendi et refigendi consuetudo periculosissima est,—*4 Co. ad Lect.—(The custom of making and remaking laws is most dangerous.)

*Leges naturæ perfectissimæ et immutabiles: humani vero juris conditio semper in infinitum decurrit, et nihil est in eo quod perpetuo stare possit. Leges humanæ nascuntur, vivunt, et moriuntur.—*7 Co. 25.—(The laws of nature are most firm and immutable: but the condition of human law is always advancing, and there is nothing in it which can continue perpetually. Human laws are born, live, and die.)

Leges non verbis sed rebus sunt impositæ.— 10 Co. 101.—(Laws are imposed on things, not words.)

Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. 2 Rol. Rep. 410.—(Later laws abrogate prior contrary laws.)

*Legibus sumptis desinentibus, lege naturæ utendum est.—*2 Rol. Rep, 98.—(Laws imposed by the state failing, we must act by the law of nature.)

Legiosus, litigious, subjected to a course of law.—Cowel.

Legis constructio non facit injuriam.—Co. Litt. 183.—(The construction of law does no injury.)

Legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet.—Elles. Post. 55.—(The interpretation of law obtains the force of law.)

Legislation, the act of giving laws.

Legislator, a law-giver; a proposer of laws.

*Legislatorum est viva vox, rebus et non verbis, legem imponere.—*10 Co. 101.—(The voice of legislators is a living voice, to impose law on things, and not on words.)

*Legis minister non tenetur, in executione officii sui, fugere aut retrocedere.—*6 Co. 68.—(The minister of the law is not bound, in the execution of his office, either to avoid or flinch.)

Legislatress, a female law-giver.

Legislature, the power that makes laws.

Legitim, the children's claim out of the free moveable estate of their father who has died intestate, amounting to one-half or one-third (according to circumstances) of his moveables, after payment of his debts.—Scotch Law.

Legitimacy, lawful birth.

Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 93, which provides that 'any natural-born subject of the Queen, or any person whose right to be deemed a natural-born subject depends wholly or in part on his legitimacy or on the validity of a marriage, being domiciled in England or Ireland, or claiming any real or personal estate situate in England, may apply by petition to the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, praying the court for a decree declaring that the petitioner is the legitimate child of his parents, and that the marriage of his father and mother, or of his grandfather and grandmother, was a valid marriage, or for a decree declaring either of the matters aforesaid; and any such subject or person, being so domiciled or claiming as aforesaid, may in like manner apply to such court for a decree declaring that his marriage was or is a valid marriage, and such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such application and to make such decree declaratory of the legitimacy or illegitimacy of such person, or of the validity or invalidity of such marriage, as to the court may seem just; and such decree, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be binding to all intents and purposes on her Majesty and on all persons whomsoever' (s. 1).

'Any person being so domiciled or claiming as aforesaid may apply by petition to the said court for a decree declaratory of his right to be deemed a natural-born subject of her Majesty, and the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such application, and to make such decree thereon as to the court may seem just, and where such application as last aforesaid is made by the person making such application as herein mentioned for a decree declaring his legitimacy or the validity of a marriage, both applications may be included in the same petition; and every decree made by the said court shall, except as hereinafter mentioned, be valid and binding to all intents and purposes upon her Majesty and all persons whomsoever' (s. 2).

The petition must be supported by an affidavit verifying it, and that there is not any collusion. The provisions of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, are to apply to the proceedings under this Act. Costs may be awarded and their payment enforced. The attorney-general is to be furnished with a copy of the petition and affidavit one month before filing, and he is to be made a respondent. The court may require persons to be cited, and may pronounce a decree saving the rights of persons not cited. A person domiciled in Scotland may insist on an action of declarator that he is a natural-born subject. No proceedings are to affect final judgments already pronounced (ss. 3–11).

The right of appeal to the Lords given by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 56, extends to all sentences and final judgments on petitions under this Act. 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 7.

Legitimating, the act of making legal or of giving the right of lawful birth. As to legitimation in the Civil Law, see Sand. Just. 121.

Legitime, that portion of a parent's estate of which he cannot disinherit his children without a legal cause.—Civ. Law.

Legitimè imperanti parere necesse est.—Jenk. Cent. 120.—(It is necessary to obey one legitimately commanding.)

Legitimi hæredes, agnate because the inheritance was given to them by a law of the twelve tables.—Sand. Just. 379.

Legruita, a fine for criminal conversation with a woman.—Old Records.

Leidgrave [fr. leid, Lat.], an officer under the Saxon government who had jurisdiction over a lath.—Encyc. Lond.

Leigh, a meadow.

Leipa, one who escapes or departs from service.

Le ley de Dieu et le ley de terre sont tout un, et l'un et l'autre preferre et savour le common et publique bien del terre.—Keil. 191.—(The law of God, and the law of the land, are all one; and both preserve and favor the common and public good of the land.)

Le ley est le plus haut enheritance que le roy ad, car per le ley il mesme et touts ses sujets sont rules, et si le ley ne fuit, nul roy ne nul enheritance serra.—1 J. H. 6, 63.—(The law is the highest inheritance that the king possesses: for, by the law, both he and all his subjects are ruled; and if there were no law, there would be neither king nor inheritance.)

Le ley voit plus tost suffer un mischiefe que un inconvenience.—Litt. s. 231.—(The law would rather suffer a mischief than an inconvenience.)

Lender, he from whom anything is borrowed.

Lent [fr. lenten, Sax., spring], the quadragesimal feast; a time of abstinence; the time from Ash-Wednesday to Easter-day.

Leod, the people, nation, country, &c.—Gibbon's Camd.

Leodium, liege.

Leoht-gesceot [symbolum luminis, Lat.], a tax for supplying the church with lights.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Lep and Lace, a custom in the manor of Writtle, in Essex, that every cart which goes over Greenbury within that manor (except it be the cart of a nobleman) shall pay 4*d.* to the lord.—Blount.

Leporium, a place where hares are kept.—Mon. Ang. t. 2, 1035.

Leproso amovendo, an ancient writ that lay to remove a leper or lazar, who thrust himself into the company of his neighbours in any parish, either in the church, or at other public meetings, to their annoyance.—Reg. Orig. 237.

Le Roy (or la Reine) le veut.—(The King (or the Queen) wills it). The form of the royal assent to public bills in Parliament.

Le Roy (or la Reine) s'avisera.—(The King (or the Queen) will advise upon it). The form of words used to express a denial of the royal assent.

The last occasion on which this power was exercised was in 1707, when Queen Anne refused her assent to a bill for settling the militia in Scotland.

Le Roy (or la Reine) remercie ses loyal sujets, accepte leur bénévolence, et ainsi le veut.—(The King (or Queen) thanks his (or her) loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and therefore wills it to be so.) The form of the royal assent to a bill of supply.

Leschewes, trees fallen by chance or windfalls.

Lesia, a leash of greyhounds, now restrained to the number of three, but formerly more.—Spelm.

Lesion. See LÆSIO.

Lespegend, an inferior office in forests to take care of the vert and venison therein, &c.

Les Prélats, Seigneurs, et Commons, en ce present Parliament assemblées, au nom de touts vous autres subjects remercient très humblement votre Majesté, et prient à Dieu vous donner en santé bone vie et longue.—(The prelates, lords, and commons, in this parliament assembled, in the name of all your other subjects, most humbly thank your Majesty, and pray to God to grant you in health a good and long life.) The form of words used by the clerk in an act of grace, which has the royal assent before it is agreed to by the two houses.

Lessa, a legacy.

Lessee, the person to whom a lease is made or given.

Lessor, one who lets anything to another by lease.

Lessor of the Plaintiff See EJECTMENT.

Lestagefry, lestage-free, or exempt from the duty of paying ballast-money.

Lestagium, lastage; a duty laid on the cargo of a ship.

Leswes, or Lesues, pastures.—Domesday; Co. Litt. 4 b.

Let, hindrance, obstruction.

Leta, a court-leet.

Letherwite. See LAIR-WITE.

Letter, an epistle; also one who grants or lets a thing to another for hire or compensation.

Letter of Absolution, the mode formerly resorted to by an abbot for the release of his brethren, in order to qualify them for entering into some other order of religion.

Letter of Administration. See ADMINISTRATOR.

Letter of Attorney, Power of Attorney, or Procuration, a writing authorizing another person, who, in such case, is called the attorney of the person appointing him, to do any lawful act in the stead of another: as to give seisin of lands, receive debts, or sue a third person, &c. It is either general or special. The nature of this instrument is to give the attorney the full power and authority of the maker to accomplish the act intended to be performed; and sometimes it is revocable, and sometimes not so; if it is an authority coupled with an interest, e. g. if the attorney is authorized to collect debts, and pay thereout a debt due to himself, it is irrevocable. But revocable letters of attorney may be dissolved either by acts of the parties or operation of law. See REVOCATION OF AGENCY.

No trustee, executor, or administrator, making any payment or doing any act bonâ fide under or in pursuance of any power of attorney shall be liable for the monies so paid or the act so done by reason that the person who gave the power of attorney was dead at the time of such payment or act, or had done some act to avoid the power, provided that the fact of the death, or of the doing of such act as last aforesaid, at the time of such payment or act bonâ fide done as aforesaid by such trustee, executor, or administrator, was not known to him: provided always that nothing herein contained shall in any manner affect or prejudice the right of any person entitled to the money against the person to whom such payment shall have been made, but that such person so entitled shall have the same remedy against such person to whom such payment should be made as he would have had against the trustee, executor, or administrator, if the money had not been paid away under such power of attorney.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 26.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75, a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or other agent intrusted with a power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any share or interest in any public stock or fund, whether of the United Kingdom or of a foreign state, or in any stock or fund of any body corporate, company, or society, for safe custody, or for any special purpose, who, without any authority to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge, in violation of good faith, and contrary to the object for which such power of attorney was intrusted to him, sells, negotiates, transfers, pledges, or in any manner converts to his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he shall have been so intrusted, the share or interest in the stock or fund to which such power of attorney relates, or any part thereof, is guilty of a misdemeanor punishable with penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven nor less than three years, or imprisonment for two years.

As to the forgery or alteration of a power of attorney for the transfers of any interest in the public funds, or in the capital stock of any body corporate established by charter or act of parliament, or the offering, uttering, disposing of, or putting off such power of attorney, knowing it to have been forged or altered, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 2.

Letter-carrier, a postman.

Letter-clause, close letter, so called in contradistinction to letters-patent, because the former is commonly sealed up with the royal signet, or privy seal; whereas letters-patent are left open and sealed with the broad seal.

Letter of Credit, a letter written by a merchant or correspondent to another, requesting him to credit the bearer with a certain sum of money.

Letter of Exchange, a bill of exchange, which see.

Letter of Horning. See HORNING.

Letter of Licence, an instrument in writing whereby the creditors of a man who has failed to meet his engagements give him time for the payment of his debts, and undertake that in the meantime he shall be free from arrest. The debtor is usually authorized to compound debts owing to him, &c., and the creditors sometimes severally covenant, that if the debtor shall receive any molestation or hindrance from any of them, he shall be acquitted and discharged of his debt against such creditors, &c.

Letters of Marque, commissions for extraordinary reprisals for reparation to merchants taken and despoiled by strangers at sea, grantable by the secretaries of state, with the approbation of the sovereign and council; and usually in time of war, &c.—Lex. Merc. 173. The words marque and reprisal are used as synonymous terms, although the latter is strictly, taking in return; the former, passing the frontiers in order to such taking.—Dufresne, tit. 'Marca.'

These letters are grantable by the law of nations, wherever the subjects of one state are oppressed and injured by those of another, and justice is denied by that state to which the oppressor belongs. In this case, letters of marque and reprisal may be obtained, in order to seize the bodies or goods of the subjects of the offending state, until satisfaction be made, wherever they happen to be found; and, in fact, this custom seems dictated by nature. The necessity, however, is obvious of calling in the sovereign power to determine when reprisals may be made, else every private sufferer would be a judge in his own cause.—4 Hen. V. c. 7; Muratori's Antichità Italiane, tit. 'Rappresaglie;' Malvezzi's Chron. of Brescia.

But the term itself is now somewhat differently applied. If during war a subject should take an enemy's ship, without commission from the Crown, the prize would, by the effect of the prerogative, become a droit of admiralty, and would belong, not to the captor, but to the Crown. Therefore, to encourage merchants and others to fit out privateers or armed ships in time of war, the lords of the admiralty have been empowered, by various acts of parliament, and sometimes by proclamation of the sovereign in council, to grant commissions to the owners of such ships, and the prizes captured by them have been directed to be divided between such owners and the captains and crews. But the owners, before the commission is granted, give security to the admiralty to make compensation for any violation of treaties between those powers with whom the nation is at peace; and that such armed ship shall not be employed in smuggling. These commissions are ordinarily denominated letters of marque, in which sense alone the term is now accepted.—2 Step. Com. 514. See 29 Geo. II. c. 34; 19 Geo. III. c. 67; 24 Geo. III. c. 47. Our government did not issue any letters of marque to privateers during the late war with Russia, but by order in council, dated 29th of March, 1854, 'general reprisals' were granted against the ships, vessels and goods of the Emperor of Russia, and to give the benefit of all the prizes taken by her Majesty's ships to the captors. On the 16th of April, 1856, the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey, assembled in congress at Paris, signed a declaration, of which the first article was 'Privateering is and remains abolished.' They also engaged, on behalf of their respective governments, that the declaration should be brought to the knowledge of the states which had not taken part in the congress, and that they should be invited to accede to it. It was agreed that the declaration should not be binding except between those powers who had acceded or should accede to it.—Phillimore, International Laws, Appendix. The United States of America were invited to accede to this declaration, but declined.

Letter missive. If a peer be a defendant in the Court of Chancery, the Lord Chancellor sends a letter missive to him, to request his appearance, together with a copy of the bill, petition, and order; if he neglect to appear to this, he is then served with a copy of the bill and a citation to appear and answer; if he continue still in contempt, a sequestration nisi, which is made absolute in the usual way, issues immediately against his lands and goods, without any of the arresting processes of attachment, &c. which cannot affect a lord of Parliament.

Also, for electing a bishop, a letter missive from the sovereign is sent to the dean and chapter, containing the name of the person whom he would have them elect. See CONGÉ D'ESLIRE.

Letters-patent, or Letters overt [fr. literæ patentes, Lat.], writings of the Queen, sealed with the Great Seal of England, whereby a person or public company is enabled to do acts or enjoy privileges which he or it could not do or enjoy without such authority.—7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 73. They are so called because they are open with the seal affixed and ready to be shown for confirmation of the authority thereby given. Peers are sometimes created by letters-patent, and letters-patent of precedence are granted to barristers. By letters-patent aliens are made denizens, and especially new inventions are protected; hence the incorporeal chattel of patent-right.

A 'patent-right' is a privilege granted by the Crown to the first inventor of any new contrivance in manufactures, that he alone shall be entitled, during a limited period, to make articles according to his own invention.—21 Jac. I. c. 3. A manufacture that is the subject of a patent-right must be new within this realm, and must be such as others, at the time of granting such letters-patent, do not use. The person applying for the patent must be the true and first inventor of it; yet where the secret is acquired abroad by one who afterwards introduces it into the realm, he is considered by the law as the true inventor. A patent-right granted as to England will not extend to Ireland.

The grant is entirely an act of royal favor, but yet obtained without difficulty, supposing there be no objection to it. Letters-patent are often taken out in the joint names of two or three persons—if one or two of these persons bore no part in the invention, the patents would be void. Every manufacture, within the meaning of the statute, must be—

(1) New.
(2) Not used before,
  (α) By others, nor
  (β) By the inventor.
(3) Vendible.
(4) Useful.

Though it may be learned abroad (Edgebery

v. Stephens, 2 Salk. 477), yet it must not be suggested by a friend at home (Tennant's Patent, Dav. Pat. C. 429). When the objects of two grants are substantially the same, they may both be valid, if the modes of attaining the desired effect are essentially different (Russell v. Cowley 1 C. M. & R. 864). It would be very difficult to say how much a substance or machine might be used by way of experiment before the patent is obtained, without running a great risk of invalidating the grant (Severne v. Olive, 3 B. & B. 72).

The mode of proceeding to obtain it is as follows:—An application is made by petition to the Crown, the allegations of which are to be supported by a declaration that the petitioner is the true and first inventor, and that the article has not been before made or used to his knowledge or belief. This petition and declaration are left at the office of the board of 'Commissioners of Patents for Inventions,' and with them an instrument called 'the provisional specification,' describing the nature of the invention. The applicant is then referred by the commissioners to one of the law officers of the Crown, who is at liberty to call in any scientific or other person to his aid; and if the law officer shall be satisfied that the provisional specification describes the nature of the invention, and certifies his allowance of the same, the invention may, during six months from the date of the application, be used and published without prejudice to any letters-patent to be afterwards granted; or the applicant may, if he think fit, file with the petition and declaration a 'complete,' in lieu of a 'provisional' specification, inserting in the declaration an additional statement, that the instrument particularly describes and ascertains the nature of the invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed; and in this case the applicant shall have, during the said term of six months, the like powers and privileges as might have been conferred upon him by letters-patent on the date of the application, and during the same term the invention may be used and published without any prejudice to any letters-patent to be granted.

The next step is for the applicant to give notice at the office of the commissioners of his intention to proceed with his application, which will then be advertised by the commissioners; and any person having an interest in opposing the grant of letters-patent will be at liberty, within a certain period, to lodge particulars in writing of his objections. The period for objection having expired, the specification and the objections (if any), are referred to the law officer, who after such hearing (if any), as he thinks fit, may cause a warrant to be made for the sealing of the letters-patent; which warrant having been sealed by the commissioners, the Lord Chancellor may thereupon cause letters-patent for such invention to be sealed with the great seal of the United Kingdom, granting to the applicant the exclusive right of using the invention within the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, and (if the warrant so direct) within the colonies, for the full term of fourteen years. But the letters-patent always contain a proviso to the effect, that, if the 'complete specification' already filed does not particularly describe the nature of the invention, and in what way the same is to be performed, or supposing none to have been yet filed, then if the applicant does not, within a limited period, file such a specification in the Court of Chancery, the grant in the letters-patent contained shall be void. See 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 67; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83; and 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 5 & 115.

The object of the specification is to put the public in full possession of the inventor's secret, so that any person may be in a condition to avail himself of it, when the period of exclusive privilege has expired. It should be such a description as to enable persons of ordinary skill to make the patent article by simply following the directions given, without resorting to contrivances of their own. The specification is bad, when—

(1) Its terms are ambiguous.
(2) Necessary descriptions are omitted.
(3) Parts are claimed which are not original.
(4) Things are inserted to mislead.
(5) The drawings are incorrect.
(6) One of different ways or of different ingredients named, fails.
(7) One of several effects specified is not produced.
(8) The things described are not the best known to the patentee.

A patent right is assignable by deed. The patentee may also grant deeds of license to any one or more persons to manufacture the article, and this without an entire alienation of his interest.

Where it is discovered that an invention, for which a patent has been granted, is not new, although not generally known to the public, the patentee may, under the 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, s. 2, obtain from the Crown a confirmation of the original grant or a new grant, upon satisfying the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that he is entitled to such relief. By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, s. 4, a patentee may obtain a prolongation of the term of his patent for another term not exceeding fourteen years, upon satisfying the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that he has not reaped, within the period to which his privilege is limited, any reward fairly adequate to the labor and ingenuity employed. If there be a mistake or defect in the title or specification of the invention it may be amended under the 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, s. 1, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 3, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, by filing a disclaimer or memorandum of alteration in Chancery, the consent of the Attorney or Solicitor-General having been first obtained.

An action for damages for the infringement of a patent is an action on the case. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, sch. B. No. 33; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, ss. 41, 42; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 79-82.

The 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, s. 7, gives a penalty of 50*l.* against a person using the name, &c. of a patent, to be recovered by action of debt, bill, plaint, process, or information, one-half to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other to any person who shall sue for the same.

If a person have been long in the exclusive use of a patent, a special injunction out of Chancery may be obtained against a person invading it, until the right is tried at law.

Letters-patent are void, if

(1) Contrary to law, or

(2) Mischievous to the state, by

(α) Raising the price of commodities at home;

(β) Or being hurtful to trade;

(γ) Or being generally inconvenient.

The scire facias for repealing letters-patent is an original writ, and founded on some matter of record; it issues out of the common law jurisdiction of the High Court of Chancery, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 109, s. 29; 2 Step. Com. 25; Godson or Coryton on Patents. As to the time when letters-patent take effect in the colonies, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 76.

Letters of request, the mode of commencing an original suit in the Court of Arches, instead of proceeding in the first instance in the Consistory Court.

These letters dispense with the necessity of instituting a suit, in the first instance, in an inferior ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and authorize it to be instituted in the superior court, which could otherwise only exercise jurisdiction as a court of appeal. The judge of the inferior court, who signs the letters of request, by so doing waives or remits his own jurisdiction, and, generally speaking, at once the jurisdiction attaches to the appellate court, and this without any consent or even communication with the intended defendant.—1 Hagg. Eccle. R. 4, note (a).

Letters of safe-conduct. No subject of a nation at war with us, can, by the law of nations, come into the realm, nor can travel himself upon the high seas, or send his goods and merchandise from one place to another, without danger of being seized by our subjects, unless he has letters of safe-conduct, which, by divers old statutes, must be granted under the Great Seal, and enrolled in Chancery, or else are of no effect: the Sovereign being supposed the best judge of such emergencies as may deserve exemption from the general law of arms. But passports under the Sovereign's sign-manual, or licenses from our ambassadors abroad, are now more usually obtained, and are allowed to be of equal validity.—1 Chit. Com. Law, 60, and Vattel by Chit. 416.

Lettres de Cachet (sealed letters). See CACHET.

Levant et couchant [levantes et cubantes, Lat.], cattle that have been so long in the ground of another, that they have lain down and risen to feed, supposed to be a day and a night.—Termes de la Ley.

Levari facias (that you cause to be levied), a writ of execution at common law, commanding the sheriff to levy or make of the lands and chattels of the judgment-debtor the sum recovered by the judgment. The sheriff, however, is not authorized to sell or extend the lands, or deliver them to the creditor, but must collect the debt from the issues and profits of the land, and from the sale of the chattels. This writ, excepting in the case of outlawry, has been completely superseded by the writ of elegit.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 681.

Also a writ to the bishop of the diocese commanding him to enter into the benefice of a judgment-debtor, and take and sequester the same into his possession, and hold the same until he shall have levied the amount of the judgment out of the rents, tithes, and profits thereof. See SEQUESTRARI FACIAS.

Leuca, a measure of land, the extent of which is not precisely known. Some say 1,500 paces. Ingulphus, p. 910, says 2,000 paces. In the Monastic, tom. i., p. 313, it is 480 perches. Spelman says a mile.

Leucata, a space of ground as much as a mile contains.—Monastic, tom. i., p. 768. And so it seems to be used in a charter of William the Conqueror to Battle Abbey.—Cowel.

Levee, the concourse of those who crowd round the sovereign or a man of power in the morning, upon his rising from his bed.

Leviable, that may be levied.—Bacon's Henry VII.

Levirate [fr. levir, Lat., husband's brother or brother-in-law], the name of an ancient law, existing prior to the time of Moses (Gen. xxviii. 8–12), by which, if a husband died without issue, leaving a widow, the brother of the deceased, or the nearest male relation was bound to marry the widow, to give to the first-born son the name of the deceased kinsman, to insert his name in the genealogical register, and to deliver into his possession the estate of the deceased. This peculiar law had its origin, doubtless, in that strong desire of offspring, which was entertained by the Jewish nation. Moses was aware that the levirate law was in some respects pernicious, but when he recollected the feeling which was at the bottom of it, and the importance of that feeling being cherished, he did not think proper to abolish it. While, therefore, he did not withhold from it his sanction, and thought it proper to make it one of the prominent laws of the Jewish state, he reduced it within certain limits, and thereby lessened the injurious consequences as much as possible. He accordingly enacted, that whoever was unwilling to marry the wife of his deceased kinsman might decline to do so in the presence of judges, in case he would allow the woman the privilege of taking off his shoes, of spitting in his face, and of addressing him with the discreditable salutation of unshod, an appellation which, in effect, would be the same with stigmatising him as the destroyer of his father's house.—Deut. xxv. 5–10. The disgrace which would be the consequence of such treatment from the widow was not so great that a person who was determined not to marry would not dare to encounter it.—Ruth iv. 7, 8; Matt. xxii. 23–28; Jahn's Bib. Antiq. part. 1, chap. x., s. 157.

The same custom or law prevails in some parts of India.—Elliot's Asiatic Researches, vol. iii., p. 35.

Levitical degrees, degrees of kindred within which persons are prohibited to marry. They are set forth in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus.

Levy [fr. levo, Lat.], the act of raising money or men.

Lewdness, lustful licentiousness; an offence against the public economy, when of an open and notorious character; as by frequenting houses of ill-fame, which is an indictable offence, or by some grossly scandalous and public indecency, for which the punishment at common law is fine and imprisonment.

Lex, law. In the Roman law it was a resolution adopted by the whole Roman populus (Patricians and Plebeians) in the comitia, on the motion of a magistrate of senatorial rank, as a consul, a prætor, or a dictator.

(The law makes use of a fiction where equity subsists.)

Lex fori, the law of the place of action.

It is universally admitted and established, that the forms of remedies, and the modes of proceeding, and the execution of judgments, are to be regulated solely and exclusively by the laws of the place where the action is instituted; or, as the civilians uniformly express it, according to the lex fori.

Lord Brougham, in Don v. Lippmann, 5 Clark and Fin. 1, remarked thus on this subject:—'The law on this point is well settled in this country, where this distinction is properly taken, that whatever relates to the remedy to be enforced must be determined by the lex fori, the law of the country to the tribunals of which the appeal is made. This rule is clearly laid down in the British Linen Company v. Drummond, 10 Barn. and C. 903; De la Vega v. Vianna, 1 Barn. and A. 284; and in Huber v. Steiner, 2 Scott, 304; 1 Hodges, 206; 2 Bing. N. C. 202; 2 Dowl. P. C. 784; and 4 Moore and Scott, 328; though the reverse had previously been recognised in Williams v. Jones, 13 East, 439. Then, assuming that to be the settled rule, the only question in the case would be, whether the law now to be enforced is the law which relates to the contract itself, or to the remedy. When both the parties reside in the country where the act is done, they look of course to the law of the country in which they reside. The contract being silent as to the law by which it is to be governed, nothing is more likely than that the lex loci contractûs should be considered at the time the rule; for the parties would not suppose that the contract might afterwards come before the tribunals of a foreign country. But it is otherwise when the remedy actually comes to be enforced. The parties do not necessarily look to the remedy when they make the contract. They bind themselves to do what the law they live under requires; but as they bind themselves generally, it may be taken as if they had contemplated the possibility of enforcing it in another country. That is the lowest ground upon which to place the case. The inconveniences of pursuing a different course are manifest. Not only the principles of the law, but the known course of the courts, render it necessary that the rules of precedent should be adopted, and that the parties should take the law as they find it when they come to enforce their contract. It is true, that there may be no difficulty in knowing the law of the place of the contract, while there may be a great difficulty in knowing that of the place of the remedy. But that is no answer to the rule. The distinction which exists as to the principle of applying the remedy exists with even greater force as to the practice of the courts where the remedy is to be enforced. No one can say that, because the contract has been made abroad, the form of action known in the foreign court must be pursued in the courts where the contract is to be enforced, or the other preliminary proceedings of those courts must be adopted, or that the rules of pleading, or the curial practice of the foreign country, must necessarily be followed. No one will assert, that before the jury-court in Scotland, the English creditor of a domiciled Scotchman would have the right to call for a trial of the case by jury; or, take the converse, that a Scotchman might refuse the intervention of a jury here, and insist on having the case tried, as in Scotland, by the judge only. No one will contend in terms, that the foreign rules of evidence should guide us in such cases; and yet it is not so easy to avoid that principle in practice, if you once admit, that though the remedy is to be enforced in one country, it is to be enforced according to the laws which govern another country.'

The doctrine of the common law is so fully established on this point, that it would be useless to do more than to state the universal principle which it has promulgated; that is to say, that, in regard to the merits and rights involved in actions, the law of the place where they originated is to govern. But the forms of remedies and the order of judicial proceedings are to be according to the law of the place where the action is instituted, without any regard to the domicile of the parties, the origin of the right, or the country of the act.—Story's Confl. of Laws, 808.

Lex intendit vicinum vicini facta scire.—Co. Litt. 78.—(The law presumes one neighbor to know the actions of another.)

Lex judicat de rebus necessariò faciendis quasi re-ipsâ factis.—(The law judges of things which must necessarily be done, as if actually done.)

Lex judicialis, an ordeal.

Lex Julia majestatis, a law promulgated by Augustus Cæsar among the Romans, comprehending all the ancient laws that had before been enacted to punish transgressors against the state.—4 Step. Com. 234.

Lex loci contractus (the law of the place of the contract). Generally speaking, the validity of a contract is decided by the law of the place where it is made. If valid there, it is, by the general law of nations (jure gentium), held valid everywhere, by the tacit or implied consent of the parties. The rule is founded, not merely in the convenience, but in the necessities of nations; for otherwise it would be impracticable for them to carry on an extensive intercourse and commerce with each other. The whole system of agencies, of purchases and sales, of mutual credits, and of transfers of negotiable instruments, rests on this foundation; and the nation which should refuse to acknowledge the common principles, would soon find its whole commercial intercourse reduced to a state like that in which it now exists among savage tribes, among the barbarous nations of Sumatra, and among other portions of Asia washed by the Pacific.

The same rule applies to the invalidity of contracts; if void or illegal by the law of the place of the contract, they are generally held void and illegal everywhere. This would seem to be a principle derived from the very elements of natural justice. The code has expounded it in strong terms: Nullum enim pactum, nullam conventionem, nullum contractum, inter eos videri volumus subsecutum, qui contrahunt lege contrahere prohibente (l. i. tit. 14, l. 5). If void in its origin, it seems difficult to find any principle upon which any subsequent validity can be given to it in any other country. But there is an exception to the rule as to the universal validity of contracts, which is, that no nation is bound to recognise or enforce any contracts which are injurious to its own interests, or to those of its own subjects.

A few cases may serve to illustrate the exceptions under each of the foregoing heads:—

First, contracts which are in evasion or fraud of the laws of a particular country.

The second class of excepted contracts comprehends those against good morals, or religion, or public rights.

The next class of excepted contracts comprehends those which are opposed to the national policy and institutions.

Another rule, naturally flowing from or rather illustrative of that already stated respecting the validity of contracts is, that all the formalities, proofs, or authentications of them, which are required by the lex loci, are indispensable to their validity everywhere else.

Another rule, illustrative of the same general principle, is that the law of the place of the contract is to govern, as to the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of the contract—

First, as to the nature of the contract, by which is meant those qualities which properly belong to it, and by law or custom always accompany it, or inhere in it. Foreign jurists are accustomed to call such qualities naturalia contractûs.

Secondly, the obligation of the contract, which, though often confounded with, is distinguishable from its nature. The obligation of a contract is the duty to perform it, whatever may be its nature. It may be a moral obligation, or a legal obligation, or both. But when we speak of obligation generally, we mean legal obligation; that is, the right to performance which the law confers on one party, and the corresponding duty of performance to which it binds the other. This is what the French jurists call le lien du contrat (the legal tie of the contract) onus conventionis, and what the civilians generally call vinculum juris or vinculum obligationis. The Institutes of Justinian have thus defined it: Obligatio est juris vinculum, quo necessitate adstringimur alicujus rei solvendæ secundum nostræ civitatis jura (l. 3, t. 14). A contract may, in its nature, be purely voluntary, and possess no legal obligation. It may be a mere naked agreement (nudum pactum). It may possess a legal obligation; but the laws may limit the extent and force of that obligation in personam, or in rem. It may bind the party personally, but not bind his estate; or it may bind his estate, and not bind his person. The obligation may be limited in its operation or duration; or it may be revocable or dissoluble in certain future events, or under peculiar circumstances.

Thirdly, the interpretation of contracts. Upon this subject there would scarcely seem to be any room for doubt or disputation. There are certain general rules of interpretation, recognised by all nations, which form the basis of all reasoning on the subject of contracts. The object is, to ascertain the real intention of the parties in their stipulations; and when the latter are silent or ambiguous, to ascertain what is the true sense of the words used, and what ought to be implied, in order to give them their true and full effect. The primary rule in all expositions of this sort, is that of common sense, so well expressed in the Digest—In conventionibus contrahentium voluntas potius quam verba spectari placuit (l. 50, tit. 16, l. 219). But in many cases the words used in contracts have different meanings attached to them in different places, by law or by custom; and where the words are in themselves obscure or ambiguous, custom and usage in a particular place may give them an exact and appropriate meaning. Hence, the rule has found admission into almost all, if not into all, systems of jurisprudence, that if the full and entire intention of the parties do not appear from the words of the contract, and if it can be interpreted by any custom or usage of the place where it is made, that course is to be adopted.

The general rule is, that a defence or discharge good by the law of the place where the contract is made or is to be performed is to be held of equal validity in every other place where the question may come to be litigated.

The converse doctrine is equally well established, viz. that the discharge of a contract by the law of a place where the contract was not made or not to be performed will not be a discharge of it in any other country.—Story's Confl. of Laws, c. viii.

Lex loci rei sitæ (the law of the place where the thing is situate). It is sometimes also called lex situs. As to real or immoveable property, the general rule of the common law is, that the laws of the place where such property is situate exclusively govern in respect to the rights of the parties, the modes of transfer, and the solemnities which should accompany them. The title, therefore, to real property can be acquired, passed, and lost only according to the lex loci rei sitæ.—Story's Confl. of Laws, s. 424. Lex reprobat moram.—Jenk. Cent. 35.—(The law dislikes delay.)

Lex sacramentalis, purgation by oath.

Lex scripta, the written or statute law.

Lex scripta si cesset, id custodiri oportet quod moribus et consuetudine inductum est; et si qua in re hoc defecerit, tunc id quod proximum et consequens ei est; et si id non appareat, tunc jus quo urbs Romana utitur servari oportet.—7 Co. 19.—(If the written law be silent, that which is drawn from manners and custom ought to be observed; and if that is in any matter defective, then that which is next and analogous to it; and if that does not appear, then the law which Rome used should be followed.)

Lex semper dabit remedium.—(The law will always give a remedy.)

Lex semper intendit quod convenit rationi.—Co. Litt. 78.—(The law always intends what is agreeable to reason.)

Lex spectat naturæ ordinem.—Co. Litt. 197. (The law regards the order of nature.)

Lex succurrit ignoranti.—Jenk. 15.—(The law assists the ignorant.)

Lex uno ore omnes alloquitur.—2 Inst. 184. (The law speaks to all with the same mouth.)

Lex talionis, the law of retaliation. The law of retaliation was common among all ancient nations, and was, in truth, the most efficacious means of protecting a person from injuries; but, in progress of time, when feelings and manners had assumed a milder tone, causes which originated from one person's receiving bodily injuries from another were brought into the common civil courts on the footing of other causes, and the punishment to be inflicted upon the aggressor, or the satisfaction in any other way to be rendered to the injured party, was left entirely to the person who sat as judge.

The arguments which have been used against the expediency and propriety of the jus talionis are of no great weight. For instance, it has been said that this system of retaliation increased the number of injured and mutilated persons in the community, when, on the contrary, it probably diminished it, as a person would naturally be cautious how he inflicted wounds on the body of another, when he was fully aware of what might be the consequences to himself. Another objection is, that it would be very difficult, or altogether impossible, to requite upon the original aggressor just as much and no more than had been suffered by the injured party. But the answer is, if from any circumstances he should suffer more, all he has to do is to attribute it to himself, and to consider it as what he might naturally have expected.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq. p. 2, c. iii., s. 256.

Lex terræ, the law and custom of the land.

Lex Wallensica, the Welsh law.

Ley, or Loi, law; the oath with compurgators; also, a meadow.

Ley gager, a wager of law; one who commences a lawsuit.

Leyerwite, a fine formerly paid for adultery or fornication.

Leze-majesty, an offence against sovereign power; treason; rebellion.

Liard, a farthing.

Libel [fr. libellus, Lat; libelle, Fr.], a satire; defamatory writing; a lampoon. All contumelious matter that tends to degrade a man in the opinion of his neighbors, or to make him ridiculous, will amount, when conveyed in writing, or by picture, effigy, or the like, to libel. The term also legally includes such writings as are of a blasphemous, treasonable, seditious, or immoral kind.—3 Hall. Const. Hist. p. 167.

The author as well as the publisher of a written calumny is liable to an action, and is also punishable, although it do not impute any indictable offence, but merely tends to disgrace, ridicule, or bring into contempt the person caluminated, e. g. by imputing hypocrisy or want of proper feeling, or rudeness to females, and still more if it impute fornication, swindling, or any other deviation from moral rectitude or principle; unless indeed it was written and published on a lawful occasion, as in bonâ fide giving a fair character to a servant, or in making a confidential communication, which is primâ facie legal, though proof of express malice will defeat that defence; or was a correct report of a trial or proceeding, where both plaintiff and defendant may be supposed to have been before the court. Such a report, as a general rule, is justifiable, but of a report of an ex parte proceeding, or matter relating to a third person not before the court, is not.—2 Russ. Chan. Rep. 607; 3 Barn. and Ald. 702. The 1 Wm. IV. c. 73, by requiring proprietors of newspapers to find sureties, affords some protection against libels therein. Sending a libel privately to the person libelled, as tending to excite him to a breach of the peace, is indictable; but without some publication to a third person, no action could be sustained. But the printing of a libel is of itself evidence of a publication, because the compositor and persons employed in printing must be presumed to have read it; and the sending a letter by post to a third person, and proof that the seal has been broken, and proof of defendant's handwriting, is presumptive evidence of publication to the third person. Justification of a libel imputing felony must be established by similar proof of the offence as upon an indictment, and may be proved under the plea of not guilty, but it is advisable to plead a justification.—1 Chit. Gen. Prac. p. 43 a.

By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, for amending the law respecting defamatory words and libels, it is provided that in pleading to any indictment or information for a defamatory libel, the defendant may, by way of defence, allege the truth of the matters charged, and further, that it was for the public benefit that the matters charged should be published, showing the particular fact or facts by reason whereof it was for the public benefit, and that if after such plea the defendant shall be convicted, it shall be competent to the court, in pronouncing sentence, to consider whether the guilt of the defendant is aggravated or mitigated by the plea and the evidence thereon. The same act also contains provisions intended to relieve editors and proprietors of newspapers, or other periodical publications, from the hardship to which they were subject under the former law, in being held liable absolutely, and without qualification, for all libels therein inserted, though inserted without their knowledge. These enactments are, first, that in an action for a libel of this description, it shall be competent to the defendant to plead that it was inserted without actual malice, and without gross negligence, and that before the commencement of the action, or at the earliest opportunity afterwards, he inserted in the same publication a full apology (or if the publication should be ordinarily published at intervals exceeding a week, had offered to publish the apology in any newspaper or periodical publication, to be selected by the plaintiff), and the defendant shall, upon such plea, be at liberty to pay into court a sum of money, by way of amends for the injury sustained. And as regards an indictment or information for such a libel, that it shall be competent to defendant to prove that the publication was without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and did not arise from want of due care and caution on his part. The statute further enacts, that in all indictments or informations for libel by a private prosecutor, if judgment be given for the defendant, he shall be entitled to recover from the prosecutor his costs; and if it be given against him, upon a special plea, he shall be liable to pay the prosecutor the costs occasioned by such plea; and, moreover, that every person convicted of maliciously publishing a defamatory libel, knowing the same to be false, shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years in the common gaol or house of correction, and to pay such fine as the court shall award, and to the like punishment, even where the aggravation of wilful falsehood shall not exist, but with reduction of the limit of imprisonment, in that case, to one year. The act also contains a provision which applies to every action for defamation, whether oral or written, viz. that it shall be lawful for the defendant (after notice in writing of his intention so to do, duly given to the plaintiff at the time of pleading) to give in evidence, in mitigation of damages, that he made or offered an apology to the plaintiff before the commencement of the action, or as soon afterwards as he had an opportunity, in case the action had been commenced before an opportunity could be found.

By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 85, it is enacted, that if any person shall publish, or shall threaten to publish any libel, or directly or indirectly propose to abstain from printing or publishing, or offer to prevent the printing or publishing of any matter touching any person, with intent to extort any money, security for money, or valuable thing, from such person, or any other; or with intent to induce any person to confer or procure any appointment or office of profit or trust, he shall be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a term not exceeding three years. See 2 Selw. Nisi Prius, 1049.

A law of the Twelve Tables inflicted very severe punishment on those who composed defamatory writings against any person.—Cic. de Re Pub. iv. 10; Arnob. iv. 151. During the later times of the republic the law appears to have been suspended, for Tacitus (Ann. i. 72) says, that previous to the time of Augustus libels had never been legally punished, and that Augustus, provoked by the audacity with which Cassius Severus brought into disrepute the most illustrious persons of the age, ordained, by a lex majestatis, that the authors of libelli famosi should be brought to trial. On this occasion, Augustus, who was informed of the existence of several such works, had a search made at Rome by the Ædiles, and in other places by the local magistrates, and ordered the libels to be burned; some of the authors were subjected to punishment.—Dion. Cass. lvi. 27. A law quoted by Ulpian (Dig. 47, tit. 10, s. 5), ordained that the author of a libellus famosus should be intestabilis; and during the later period of the empire we find that capital punishment was not only inflicted upon the author, but upon those persons in whose possession a libellus famosus was found, or who did not destroy it so soon as it came into their hands.—Cod. ix. tit. 36; Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

In the spiritual court a libel is the declaration or written charges on the plaintiff's behalf, in the civil litigation. It consists of three parts:—(1) The major proposition, which shows a just cause of the petition. (2) The narration, or minor proposition. (3) The conclusion or conclusive petition, which conjoins both propositions.

In the Scotch law it is the source of complaint or ground of the charge, on which either a civil action or criminal prosecution takes place.

Libellant, the suitor plaintiff who files a libel in an ecclesiastical or admiralty case.

Libellee, the suitor defendant against whom a libel has been filed.

Libelli famosi, scurrilous pamphlets or libels.

Libellus conventionis, the statement of a plaintiff's claim in a petition presented to the magistrate, who directed an officer to deliver it to the defendant.—Civ. Law.

Liber assisarum, the book of assizes or pleas of the Crown, being the fifth part of the year-books.

Liber feudorum, a code of the feudal law, compiled by direction of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, and published at Milan, A D. 1170.

Liber homo, a freeman.

Liber judicialis of Alfred, Alfred's dome-book, which see.

Liber niger domûs regis (the black book of the King's household), the title of a book in which there is an account of the household establishment of King Edward IV. and of the several musicians retained in his service, as well for his private amusement as for the service in his chapel.—Encyc. Lond.

Liber taurus, a free bull.—Norf. 16 Edw. I.

Libera, a livery or delivery of so much corn or grass to a customary tenant, who cut down or prepared the said grass or corn, and received some part or small portion of it as a reward or gratuity.—Cowel.

Libera batella, a free boat, a right of fishing.

Libera chasea habenda, a judicial writ granted to a person for a free chase belonging to his manor, after proof made by inquiry of a jury that the same of right belongs to him.

Libera piscaria, a free fishery.

Libera wara, a free measure of ground.

Liberam legem [illegible]ittere, to lose one's free law (called the villainous judgment), to become discredited or disabled as juror and witness, to forfeit goods and chattels and lands for life, to have those lands wasted, houses razed, trees rooted up, and one's body committed to prison. It was anciently pronounced against conspirators, but is now disused, the punishment substituted being fine and imprisonment.—Hawk. P. C. 61, c. lxxii., s. 9; 3 Instit. 221.

Liberata pecunia non liberat offerentem.—Co. Litt. 207.—(Money being restored, does not set free the party offering.)

Liberate, a writ that lay for the payment of a yearly pension or other sum of money, granted under the Great Seal, and addressed to the treasurer and chamberlain of the Exchequer. Also a writ to the sheriff for the delivery of possession of lands and goods extended or taken upon the forfeiture of a recognizance. Also a writ issuing out of Chancery, directed to a gaoler, for delivery of a prisoner that has put in bail for his appearance.—F. N. B. 432.

Liberatio, money, meat, drink, clothes, &c. yearly given and delivered by the lord to his domestic servants.—Blount.

Liberation, payment.—Civ. Law.

Libertas ecclesiastica, church liberty, or ecclesiastical immunity.

Libertas est naturalis facultas ejus quod cuique facere libet, nisi quod de jure aut vi prohibetur.—Co. Litt. 116.—(Liberty is that natural faculty which permits everyone to do anything he pleases except that which is restrained by law or force.)

Libertas est res inestimabilis.—Jenk. Cent. 52.—(Liberty is an inestimable thing.)

Libertate probanda, an ancient writ which lay for such as being demanded for villeins, offered to prove themselves free; addressed to the sheriff that he should take security from them for the proof of their freedom before the justices of assize, and that in the meantime they should be unmolested.—F. N. B. 77.

Libertates regales ad coronam spectantes ex concessione regum à coronâ exierunt.—2 Inst. 496.—(Royal franchises relating to the Crown, have emanated from the Crown by grant of kings.)

Libertatibus allocandis, a writ lying for a citizen or burgess, impleaded contrary to his liberty, to have his privilege allowed.—Reg. Orig. 262.

Libertatibus exigendis in itinere, an ancient writ whereby the king commanded the justices in eyre to admit of an attorney for the defence of another's liberty.—Reg. Orig. 19.

Liberticide, a destroyer of liberty.

Liberties, privileged districts exempt from the sheriff's jurisdiction. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 105, and NON OMITTAS.

Libertinum ingratum leges civiles in pristinum servitutem redigant; sed leges Angliæ semel manumissum semper liberum judicant.—Co. Litt. 137.—(The civil laws reduce an ungrateful freedman to his original slavery, but the laws of England regard a man once manumitted as ever after free.)

Liberty, a franchise, being a royal privilege, or a branch of the Crown's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject, as a liberty to hold pleas in a court of one's own.

Also, generally, a state of freedom, as contradistinguished from slavery, the power to act, no law restraining it, or a right over one's actions, subject, however, to the will of God, i. e. piety and to one's duty towards mankind. It is of various kinds.

(1) Natural liberty—a state of exemption from the control of others, and from positive laws and institutions of social life.

(2) Civil liberty—the security from the arbitrary will of others, which is afforded by the laws.

(3) Political liberty—a more extended civil liberty, being the freedom of a nation or a state from all unjust abridgment of its rights and independence by another nation.

(4) Religious liberty, or liberty of conscience—the free right of adopting and enjoying opinions on religious subjects, and of being allowed to worship the Supreme Being according to the dictates of conscience, unfettered by external control.

(5) Liberty of the press—the free power of publishing everything, subject, however, to punishment for publishing what is mischievous to the public morals, or injurious to individuals.

(6) Liberty of speech—the right of speaking facts and expressing opinions.

Liberty of the rules, a privilege to go out of the Fleet and Marshalea prisons within certain limits and there reside. Abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22.

Liberum tenementum, a frank tenement or freehold.

Liblac [veneficium, Lat.], witchcraft, particularly that kind which consisted in the compounding and administering of drugs and philtres.—Leg. Athel. 6. Wieland, in Oberon, says:—

'Der Ritter steigt herab, und ungesäumt erscheint,
'Ganz in verlupptem Stahl, sein trotzig sicher Freund.'—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Libracum, bewitching any person; also a barbarous sacrifice.—Leg. Athel. 6.

Libra pensa, a pound of money by weight.

It was usual in former days, not only to sell the money, but to weigh it; because many cities, lords, and bishops, having their mints, coined money, and often very bad too, for which reason, though the pound consisted of 20 shillings, they weighed it.—Encyc. Lond.

Librata terræ, a portion of ground containing four oxgangs, and every oxgang fourteen acres.

This is the same with what in Scotland is called pound-land of old extent.

Libripens, a scalesman.—Civ. Law.

License, or Licence [fr. licentia, Lat.], a grant of permission, a power or authority given to another to do some lawful act. It may be either written or verbal; when written, the paper containing the authority is called a license.

A license is necessary before doing many acts, as to found a church, to erect a park, to marry without publication of banns, to a corporation to alien, &c., also to carry on various trades, and to practise any profession.

Licensee, a person to whom a license has been granted.

Licentiate, one who has license to practise any art or faculty.

Licentia concordandi, leave to agree the suit. See FINE.

Licentia loquendi, an imparlance.

Licentia surgendi, license to arise, which was a liberty or space of time anciently given by the court to a tenant to arise out of his bed, who was essoined de malo lecti in a real action; and it was also the writ thereupon.—Fleta, l. 6, c. x.

Licentia transfretandi, a writ or warrant directed to the keeper of the port of Dover, or other seaport, commanding him to let such persons pass over sea who have obtained the royal license thereunto.—Reg. Orig. 193.

Licet [Lat.], it is lawfu'.

Licet dispositio de interesse futuro sit inutilis, tamen potest fieri declaratio præcedens quæ sortiatur effectum, interveniente novo actu. Bacon.—(Although a disposition of a future interest is void, yet a precedent declaration can be made, which, a new act intervening, may have an effect.)

Licet sæpius requisitus [Lat.] (although often requested).

Licita bene miscentur, formula nisi juris obstet.—Bacon.—(Things permitted are properly joined, unless the form of law oppose.)

Licitation [fr. liceo, Lat., to set a price for sale]. The act of exposing to sale to the highest bidder.—Encyc. Lond.

Licking of thumbs, a form by which bargains were completed. Obsolete.

Lidford law, a sort of Lynch law, whereby a person was first punished and then tried.

Liege [fr. lige, Fr.; ligio, Ital.], bound by some feudal tenure; subject.

Liege homage, an acknowledgment which included fealty and the services consequent upon it.—2 Step. Com. 414.

Liege-lord, sovereign; superior lord.

Liegeman, a subject.

Liege poustie, a state of health which gives a person lawful power of disposition by will.

Lieger, or Leger, a resident ambassador.

Lieges, or Liege people. See LIEGE.

Lien [answering to the tacita hypotheca of the Civil Law], a right in one man to retain that which is in his possession belonging to another, until certain demands of the person in possession are satisfied. It is neither a jus in re, nor a jus ad rem, i. e. it is not a right of property in the thing itself, or a right of action to the thing itself.

It is either particular, as a right to retain a thing for some charge or claim growing out of, or connected with, the identical thing, or general, as a right to retain a thing not only for such charges and claims; but also for a general balance of accounts between the parties, in respect to other dealings of the like nature.

Particular liens may arise in various ways: (1), by an express contract; (2), by an implied contract, resulting from the usage of trade, or the manner of dealing between parties; (3), by mere operation of law, from the relation and acts of the parties, independently of any contract. General liens, not being favored in law, must be maintained upon one of the two first grounds.

The civil law derived its own liens, whether they were pledges or hypothecations, or simple privileges, from similar sources.

The following is an analysis of the mode in which the law on this subject has been treated.

(1) As to the manner and circumstances under which a lien may be acquired.

To create a valid lien, it is essential that the person through whom or by whom it is acquired should himself either have the absolute ownership of the property, or at least a right to vest it; for nemo plus juris ad alium transferre potest, quam ipse haberet. There must also be an actual or constructive possession by the party asserting it, with the express or implied assent of the party against whom it is asserted. It must not be inconsistent with the express terms, or the clear intent, of the contract.

(2) The proper debts or claims to which a lien properly attaches.

It attaches only to certain and liquidated demands, and not to those which sound only in damages, and can be ascertained only through the intervention of a jury, unless, indeed, a special contract exists. The debt or demand for which the lien is asserted, must be due to the person claiming it in his own right, and not merely as the agent of a third person. It must also, in the absence of a special agreement, be a debt or demand due from the person for whose benefit the party is acting, and not from a third person, although the goods may be claimed through him.

(3) How a lien may be waived or lost.

It may be waived by any act or agreement between the parties, by which it is surrendered, or becomes inapplicable. A voluntary parting with the possession of the goods, will amount to a waiver or a surrender of a lien; for as it is a right founded upon possession, it must ordinarily determine when the possession ceases. There are exceptions in favor of trade, as that of a factor.—Cowp. R. 251. But the lien may revive and re-attach, upon the property coming again into the possession of the person entitled to the lien, if it so come as the property of the same owner against whom his right exists, and no new intermediate equities have affected that right.

(4) In what manner a lien may be enforced.

There is, it seems, but a mere right of retainer, which may be used as a defence to an action for the recovery of the property, or as a matter of title or special property, to reclaim the property by action, if he have been unlawfully dispossessed of it. Sometimes a court of equity decrees a sale as a part of its own system of remedial justice; and courts of admiralty are constantly in the habit of decreeing a sale to satisfy maritime liens, such as bottomry-bonds, seamen's wages, repairs of foreign ships, salvage, and other claims of a kindred nature. The owner has a perfect right to dispose of the property, subject to the lien, and the person to whom he conveys it will have a perfect title to it, upon discharging the lien. Consult Paley on Agency; 2 Selw. Nisi Prius, 1361; and Smith's Merc. Law.

Equity follows the law, when a claim depending on the right of lien incidentally presents itself for decision. There are, however, liens which, existing only in the contemplation of a court of equity, are therefore exclusively within its cognizance. Thus if an estate be mortgaged, and the mortgagor has sold successively various portions of the estate to different purchasers, one of whom has paid the mortgage-debt, he will have a right to compel the other purchasers to contribute. So a joint purchaser has a lien upon the estate purchased for repairs which he may have done. Where one of two joint tenants of a lease renews for the benefit of both, he will have a lien on the moiety of the other joint tenant for a half of the fines and expenses. Again, if a person, entitled to an estate, stand by without interference, whilst another innocently builds or makes improvements on the land, thinking that he has a title to it, the person making such improvements will be entitled to a compensation. A trustee is entitled to a lien upon the trust estate for his expenses so long as it remains trust estate, but an agent or other person employed by him has not.—See 2 Sp. Eq. Juris. 766–804, and the cases there cited.

The doctrine of a vendor's equitable lien for unpaid purchase-money is thus stated by Lord Eldon (Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329 (1808), and 1 White and Tudor's Lead. Cas. 194—222 and the notes):—Where the vendor conveys, without more, though the consideration is upon the face of the instrument expressed to be paid, and by a receipt endorsed upon the back, if it is the simple case of a conveyance, the money, or part of it, not being paid as between the vendor and the vendee, and persons claiming as volunteers upon the doctrine of this court, which, when it is settled, has the effect of a contract, though perhaps no actual contract has taken place, a lien shall prevail; in the one case, for the whole consideration; in the other, for that part of the money which was not paid. And this lien attaches if possession of the estate have been delivered to the purchaser, although there has been no conveyance of it to him. Should the vendor take from the purchaser a security for the unpaid purchase-money, the question arises whether the lien was intended to be reserved, or whether credit was exclusively given to the person from whom the security was taken. A mere personal security for the purchase-money, as a bond, a bill of exchange, or a promissory note, will not, without more, be sufficient evidence of the intention of the vendor to give credit exclusively to the purchaser, or to his security, so as to take away the lien.

Where an estate is conveyed, in consideration of an annuity, the vendor will have a lien upon the land for the annuity, although a bond or covenant is given to secure the payment of the annuity. An actual agreement, though by parol, to accept a security, and rely upon it alone, will, it seems, discharge the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money. And if a vendor take a totally distinct and independent security for the unpaid purchase-money, it will then become a case of substitution for the lien, instead of a credit given.

If the purchase-money, or part of it, have been paid, prematurely, before a conveyance, the vendee will have a lien upon the estate in the hands of the vendor, even, it seems, although he may have taken a security for his money.

In the Scottish law, the doctrine of lien is known by the name of retention, and that of set-off by the name of compensation.

Lien of a Covenant. The commencement of a covenant stating the names of the covenantors and covenantees, and the character of the covenant, whether joint or several.

Lieu [Fr.], place, room; it is only used with in; in lieu, instead of.—Encyc. Lond.

Lieu conus, a castle, manor, or other notorious place, well known, and generally taken notice of by those who dwell about it.—2 Lil. Abr. 641.

Lieutenancy, commission of. See COMMISSION OF ARRAY.

Lieutenant [fr. lieu, Fr., a place, and tenant, holding], a deputy; locum tenens; one who acts by vicarious authority.

Life [fr. lifian, Sax., to live], the animated state of living creatures, or the space of time that passes between their birth and their death.

Life-annuity, an annual payment during the continuance of any given life or lives. See ANNUITY.

Life-assurance, a transaction whereby a sum of money is secured to be paid upon the death of the person whose life is assured, or upon the failure of one out of two or more joint-lives. See INSURANCE.

Life-estate, a freehold not of inheritance. It is either—

(1) Conventional, or expressly created by the act of the parties, which is either—
  (α) For one's own life, or
  (β) The life of another, pur auter vie, or

(2) Legal, which is either—
  (α) Tenancy-in-tail after possibility of issue extinct.
  (β) Courtesy of England.
  (γ) Dower.—2 Bl. Com. c. viii.

Life-land, or Life-hold, land held on a lease for lives.

Life-peerage. Letters patent, conferring the dignity of baron for life only, do not enable the grantee to sit and vote in the House of Lords, not even with the usual writ of summons to the house.—Resolution of the Committee for Privileges, 22nd February, 1856.

Life-rent, a rent paid for a term of life.

Ligan [fr. lier, Fr., to tie], a wreck consisting of goods sunk in the sea, but tied to a cork or buoy, in order that they may be found again.—5 Rep. 106.

Ligeance, the true and faithful obedience of a subject to his sovereign; also the dominion and territory of a liege lord.

Ligeantia est quasi legis essentia; est vinculum fidei.—Co. Litt. 129.—(Allegiance is, as it were, the essence of law; it is the chain of faith.)

Ligeantia naturalis nullis claustris coercetur, nullis metis refrænatur, nullis finibus premitur. 7 Co. 10.—(Natural allegiance is restrained by no barriers, reined by no bounds, compressed by no limits.)

Ligeas, a liege.—Old Records.

Light, a right to have the access of the sun's rays to one's windows free from any obstruction. An uninterrupted enjoyment of light for twenty years constitutes, in every case, an absolute and indefeasible right to it, unless it shall appear that the enjoyment took place under some deed or written consent or agreement.—2 Wm. IV. c. 71. See Gale on Easements by Willes.

Light-house, a high building, at the top of which lights are hung to guide ships at sea. The power of erecting and maintaining them is a branch of the royal prerogative. The management of light-houses is now regulated by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, Part VI. ss. 339-416, and subject to the rights of persons having authority over local light-houses, is vested in the following bodies:—

(1) As to light-houses in England, Wales, Jersey, Guernsey, Sark and Alderney, and the adjacent seas and islands, and in Heligoland and Gibraltar, in the Trinity House.

(2) In Scotland and the adjacent seas and islands, and in the Isle of Man, in the Commissioners of Northern Light-houses.

(3) In Ireland and the adjacent seas and islands, in the Dublin Corporation.

The Statute also provides for the levy of light dues; the construction and dues of new light-houses, the surrender of local light-houses, damage to lights, &c., and the prevention of false lights. See also 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 43, et seq. By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, several statutes relating to light-houses are repealed. As to colonial light-houses, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91.

Lighting and Watching Acts, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 90; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76; 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. cc. 78 & 81; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69; 2 Step. Com. 679.

Ligius, a person bound to another by a solemn tie or engagement; now used to express the relation of a subject to his sovereign.

Lignagium, a right of cutting fuel in woods; also a tribute or payment due for the same.

Lignamina, timber fit for building.

Ligula, a copy or transcript of a court-roll or deed.

Liguritor, a flatterer; perhaps a glutton.—Somner.

Limitation, restriction or circumspection; settling an estate or property; a certain time allowed by a statute for litigation.

It is essential, before commencing litigation, to be satisfied whether the remedy about to be taken has or has not become barred by any Statute of Limitation or by legal presumption.

Statutes of Limitation have been correctly denominated Statutes of repose, and being all in pari materiâ, and passed with the same object, they should be liberally and beneficially expounded in furtherance of that object.—White v. Parnther, Knapp's Rep. 226.

The principal reasons for the introduction of these statutes have been: first, as regards real property, after upwards of forty years adverse possession, or even a shorter time, a person should, upon every principle of justice, except in the case of fraud, be quieted and rendered secure in his possession; for, although his right, if tried within a reasonable time after his obtaining possession, might have been proved by documents and evidence, such evidence, after so great a lapse of time, may have become altogether lost; besides, a new succession of persons may have become the occupiers, by descent, or devise, or by alienation, and it would be unjust to require them to prove their title, impeached by a claimant who has slept so long on his legal rights, and who would sustain no just disappointment by being deprived of the means of pursuing so stale a demand; second, as regards claims of a personal nature, as for supposed debts or damages, the lapse of six years induces a presumption (upon which 21 Jac. I. c. 16, was founded) that the claim has been satisfied, and that the receipt or evidence, showing its satisfaction, has been lost; or that the claim has been too weak to prosecute, or perhaps not worth it; third, as to assaults and batteries, and verbal slander, proof of which usually depends upon doubtful and conflicting parol evidence, injured parties slumbering upon such wrongs for years, cannot be favored objects of the courts, since length of time tends to obliterate the injurious effects arising from such evanescent causes; and fourth, as to justices, public officers, and individuals acting under particular powers, inasmuch as their duties are arduous and sometimes perilous, and the construction of the statutes under which they act is frequently exceedingly nice and difficult, they should be especially protected from actions frequently arising from errors in judgment being long kept hanging over their heads, until, perhaps, all evidence in support of their defence may have been lost. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, s. 5, enacts, that in all actions brought for anything done in pursuance of any local or personal act, the period for bringing such action shall be limited to two years, or in case of continuing damage, to one year after such damage shall have ceased. It repeals all enactments to the contrary. And the 4th section provides that in all cases where a notice of action is required, it shall be given one calendar month before action.

If the statute once begin to run, it continues; and, if the cause of action were complete in a testator's lifetime, then the statute begins and continues from that time, and not from his death or the time of obtaining the probate.—Hickman v. Walker, Willes, 27.

It seems that the day on which the cause of action accrued ought in general to be excluded in calculating the times of limitation under these statutes (Higgins v. McAdam, 3 Young and J. 1 & 16: 1 Mon. and R. 300, note b). And as to the expiration (the statutes requiring the action to be brought within the limited time), the writ, or process, at least should be issued upon the last day of the time limited, exclusive of the day on which the cause of action accrued.

There is no cause of action till the claimant can legally sue, and till there be some person in existence who can assert it, and also a person to be sued; and therefore, where the payee of a bill, at the time it fell due, was dead, it was held that the statute did not begin to run until letters of administration to his estate had been obtained (Douglas v. Forrest, 4 Bing. 686); but as regards chattels real, process for their recovery must be commenced within the limited time, without regard to the date of the letters of administration; and in cases of the reversal of judgment or outlawry in any personal action, the plaintiff, or his heirs, executors, or administrators, may commence de novo within a year afterwards, but not after; and also as to actions against persons beyond sea, they may be brought at any time within six years after their return.

No verbal acknowledgment of a debt (excepting it has been so substantial an admission as a part payment) is sufficient to prevent the operation of the statutes (Benest v. Pipon, Knapp's Rep. 60). By 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, s. 1, in actions of debt, or on the case grounded upon any simple contract, no acknowledgment or promise by words only shall be deemed sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract whereby to take any case out of the operation of 21 Jac. I. c. 16, unless such acknowledgment or promise be contained in some writing, to be signed by the party to be chargeable thereby; or by his agent duly authorized (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 13); and where there are two or more joint-contractors, no such joint-contractor shall be chargeable, in respect only of the written acknowledgment of the other. By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 14, where there are two or more co-contractors, or co-debtors, none of them shall lose the benefit of the limitation, by reason only of payment of any principal or interest by any of the others.

Persons, who at the time their right first accrues, are under the disability of infancy, coverture, idiotcy, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or absence beyond seas, are allowed ten years from the termination of their disability, and their representatives the same time from their death.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 16, relating to real property.

Formerly, in certain cases when a person, or one or more of several persons, at the time a cause of action or suit accrued to him or them, was or were absent beyond seas, or imprisoned, the period of limitation did not begin to run until the imprisonment or absence beyond seas had determined; but 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 10, enacts that in cases in which the limitation is fixed by 21 Jac. I. c. 16, s. 3; 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 17; 53 Geo, III. c, 127, s. 5; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, ss. 40, 41, 42, and c. 42, s. 3; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 113, s. 20, no person shall be entitled to any time within which to commence such action or suit beyond the period fixed by reason of such person, or one or more of such persons, being at the time such cause of action or suit accrued beyond the seas or imprisoned.

As to the determination of infancy. A person becomes of age on the 1st instant of the last day of the 21st year, next before the anniversary of his birth; thus if a person be born at any hour of the 1st of January, 1801, he would be of full age at the 1st instant of the 31st December, 1821.

No part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, nor the Islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, nor any islands adjacent to any of them, being part of the dominions of her Majesty, shall be deemed to be beyond seas, within the meaning of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, or of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 12.

As to real property, there are four general rules when the possession is not adverse, viz. :— 1st, when both parties claim under the same title; 2ndly, when the possession of the one is consistent with the title of the other; 3rdly, when the claimant or his successor has never, in contemplation of law, been out of possession; and, 4thly, when the occupier has acknowledged the plaintiff's title.

An action of trover must be brought within six years after a secret conversion, although unknown to the owner of the goods.—Granger v. George, 5 Bar. and Cres. 149; 7 Dowl. and Ry. 729, S. C.

It would not excuse an attorney for not suing within six years, to show that he had not delivered his bill till within that time, although he is prohibited from suing until a calendar month after such delivery; and his cause of action, with respect to his bill, begins from the completion of the business.—Harris v. Osbourn, 2 Cr. and M. 629; 4 Tyr. 445.

The statute must in general be pleaded; but under circumstances, the jury may, after twenty years, presume payment under the general issue.

In courts of equity, the general rule is, that, although the statute 21 Jac. I. c. 16, s. 3, and other acts, do not mention bills or suits in equity, yet, that courts of equity, in giving effect to equitable claims, and affording equitable relief, will observe the principles of these enactments, in all cases where the legal and equitable titles to demands, noticed in the acts, correspond and differ only in the court where the right happens to be enforced (Stackhouse v. Burnston, 10 Ves. 66, 67). But the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 37, expressly enacts, that no suit in equity shall be brought after the time in which the plaintiff, if entitled at law, might have brought an action (s. 24). Section 25 provides, that where land or rent shall be vested in a trustee, upon an express trust, the right of the cestui que trust, or person claiming through him, shall not be deemed to have accrued, until after a conveyance to a purchaser for a valuable consideration. Section 26 provides, that, in cases of concealed fraud, no time shall run until the fraud shall have been, or with reasonable diligence might have been, first discovered; provided that no owner shall sue in equity on account of fraud, or set aside a bonâ fide conveyance to a purchaser for valuable consideration. Section 29 continues the jurisdiction of equity, in refusing relief on the ground of acquiescence, or otherwise.

If there be a general devise for the payment of debts, it will be no recognition or revival of debts, already barred by the statute, before the death of the testator, although it was formerly held otherwise (Stratford v. Blakesley, 6 Bro. P. C. 630); but such a devise stops the operation of the statute, as to all debts not so previously barred.—Rendell v. Carpenter, 2 Young and P. 484.

No advantage can be taken of the statutes of limitation in equity, unless they be pleaded or insisted upon by a plea or answer.

The following is an alphabetical arrangement of the periods fixed by the principal Statutes of Limitation :—

PROCEEDING	PERIOD	STATUTE

By the 11th sect. of the C. L. P. Act, 1852, writs of summons are to remain in force for six calendar months, but may be renewed in the mode pointed out by that act. And a writ of summons so renewed shall remain in force and be available to prevent the operation of any statute whereby the time for the commencement of the action may be limited, and for all other purposes, from the date of the issuing of the original writ of summons.

Limitation of Estate, a modification or settlement of an estate determining how long it shall continue, or a qualification of a preceding estate.—1 Inst. 271.

Limitation, Words of, those which operate by reference to, or in connexion with, other words, and extend or modify an estate given by such other words, as 'heirs,' 'heirs of the body.'

Limited Administration, a special and temporary administration of certain specific effects of a testator or intestate granted under varying circumstances. See 1 Wms. Exs. 419, 447.

Limited Executor, an executor whose appointment is qualified by limitations as to the time or place wherein, or the subject matter whereon, the office is to be exercised; as distinguished from one whose appointment is absolute, i. e., certain and immediate, without any restriction in regard to the testator's effects or limitation in point of time.—1 Wms. Exs. 217.

Limited Liability. Seven or more persons, associated for any lawful purpose may, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of 'The Companies' Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, in respect of registration, &c., form themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability. Joint-stock companies with limited liability are of two kinds: (1) Limited by shares, where the company is formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares (s. 8). (2) Limited by guarantee, where it is formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to such amount as they shall respectively undertake to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of it being wound up (s. 9). Every limited banking or insurance company and deposit, provident, or benefit society, before it commences business, and on the first Monday in February and in August, in every year during which it carries on business, is required to state in a certain form the capital of the company and the number of the shares into which it is divided, and the number issued, the calls made and received, and the liabilities of the company on the preceding 1st of January and July, and the assets of the company on such day. A copy of this statement is to be put up in a conspicuous place in the registered office of the company and in every branch office, &c. (s. 44). No banking company claiming to issue notes in the United Kingdom shall be entitled to limited liability in respect of such issue, but shall be subject to unlimited liability in respect thereof (s. 182). For remarks on this principle see 2 Mill's Polit. Econ. 485, et seq., and see COMMANDITE and JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.

Lindesfern, or Lindesfarne, Holy Island, in Northumberland, which was formerly a bishop's see.—4 Inst. 288.

Line, succession of relations; boundary; the twelfth part of an inch.

Linea recta semper præfertur transversali.—Co. Litt. 10.—(The right line is always preferred to the collateral.)

It is a rule of descent that the lineal ancestors, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor, that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living. See CANONS OF INHERITANCE.

Linea recta est index sui et obliqui; lex est linea recti.—Co. Litt. 158.—(A right line is an index of itself, and of an oblique; law is a line of right.)

Lineage [fr. lignage, Fr.], race, progeny, family, ascending or descending.

Lineal Consanguinity, that relationship which subsists between persons descended in a right line, as grandfather, father, son, grandson.

Lineal Descent, the descent of an estate from ancestor to heir in a right line.

Lineal Warranty, where the heir derived, or might by possibility have derived, his title to the land warranted, either from or through the ancestor who made the warranty; as where a father or an elder son in the life of the father released to the disseisor of themselves or of the grandfather, with warranty, this was lineal to the younger son.—Litt. s. 703. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 14.

Liquidated Damages, a certain, fixed, and ascertained sum, in contradistinction to a penalty, which is both uncertain and unascertained.

It must be remarked, that calling a sum liquidated damages will not change its character as a penalty, if upon the true construction of the instrument it must be deemed to be a penalty. Indeed, wherever the payment of a small sum is secured by the payment of a much larger sum, it must be considered as a penalty, and this especially where the sum referred to is penal in its nature. But where it is agreed that if a person do, or neglect to do, a particular thing in respect to which the damages are uncertain, a certain sum shall be paid by him, there the sum stated may be treated as liquidated damages, if the terms of the contract do not evince a different intention. See 2 Step. Com. 110.

Lis [Lat.], a suit, action, controversy, or dispute.

Lis mota (the dispute having arisen). It is a rule of evidence that declarations of deceased members of a family, in matters of pedigree, are inadmissible, if made after a controversy has arisen as to the facts on which the claim is founded (or as it is called post litem motam), which for that purpose is to be deemed the commencement of the lis mota.—6 C. & P. 560; Taylor on Evidence 520; Shedden v. the Attorney-General, 30 L. J. (P. M. & A.) 232.

Lis pendens (a pending suit).

The actual pendency of a suit in equity was regarded as notice of the suit to all the world, though after a complete decision the public attention may be supposed to be drawn off to other matters, and therefore a person was allowed to be ignorant of a final decree of the court made in a cause in which he was not concerned.

But now, by 2 Vict. c. 11, s. 7, it is enacted, that no lis pendens shall bind a purchaser or mortgagee without express notice thereof, unless and until a memorandum or minute, containing the name of the usual or last known place of abode, and the title, trade, or profession of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, and the Court of Equity, and the title of the cause or information, and the day when the bill or information was filed, shall be left with the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas, who shall forthwith enter the same particulars in a book, in alphabetical order, by the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected by such lis pendens; and such officer shall be entitled for any such entry to the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.*, and the provisions contained in the act in regard to the re-entering of judgments every five years, and the fee payable to the officer thereon, shall extend to every case of lis pendens which shall be registered under the provisions of the act. See 18 Vict. c. 15. A special case in Chancery is a lis pendens, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, s. 17.

List [fr. liste, Fr.], a roll; a catalogue. See CIVIL LIST.

Lit de Justice. See BED OF JUSTICE.

Literæ patentes regis non erunt vacuæ.—1 Buls. 6.—(The King's letters-patent shall not be void.)

Literal Contract, a written agreement subscribed by the contracting parties.—Civ. Law.

Literary Property. See COPYRIGHT.

Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, (1854), 17 & 18 Vict. c. 112, which affords greater facilities for procuring and settling sites and buildings in trust for institutions established for the promotion of literature, science, or the fine arts, or for the diffusion of useful knowledge, and makes provisions for improving the legal conditions of such institutions. As to their exemption from poor-rates, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36.

Literatura, putting children to school.

This liberty was anciently denied to those parents who were servile tenants, without the lord's consent; the prohibition against the education of sons arose from the fear that the son, being bred to letters, might enter into holy orders, and so stop or divert the services which he might otherwise do as heir to his father.

Litigant, one engaged in a law-suit.

Litigation, judicial contest; law-suit.

Litigiosity, the pendency of a suit.—Scotch term.

Litigious Church, where two presentations to a church are offered to the bishop upon the same avoidance.

Litis æstimatio, the measure of damages.

Litis contestatio, the issue of an action; also a submission to the decision of a judex.—Civ. Law.

Litis nomen omnem actionem significat, sive in rem, sive in personam sit.—Co. Litt. 292.—(A law-suit signifies every action, whether it be for the thing, or against the person.)

Litispendence [fr. lis, Lat., strife, and pendeo, to hang], the time during which a law-suit is going on. Obsolete.

Little Goes, a species of lottery, declared unlawful.—42 Geo. III. c. 119.

Littleton. A judge of the Common Pleas in the reign of Edward IV., who composed a book of tenures for the use of his son, to whom it is addressed. It contains three books; the first upon estates, the second upon tenures and services, which two were designed to explain more at large the principal subject of the old book of tenures; the third discourses of several incidents and consequences of tenures and estates. This little treatise has acquired more notice than any other book in the law, which is to be attributed, partly to the nature of the subject, partly to the manner in which it is treated, and partly to the great character of the writer when a judge.

If we inquire what is the excellence which has entitled the writer to so high a character, it will be found to be of a particular kind. It is not an accurate arrangement of his subject, not a remarkably apt division of his matter, not a strict adherence even to his own plan, by preserving a close connection between the matter and title of a chapter, in all which he is sometimes more defective than writers of inferior note. The excellence of Littleton seems to consist in the great depth of his learning, and simplicity of his manner, in a comprehensive way of thinking, and a happy method of explaining, with a certain plainness yet significance of style that is always clear and expressive.

The undiminished reputation which this author still possesses is owing principally to the choice of his subject. The law of tenures and estates, as understood in the time of Littleton, is at this day the best introduction to the knowledge of real property; and though great part of this volume is not now law, yet so intimately was the whole of that system connected, that what remains of tenures cannot be understood without a knowledge of what is abolished, and, therefore, the parts of Littleton which are now obsolete are studied both with profit and pleasure. Perhaps no book, in any science so confined as the municipal laws of any country must be, has more employed the labors of the learned and industrious. A writer, who was himself one of the greatest ornaments of the law, and whose name never appears greater than when accompanied with that of our author (Sir Edward Coke), furnished the world with a very copious and minute commentary on this book, in which he has carried his attention to the import of every word so far as to make interesting remarks on his very et cæteras. The fame of Littleton has not been confined to this island. As the Norman lawyers made Glanville a model upon which to form their coustumier, and give system to their jurisprudence, a writer of that country (M. Howard) has composed a comment on Littleton, as the best help towards illustrating the customs and laws of that duchy.—4 Reeves, c. xxv., p. 113.

Liturgy [fr. λειτουργία, Gk., a public service], the Book of Common Prayer used in the Established Church, as confirmed by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4.

It would be disingenuous not to acknowledge that the chief part of this Liturgy was in use in the Roman Catholic Church, from which the Church of England is reformed; but it would betray a want of acquaintance with ecclesiastical antiquity to suppose that these prayers and services originated in that church, as several of them were in use in the first ages of Christianity, and before the Roman Catholic Church was known.—Clarke's Bible, p. xxv.; Cookson's Com. Prayer.

Livelode, maintenance, support.

Livery [fr. livrer, Fr.], the act of giving or taking possession; release from wardship; also the writ by which possession was obtained. A particular dress. Anciently provisions. In London, the collective body of liverymen. Also, the privilege of a particular company or society. See SEISIN and OUSTERLEMAIN.

Livery-man, an inferior servant; also a member of some company in the City of London, also called a freeman.

Livey-office, an office appointed for the delivery of lands.

Livings in commendam. See COMMENDA.

Loadmanage, the pay to loadsmen who tow ships and vessels.—Mar. Law.

Loan [hlæn, Sax.], anything lent or given to another on condition of return or repayment. A sum of money confided to another, generally on the security of a promissory note or bond, the guarantee of a third party, or the possession or assignment of property.

If it be effected by the Government, it is a public loan. The practice of borrowing money to defray extraordinary expenses in time of war has given rise to our national debt.

Loan, gratuitous, or Commodate, a class of bailment which is called commodatum in the Roman law, and is denominated by Sir William Jones a loan for use (prêt à usage), to distinguish it from mutuum, a loan for consumption. It is the gratuitous lending of an article to the borrower for his own use.

Several things are essential to constitute this contract. (1) There must be a loan of either goods or chattels, in contradistinction to a sale or a deposit of a thing with another for the sole benefit or purposes of the owner. (2) It must be lent gratuitously. (3) It must be lent for the use of the borrower, which must be the principal object, and not merely accessorial. (4) The property must be lent to be specifically returned by the lender at the determination of the bailment; and in this respect it differs from a mutuum, or loan for consumption, where the thing borrowed, such as corn, wine, oil, or money, is to be returned in kind.

The borrower has the right to use the thing during the time and for the purpose agreed upon by the parties. The loan is to be considered as strictly personal, unless from other circumstances a different intention may fairly be presumed. The borrower must take proper care of the thing borrowed, use it according to the lender's intention, restore it at the proper time, and in a proper condition.

The lender must suffer the borrower to use and enjoy the thing loaned during the time of the loan, according to the original intention, without any molestation or impediment, under the peril of damages. He must reimburse the borrower the extraordinary expenses to which he has been put for the preservation of the thing lent. He is bound to give notice to the borrower of the defects of the thing lent; and if he do not, but conceal them, and an injury occurs to the borrower thereby, the lender is responsible. Where the thing has been lost by the borrower, and, after he has paid the value thereof, is restored to the lender, the latter must return either the price paid or the thing; for, by such payment of the loss, the property is effectively transferred to the borrower.

Mr. Justice Story thus concludes his observations on gratuitous loans—a subject of daily occurrence in the actual business of human life:—'It has, however,' says he, 'furnished very little occasion for the interposition of judicial tribunals, for reasons equally honorable to the parties and to the liberal spirit of polished society. The generous confidence thus bestowed is rarely abused; and if a loss or injury unintentionally occurs, an indemnity is either promptly offered by the borrower, or compensation is promptly waived by the lender.'—Story's Bailments, c. iv.

Loan Societies, institutions established for the purpose of advancing money on loan to the industrious classes, and receiving back payment for the same by instalments, with interest.

By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110 (continued by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 19, and made perpetual by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 56), forms of proceeding of a similar nature to those prescribed in the acts regulating savings banks and friendly societies are requisite to enable loan societies to avail themselves of this act. Three copies of the rules must be transmitted to the certifying barrister, one of which he is directed to keep, another to return to the society, and the third to forward to the clerk of the peace for the county, city, or borough in which the society is formed, in order that it may be laid by him before the general quarter sessions for the confirmation and allowance of that court. The legislature also directs the rules of the society to be inserted in a book, which is to be open at seasonable times for the inspection of the members; and it enacts that they shall be binding on all persons obtaining loans, or their representatives. The property of the society is vested in one or more trustees for its use, who are empowered to maintain or defend actions and other proceedings in their own names, on account of the body at large; and the treasurer and other persons entrusted with the pecuniary affairs of the society must give to the trustees security for the faithful discharge of their duties.

These societies are entitled to issue debentures for money deposited with them (otherwise than by way of gift), and these, as well as all other notes and instruments given in pursuance of the act, are exempted from stamp duty. They are also placed on the same footing with savings banks, in the event of the death of a claimant intestate, who is entitled to less than 50*l.*, the production of a will or letters of administration not being requisite.

The amount of loan which it is lawful for these societies to advance is limited to 15*l.*; and no second loan can be granted until the first is repaid. The society is permitted to receive, by way of discount, at the time of the loan, such interest as shall be specified by its enrolled rules, not exceeding 12*l.* per cent. per annum, and to receive the principal by instalments, at such times and in such proportions as its rules specify, but so that the first repayment shall not be sooner than the eleventh day from the time of the advance.

With respect to the recovery of loans, the act has provided a form of note to be signed by the borrower and two sureties; and upon failure in payment, the person liable may be summoned before any one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, who is empowered to levy what is due by distress and sale of the goods of the defaulter. The society (in the person of its treasurer) may also proceed against the person liable, in any county court or court of requests having jurisdiction, and where the sum due happens to exceed the amount for which the court has jurisdiction may, nevertheless, recover such part of the debt as that court can give judgment for, if willing to accept it in lieu of the whole.

An abstract of the accounts of the society is to be made out yearly up to the 31st December, and sent during the month of January to the certifying barrister, and by him laid before both Houses of Parliament.

Local [fr. locus, Lat.], having the properties of place. Something fixed to the freehold.

Local actions, those referring to some particular locality, as actions for trespasses on land, in which the venue must be laid in the county where the cause of action arose.

Real actions and the mixed action of ejectment are local; but personal actions are for the most part transitory, i. e. their cause of action may be supposed to take place anywhere, but when they are brought for anything in relation to realty, they are then local. See 3 Step. Com. 479; Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Smith, L. C.; and 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1339.

Local allegiance, such as is due from an alien or stranger born, so long as he continues within the sovereign's dominions and protection; it ceases the instant such stranger transfers himself from this kingdom to another. But, if an alien, seeking the protection of the Crown, and having a family and effects here, should, during a war with his native country, go thither, and there adhere to our enemies for purposes of hostility, he may be dealt with as a traitor.—Fost. 185.

Local Courts, tribunals of a limited and special jurisdiction, as the several county courts throughout the country.

Local Government of Towns Acts, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 64. See 22 Vict. c. 31; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 11; 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 44, 64, and 118; 25 Vict. c. 25; and 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 17 & 70.

Local Improvements. For effecting those which tend to the wealth and comfort of the people, see 23 & 24 Vict. s. 30.

Local Taxes, those assessments which are limited to certain districts, as poor-rates, parochial-taxes, county-rates, &c.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 33.

Locatarius, a depositee.—Civ. Law.

Locatio, hire, a letting-out.

Locatio-conductio, or Hiring, a bailment for a reward or compensation. See HIRING.

Locatio custodiæ, the receiving of goods on deposit for reward.—Civ. Law.

Locatio mercium vehendarum, a contract for the carriage of goods for hire.—Ibid.

Locatio operis, the hiring of labor and services.—Ibid.

Locatio operis faciendi, the hiring of labor and services.—Ibid.

Locatio rei, the hiring of a thing.—Ibid.

Location, a contract for the temporary use of a subject, or the service of a person, for an ascertained hire.—Scotch term.

Locator, a letter of a thing, or services, for hire.—Civ. Law.

Lock-up Houses, places for the temporary confinement of prisoners.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 109; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 101; and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 20.

Locker-up, a gaoler, an under-turnkey.

Lockman, an officer in the Isle of Man, to execute the orders of the governor, much like our under-sheriff.

Lococession, the act of giving place.

Locomotives. 'Act for regulating the use of locomotives on turnpike and other roads, and the tolls to be levied on them, and on waggons and carriages drawn by them.'—24 & 25 Vict. c. 70.

Loculus, a coffin.—Old Records.

Locum tenens [Lat.], a deputy.

Locus in quo (the place in which).—1 Salk. 24.

Locus partitus, a division made between two towns or counties, to make trial where the land or place in question lies.—Fleta, l. 4, c. xv.

Locus pœnitentiæ (a place of repentance), a power of drawing back from a bargain before any act has been done to confirm it in law.

Locus pro solutione reditûs aut pecuniæ secundum conditionem dimissionis aut obligationis est strictè observandus.—4 Co. 73.—(The place for the payment of rent or money, according to the condition of a lease or bond, is to be strictly observed.)

Locus sigilli [Lat.], abbrev. L. S., the place of the seal.

Lode-manage, or Lode-merege, the hire of a pilot for conducting a vessel from one place to another.—Cowel. See LOADMANAGE.

Lodgings, part of a house taken on lease.

Lodgings may be let in the same manner as lands and tenements; in general, however, they are let either by agreement in writing between the landlord and tenant, or by parol agreement. In all cases, there should certainly be a written agreement, in order to avoid all possibility of dispute as to the terms of the demise. The agreement should particularly specify the amount of rent, the time of entry, the length of notice to quit required, and such other particulars as the special circumstances of the case may require. If the lodgings be furnished, it will be proper to have a schedule of the goods they contain affixed to the agreement, in the same manner as in the case of a lease of a furnished house.

In taking lodgings, particularly those which are unfurnished, especial care should be taken that the rent of the house has been paid up and will probably continue to be paid; for, if not, the furniture and goods of the lodger will be liable to a distress for such rent. Previously to taking the lodgings, inquiries should therefore be made on the subject of the housekeeper's landlord, and also of the tax-gatherer and collector of the parochial rates; for if distresses be levied for them also, it may cause considerable inconvenience and annoyance to the lodger. Where fixtures are taken from an outgoing tenant, it should also be ascertained that the tenant does not pay for what in fact belongs to the premises, and which the tenant leaving has no right to sell.

Lodgings constitute such an interest according to the duration of the term, that for many purposes lodgers are considered in law in the light of householders, and enjoy the same protection and greater immunities. The law does not make any distinction between lodgers and other tenants as to the payment of their rent, or turning them out of possession, for they are, generally, subject to the same regulations as other tenants. A notice to quit has in all cases a reference to the letting, and, therefore, in the case of lodgings let by the month, a month's notice is sufficient. If a tenant quit without giving notice, the landlord may recover the rent, though he has put up a bill in the window for the purpose of letting the apartments, or has lighted fires in the rooms; but if the landlord let the apartments to another tenant, he rescinds the contract, and cannot recover rent for any subsequent portion of the period included in the original tenancy, during which they remain unoccupied and unproductive.

By 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 38, compensation may be awarded to the extent of 15*l.* by a police magistrate, for wilful damage done by tenants of houses or lodgings, within the metropolitan police district, to the premises or furniture.

A weekly tenant is not liable for double value for holding over.—4 Geo. II. c. 28.

As to stealing by lodgers of chattels or fixtures let, to be used by them, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 70.

As to common lodging-houses, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 28; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 41; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 43. See Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant.

Logic [fr. λόγος, Gk., reason], the science of the operations of the understanding which are subservient to the estimation of evidence; both the process itself of proceeding from known truths to unknown, and all other intellectual operations, in so far as auxiliary to this. It includes therefore the operation of naming: for language is an instrument of thought, as well as a means of communicating our thoughts. It includes also definition and classification. For, the use of these operations (putting all other minds than one's own out of consideration) is to serve not only for keeping our evidence and the conclusions from them permanent and readily accessible in the memory, but for so marshalling the facts which we may at any time be engaged in investigating, as to enable us to perceive more clearly what evidence there is, and to judge with fewer chances of error, whether it be sufficient. These, therefore, are operations specially instrumental to the estimation of evidence, and, as such, are within the province of logic.—1 Mill's Log.; Art. Log. Comp.; Woolley's Introd.; Whately's Logic.

Logist, an expert accountant.

Logium, a lodge, hovel, or out-house.—Old Records.

Lollardy [fr. lullen, lollen, or lallen, old

Germ., to sing with a low voice; and hard, from their singing funeral dirges, Mosh.], a vulgar term of reproach brought from Belgium and given to the Protestants at the time of the Reformation. Lollardy swelled into the Protestant Church of England. The Lollards closely resembled the Puritans of Elizabeth's reign.

London, the metropolis of England.

The name of this metropolis has exercised the skill and imagination of numerous antiquaries, from the earliest ages of Christianity to the present time. Some assert that it originated, as most probably it did, from the Celtic language, supposed to have been spoken by part of Gallia and the whole of Great Britain, and now preserved among the Welsh and the inhabitants of Low Brittany in France. Lhongdin, in that tongue, signifies 'a town of ships;' and the correspondence of sounds, united to the situation of this city, makes considerably in favor of this derivation. Camden brings, in its support, the words Llhong, and Dinas, which he translates 'the city of ships.' Others propose Lhawn, full; and Dyn, man, 'a city full of men:' but as this last denomination bears no characteristic analogy to the place in question, it does not deserve much credit, although it may be respected on account of the ingenuity of its author. The word Lud, which signified a lord or prince, may have furnished the first syllable; and, indeed, it seems that, independently of being the name of an ancient king of the Britons, preserved in the denomination of some places still existing, as Ludgate, &c., the title of the chieftain of the Franks was Lud. Clovis was Clodovæus; and it is well known that the C or K was not pronounced in this word, since that of Ludovicus, or Ludoix, arose from it. The testimony of ancient writers proves that London was the chief town of the Trinobantes, and most likely peculiarly favored or inhabited by the king or lord of the nation. This ingenious etymon seems to carry with it a great deal of probability, and may satisfy the antiquarian, since no other throws more light on the subject. Luddown might have easily been softened into London, 'the city of Lud;' that is, the place mostly resorted to by the chief of the Trinobantes. The ancient Britons called it, and Welsh still call it, Lundayn; the ancient Saxons, London ceaster, or Castrum Londini. Tacitus, Ptolemy, and Antoninus called it Londinium; Ammianus, Lundinum; Stephanus, Lindonion; Bede, Lundonia, and Civitas Lundonia. The name of Augusta was also conferred on it, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, very probably on account of the traditional report that it was surrounded with walls by Constantine the Great, whose mother was styled Helena Augusta. The French have unaccountably added res to the first syllable, and call it Londres; the Spaniards, Londra; the Portuguese, Londre; and the Dutch, Lunden.—Encyc. Lond. For a short account of early London, see 3 Hall. M. A., p. 219.

It is a county of itself, a market overt every day, except Sundays, and a corporation by prescription, and is exempted from the Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76. It is divided into twenty-six wards, over each of which there is an alderman, and is governed by a lord mayor, who is chosen yearly, and presented to the Queen, or, in her absence, to her justices, or the barons of the Exchequer at Westminster. He is the chief justice of gaol delivery, escheator within the liberties, and bailiff of the river Thames, &c. He has also jurisdiction over the local courts, viz. the Court of Hustings, Sheriffs' Court, Mayor's Court, Court of Common Council, &c. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 157, s. 48.

The customs of London are many and various; they are against the common law, but made good by special usage, and confirmed by Act of Parliament.—4 Inst. 249; 8 Rep. 126.

They differ from all others in the mode of their trial; for, if the existence of the custom be brought in question, it shall not be tried by a jury, but by certificate from the Lord Mayor and aldermen by the mouth of their Recorder; unless it be such a custom as the corporation is itself interested in, as a right of taking toll, &c., for then the law permits them not to certify on their own behalf.

An action upon the custom of London can only be brought in the Lord Mayor's Court; but the custom may be pleaded in bar in a superior court. It may be used in a superior court by way of defence, and in such cases the superior court will take notice of the custom. Lavie v. Phillips, 3 Burr. 1784. As to the mode of certifying the customs of the city, see Plummer v. Bentham, 1 Burr. 249. When a custom has once been certified, the superior courts must take notice of it; and cannot require to have it certified again.—Blacquiere v. Hawkins, 1 Doug. 380. The customs of London as to the distribution of intestates' effects are abolished by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94. Admission to the freedom of the city of London by redemption is exempted from stamp duty by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, s. 4. See CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

London and Westminster Sittings. Courts of Nisi Prius which are held in these places in and after every term, before the chief or other judge of the superior courts. Two judges may sit at the same time for trial of causes pending in the same court.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. ss. 2 & 95; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 177.

London Commissioners to administer Oaths. In pursuance of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2, persons practising as solicitors within ten miles from Lincoln's Inn Hall, at their respective places of business, may be appointed by the Lord Chancellor to administer oaths, and take declarations, affirmations, and attestations of honor in Chancery, and are to possess all such other powers, and discharge all other such duties as formerly appertained to the office of Master Extraordinary in Chancery, and such persons are styled 'London Commissioners to administer Oaths in Chancery,' and are entitled to charge and take a fee of one shilling and sixpence for every oath administered by them, and for every declaration, affirmation, or attestation of honor taken by them, subject to an order of the Lord Chancellor, varying or annulling the same.

London Police Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 94.

London Sessions. They are held eight times during the year: four as quarter sessions, and the remaining four as original general sessions. The usual times are fixed by the Court of Aldermen. The recorder is the judge, sitting as the assessor of the lord mayor and aldermen. Only misdemeanors are tried here. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, county and borough sessions are prohibited from trying any treason, murder, or capital felony, any offence punishable with transportation for life, and also misprision of treason, political offences, offences against religion, perjury or subornation of perjury, bribery, forgery, bigamy, abduction, setting fire to growing crops, woods, heath, &c., endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child, offences against the bankrupt and insolvent laws, administering unlawful oaths, blasphemous and seditious libels, conspiracies and combinations, stealing, injuring, or destroying legal records and documents, testamentary papers, and wills. See CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Lord Lieutenant, the chief governor or viceroy of Ireland.

Lords Lieutenant of Counties, officers of great distinction, appointed by the Crown for the managing of the standing militia of the county, and all military matters therein. Lords Lieutenant are supposed to have been introduced about the reign of Henry VIII., for they are mentioned as known officers in the 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 3, though they had not been long in use; for Camden speaks of them in the time of Queen Elizabeth, as extraordinary magistrates constituted only in times of difficulty and danger. They are generally of the principal nobility, and of the best interest in the county; they are to form the militia in case of a rebellion, &c., and march at the head of them, as the Crown shall direct. They have the power of commissioning colonels, majors, captains, and subaltern officers in the Militia and Volunteer force; also of presenting to the sovereign the names of deputy-lieutenants, who are to be selected from the best gentry in the county, and act in the absence of the Lord Lieutenant. Subservient to the Lord Lieutenant and the deputy lieutenants are the justices of the peace, who, according to the orders they receive from them, are to issue warrants to the high and petty constables, &c.—Encyc. Lond.

Lord of a Manor, one who possesses a copyhold. See COPYHOLD.

Lord Mayor's Court in London. A Court of the Queen, held before the Lord Mayor and aldermen. Its practice and procedure are amended and its powers enlarged by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 157. In this court the recorder, or, in his absence, the common serjeant, presides as judge (s. 46); and from its judgments error may be brought in the Exchequer Chamber (s. 4).

Lord Privy Seal, before the 30 Hen. VIII., was generally an ecclesiastic; the office has since been usually conferred on temporal peers, above the degree of barons. He is appointed by letters patent. The Lord Privy Seal, receiving a warrant from the signet office, issues the Privy Seal, which is an authority to the Lord Chancellor to pass the Great Seal, where the nature of the grant requires it. But the privy seals for money begin in the Treasury, whence the first warrant issues, countersigned by the Lord Treasurer. On the Lord Privy Seal are two attendant clerks who have two deputies to act for them. He is a member of the Cabinet Council.—Encyc. Lond.

Lord and Vassal, grantor and grantee in the feudal system.

Lords' Act, 32 Geo. II. c. 28, amended by 33 Geo. III. c. 5, and made perpetual by 39 Geo. III. c. 50. It was passed for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, but was repealed by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 119.

Lords of Erection, favorites to whom the Crown gave those benefices which were formerly held by abbots and priors.

Lords, House of. See HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lords Justices of Appeal. See CHANCERY.

Lords Marchers, those noblemen who lived on the marches of Wales or Scotland; who in times past had their laws and power of life and death, like petty kings. Abolished by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26; and 6 Edw. VI. c. 10. See MARCHES.

Lords of Parliament, those who have seats in the House of Lords.

Lords of Regality, persons to whom rights of civil and criminal jurisdiction were given by the Crown.—Scotch phrase.

Lords spiritual, the archbishops and bishops who have seats in the House of Lords.

Lords temporal, those lay peers who have seats in the House of Lords. See HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lordship, dominion, manor, seigniory, domain; also title of honor used to a nobleman not a duke. It is also the titulary appellation of the judges and some other persons in authority and office.

Lord Warden of Cinque Ports. See CINQUE PORTS.

Lost Bill of Exchange Act, 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 17, s. 3, which enacts that if an inland bill of exchange for 5*l.* or upwards be lost before it is due, another similar bill must be given, if the loser will give an indemnity against liability on the lost instrument.

Against the person finding the bill the real owner may maintain an action of trover.

Equity will, however, decree payment of lost and mutilated securities, requiring, of course, an affidavit of the loss, and a proper indemnity. By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 87, the court or a judge may order in an action on a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument, that the loss of it shall not be set up at the trial, provided an indemnity is given to the satisfaction of the court, or judge, or a master, against the claims of any other person.

Lot, a contribution or duty. See SCOT.

Lot, or Loth, the thirteenth disk of lead in the mines of Derbyshire, which belongs to the Crown.

Lotherwite, or Leyerwit, a liberty or privilege to make amends for lying with a bondwoman without license. See LAIR-WITE.

Lottery, a game of chance; a distribution of prizes by chance. By 10 & 11 Wm. III. c. 17, all lotteries were declared to be public nuisances, and all grants, patents, or licenses for the same to be contrary to law. But as lotteries were found a ready mode for raising money for the service of the State, they were from time to time sanctioned by Acts of Parliament passed expressly for this purpose; but by 6 Geo. IV. c. 60, they were abolished. In the case of Art Unions the Legislature has legalized the distribution by lottery of works of art. See 4 Bl. Com. 168; 4 Step. Com. 355. See ART UNIONS, FOREIGN LOTTERIES.

Lourcurdus, a ram, or bell-wether.—Cowel.

Lucid interval. 'By a perfect interval,' said Lord Thurlow (Attorney-General v. Parnther, 3 Bro. C. C. 234), 'I do not mean a cooler moment, an abatement of pain and violence, or of a higher state of torture—a mind relieved from excessive pressure; but an interval in which the mind, having thrown off the disease, had recovered its general habit.' And see D'Aguesseau's description in his pleading in the case of the Abbé d'Orleans, quoted under the head 'IDIOTS AND LUNATICS.'

'While the doctrine of lucid intervals,' observes Dr. Ray, 'as explained by the language above quoted, is upheld by scarcely a single eminent name in the medical profession, we find that their existence is either denied altogether, or they are regarded as being only a remission, instead of an intermission, of the disease; an abatement of the severity of the symptoms, not a temporary cure.' Mr. Haslam, who is no mean authority on any question connected with insanity, emphatically declares that 'as a constant observer of this disease for more than twenty-five years, I cannot affirm that the lunatics with whom I have had daily intercourse have manifested alternations of insanity and reason. They may at intervals become more tranquil and less disposed to obtrude their distempered fancies into notice. For a time their minds may be less active, and the succession of their thoughts consequently more deliberate; they may endeavour to effect some desirable purpose and artfully conceal their real opinions, but they have not abandoned or renounced their distempered notions. It is as unnecessary to repeat that a few coherent sentences do not constitute the sanity of the intellect, as that the sounding of one or two notes of a keyed instrument could ascertain it to be in tune.'—Med. Juris. of Insanity, 224.

'The mania,' says Foderè, 'which is accompanied by fury is very often periodical, that is, as if granting an occasional truce to the patient, it appears only at certain epochs, between which he enjoys all his reason, and seems to conduct and judge in all respects like other men, if we except in regard to certain ideas, the thought of which may at any time occasion a fresh paroxysm.'—De Médecine Légale, t. i., p. 205, s. 140.

Georget, while he speaks of lucid intervals 'as returns to reason,' is careful to add that, 'in this state, patients frequently experience some degree of malaise, of some disturbance of their ideas, and weakness of mind, which prevents them from fixing their attention for any length of time on a particular subject, from engaging in reading, writing, or attending to their affairs.'—Des Maladies Mentales, 46.

'There are few cases of mania or melancholy,' says Dr. Read, 'where the light of reason does not now and then shine out between the clouds. In fevers of the mind, as well as those of the body, there occur frequent intermissions. But the mere interruption of a disorder is not to be mistaken for its cure or its ultimate conclusion. Little stress ought to be laid upon those occasional and uncertain disentanglements of intellect, in which the patient is for a time only extricated from the labyrinth of his morbid hallucinations. Madmen may show at starts more sense than ordinary men.'—21*st Essay on Hypochond. Affec.*

'But however calm and rational,' observes Dr. Combe, 'the patient may appear to be during the lucid intervals, as they are called, and while enjoying the quietude of domestic society, or the limited range of a well-regulated asylum, it must never be supposed that he is in as perfect possession of his senses as if he had never been ill. In ordinary circumstances, and under ordinary excitement, his perceptions may be accurate, and his judgment perfectly sound; but a degree of irritability of brain remains behind, which renders him unable to withstand any unusual emotion, any sudden provocation, or any unexpected and pressing emergency. Were not this the case, it is manifest that he would not be more liable to a fresh paroxysm than if he had never been attacked. And the opposite is notoriously the fact; for relapses are always to be dreaded, not only after a lucid interval, but even after perfect recovery. And it is but just as well as proper to keep this in mind, as it has too often happened that the lunatic has been visited with the heaviest responsibility for acts committed during such an interval, from which, previous to the first attack of the disease, he would have shrunk with horror.'—Observ. on Ment. Derang. 241.

The principle of law, which holds the civil responsibilities of the insane to be unimpaired during the lucid interval, is generally correct. It should be the duty of courts, however, to view their acts done at such times with the most watchful jealousy, because their minds, though left free from all delusion, are nevertheless weak and irritable, and they are easily induced, by the arts of unprincipled men, to enter into transactions the folly of which would have been obvious enough to them before they began to be insane.

'The evidence in support of the allegation of a lucid interval,' said Lord Thurlow, 'after derangement at any period has been established, should be as strong and demonstrative of such fact, as where the object of the proof is to establish derangement. The evidence in such a case, applying to stated intervals, ought to go to the state and habit of the person, and not to the accidental interview of any individual, or to the degree of self-possession in any particular act.'

It appears from a note in Beck's Med. Juris. 463, that Lord Eldon dissented from this proposition, and thus stated his objections to it to Lord Thurlow himself:—'I have seen you exercising the duties of Lord Chancellor with ample sufficiency of mind and understanding, and with the greatest ability. Now, if Providence should affect you with a fever, which should have the effect of taking away that sanity of mind for a considerable time (for it does not signify whether it is the disease insanity or a fever that makes you insane), would any one say that it required such very strong evidence to show that your mind was restored to the power of performing such an act as making a will—an act, to the performance of which a person of ordinary intelligence is competent?' 'We are not informed,' says Dr. Ray, 'how this objection struck Lord Thurlow. It does, however, signify everything, whether it is the disease insanity or a fever that makes one insane—for the delirium of fever is but a casual symptom of that disease—and, together with the pathological condition that gave rise to it, is presumed to disappear with the main disorder on which it depends. This is the ordinary course of nature. On the contrary, mental alienation is the essential, the pathognomonic, and oftentimes the only clearly discernible symptom of mania, and its disappearance furnishes the only intimation, perhaps, that we have of the cure of this disease. Thus our means of deciding this point being so small, we are necessarily led to require stronger evidence of their certainty than of the restoration of the mind in fever, because the latter is confirmed by a multitude of symptoms. Recovery from an attack of fever is a phenomenon that anyone can see, but not such is recovery from an attack of mania; because, though the insane delusions, or conduct by which it was manifested, may disappear, it remains to be determined in every case, whether they are not purposely concealed from observation, or proper opportunity has been offered to the patient to bring them forward. Just as the existence of mania requires stronger proof than that of the delirium of fever, so does recovery from the former require stronger proof than recovery from the latter.'

In another place Dr. Ray says, 'we would have the ground on which the validity of a will is established, distinctly understood to be the character of the act, not the condition of the testator's mind.'

'It is important that, on subjects like medical jurisprudence, language should be used with strict adherence to its original and proper signification; and therefore, when a lucid interval is defined by competent authority to be a "temporary cure" of the disease, a recovery of the mind's general habit, the occurrence of which must be proved by the "state and habit" of the person, observed during a sufficient length of time, we have to complain that the term is applied to a mere remission in the violence of the symptoms, which lasts but a few minutes, and is proved by a single coherent act.'

Not a single case has occurred, so far as can be ascertained, where a person has been convicted of crime during a lucid interval.—Ray's Med. Jurisp. of Insanity, tit. 'Lucid Intervals;' Beck's Med. Jurisp. 460; Tay. Med. Jur. c. lviii.

Magistracy, the body of officers who administer the laws; the office of a magistrate.

Magistrate, a man publicly vested with authority; a governor; an executor of the laws.

Of magistrates some are supreme, in whom the sovereign power of the state resides; others are subordinate, deriving all their authority from the supreme magistrate, accountable to him for their conduct, and acting in an inferior, secondary sphere.

The word magistratus contains the same element as mag (ister) and mag (nus); and it signifies both the person and the office, as we see in the phrase se magistratu abdicare.—Liv. xxiii. 23. According to Festus, a magistratus was one who had judicium auspiciumque.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq. See JUSTICES.

Magna assisa eligenda, Writ de. The first species of extraordinary trial is that of the grand assize, which was instituted by Henry II. in Parliament, by way of alternative offered to the choice of a tenant or defendant in a writ of right instead of the duel. The writ issued to the sheriff to return four knights, who were to elect and choose twelve others to be joined with them, and these formed the grand assize or great jury, which was to try the matter of right. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Magna centum, the great hundred, or six score.

Magna Charta. This Great Charter commences the Statute-book of the Realm, and is the Genesis of British Liberty, the fundamental assurance of our political freedom. It is based substantially upon the Saxon Common Law, which flourished in this kingdom until the Norman invasion consolidated the tyrant system of feudality, still the great characteristic of the principles of real property. It is mainly the solemn restitution of the ancient liberties of the realm exacted by our old warrior-barons from a profligate sovereign, in consequence of his abominable licentiousness, and the unendurable oppressions of his creature, the Chief Justiciary, Peter, Bishop of Winchester, an adventurous foreigner, who pandered to his master's villanies, and plundered the people for his own aggrandizement. Goaded by these provocations, the barons assembled at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, in the latter part of the year 1214, and there solemnly swore upon the high altar to withdraw their allegiance from the Crown and openly rebel, unless King John confirmed by a formal charter the ancient liberties of England; and they then engaged to demand this of the sovereign in the early part of the ensuing year, arming themselves in the meantime, so as to compel John, if necessary, to confirm those liberties which had been confirmed by the charters of his predecessors and his own solemn but disregarded oath. As the first step in order to bring the king to his senses, the barons disclaimed all allegiance to him, were formally absolved from their oaths of fidelity, and chose for their general, Robert Fitz Walter, with the title of Marshal of the Army of God and of the Holy Church. After the fortress of Bedford had surrendered to them, and they were in possession of the metropolis, by private agreement with the citizens, the king sent a message to them to desire that a place and time of meeting might be fixed for the purpose of his complying with their demands. Accordingly, the famous meadow called Runingmede, or Runemede (from the Saxon word rune, signifying council), situated on the south-west bank of the Thames, between Staines and Windsor, in the hundred of Godley or Chertsey, in Surrey, was selected for the interview. This meadow had been constantly used for national assemblies, and was named Councilmede. The conferences between the king and the armed barons opened on Monday the 15th of June, and closed on Friday the 19th of June, 1215, being in the seventeenth year of his reign. After the adjustment of preliminaries, articles or heads of agreement were drawn up and sealed; these articles were then reduced to the form of a charter, to which the great seal of the realm was solemnly affixed, and the instrument was given by the king's hand as a confirmation of his own act, but it was not signed by him as commonly supposed. This celebrated event in our history took place in a small island, still called Magna Charta Island, situated in the Thames, not far beyond Aukerwyke, in Buckinghamshire. Many originals of the Great Charter were made, for the purpose of depositing one in every diocese. Two of these are extant in the British Museum, and it is said that there are two others in existence, one in the Cathedral at Salisbury, and the other in that at Lincoln. Cordiality never afterwards really existed between John and the barons. The king dissembled and intrigued with the Pope in order to get rid of his obligations, and the barons threatened and rebelled against the sovereign for the purpose of maintaining our ancient liberties, until the unexpected demise of this, the most contemptible of the Plantagenet dynasty, put an end to his disgraceful scheming.

Magna Charta was not firmly established as the Common Law of the realm and the inalienable right of the subject for nearly a century after the conferences at Runingmede, during which period this country was kept in a constant state of alarm and excitement by the struggles of the barons' war, but at length this constitutional barrier against regal encroachments was finally secured to the people by its solemn confirmation by Edward I. No fewer than thirty-two Acts of Parliament were obtained from 1267 to 1416, from the sovereigns of England, for the purpose of fixing the Great Charter as the broad basis of our legislation, and the material guarantee of the freedom of political opinion, and of vindicating the right of publicly discussing and scrutinising the conduct and measures of the government of the day.

The Great Charter, as set forth in the statutes at large, is expressed to be made in the 9th year of King Henry III. (that is in 1225), and confirmed by King Edward I. in the 25th year of his reign (that is in 1297). The original is written in the Latin language, which, although not of that pure classicality that will be appreciated by the scholar, is nevertheless simple, vigorous, and unmistakable, breathing that enlightened spirit of sturdy independence, which, for the reputation of England, it is to be hoped may be quenchless and invincible. The original Latin is printed in the Statute-book in one column, and an English translation of it in another.

This memorable document commences thus:—

Edward, by the Grace of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Guyan, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. We have seen the Great Charter of the Lord Henry, formerly King of England, our father, of the liberties of England in these words: Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Guyan, and Earl of Anjou, to all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, Sheriffs, Provosts, Officers, and to all Bailiffs, and other our faithful subjects, which shall see this present Charter, greeting. Know ye that we, unto the Honor of Almighty God, and for the salvation of the souls of our progenitors and successors, to the advancement of Holy Church, and amendment of our realm, of our mere and free will (i. e. not by compulsion), have given and granted to all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, and to all freemen of this our realm, these liberties following, to be kept in our kingdom of England for ever.

Magna Charta is a collection of statutes, or capitulary, which consists of thirty-seven chapters, which are for the most part declaratory of our ancient and cherished customs, supplying, however, many of the deficiencies of the Common Law. The 1st chapter is a confirmation of liberties in these words:—

First, we have granted to God, and by our present charter have confirmed for us and our heirs for ever, that the Church of England shall be free and shall have all her whole rights and liberties inviolable. We have granted also and given to all the freemen of our realm, for us and our heirs for ever, these liberties underwritten, to have and to hold to them and their heirs, of us and our heirs for ever.

The beginning of this chapter is somewhat impious, the creature giving to the Creator, but the ecclesiastics attempt to get rid of the impropriety by the explanation that that which is given to the Church is given to the Deity! It is remarkable, that all the great written laws of the Middle Ages begin with a provision in favor of the liberties and immunities of the National Church, vindicating them from the influence of the papal authority and the encroachments of the secular power. Our robust ancestors plainly understood that unless our homage to our Maker proceeded from an unfettered and intelligent faith, religion became soul-degrading and superstitious.

The 2nd chapter relates to the relief of the Crown's tenant of full age:—

If any of our earls or barons, or any other, which holdeth of us in chief by knights service, die, and at the time of his death his heir be of full age, and oweth to us relief, he shall have his inheritance by the old relief; that is to say, the heir or heirs of an earl, for a whole earldom, by one hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a baron, for a whole barony, by one hundred marks; the heir or heirs of a knight, for one whole knight's-fee, one hundred shillings at the most, and he that hath less shall give less according to the old custom of the fees.

The Great Charter only aimed at modifying the grievances of feudalism, which created the military tenure of knight-service. It was reserved for the vigorous administration of Cromwell to abolish this military tenure, which he did by intermitting the Court of Wards in 1645. So perfectly hopeless was the restoration of this oppressive system at the restoration of the second Charles, that the provision annihilating these feudal slaveries, contained in the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, simply embodied this wholesome law of the Commonwealth, and rendered it perpetual.

The statute of Charles II. did away with the effect of the four next chapters of the Great Charter. It will be only necessary, therefore, to mention their subjects:—Chapter three related to the wardship of an infant heir of an earl, baron, or knight; chapter four prohibited the guardian from wasting the lands of his ward, and from destroying his tenants, a plain indication of the wretched condition of the serfs in those days; chapter five compelled such guardians to keep in repair such lands; and chapter six that such heirs should be married without disparagements, that is, should not be compelled to contract an improper or unequal marriage.

The 7th chapter concerns a widow, and enacts that:—

A widow, after the death of her husband, immediately, and without any difficulty, shall have her marriage, and her inheritance, and shall give nothing for her dower, her marriage, or her inheritance, which her husband and she held the day of the death of her husband, and she shall tarry in the chief house of her husband forty days after the death of her husband, within which days her dower shall be assigned her (if it were not assigned her before), or that if the house be a castle, and she depart from the castle, then a competent house shall be forthwith provided for her, in the which she may honestly dwell, until her dower be to her assigned, as it is aforesaid, and she shall have in the meantime her reasonable estovers of the common; and for her dower shall be assigned unto her a third part of all the lands of her husband which were his during coverture, except she were endowed of less at the church door. No widow shall be distrained to marry while she chooses to live single, nevertheless, she shall find surety that she shall not marry without our (the royal) license and assent (if she hold of us), nor without the assent of the lord, if she hold of another.

A widow's dower is that right which she has to a third of the profits of her deceased husband's real property. A statute of Wm. IV. having abolished dower at the church door has placed it in the power of her husband entirely to defeat his widow's dower by a very simple process. Husbands for the most part avail themselves of this privilege. There is hardly then one widow out of a thousand who is not now deprived of this right. A widow's temporary privilege to sojourn in her deceased husband's dwelling-house is called her quarantine. This concession to a widow has two objects, to prevent the interposition of a supposititious child, a deceit which it is said was very commonly practised in the middle ages, and also to provide against the destitute situation into which a widow may be cast by the death of her husband. She may make reasonable use of all the benefits and advantages connected with such residence, and is entitled to be sustained by the husband's victuals; but if she marry again during the forty days, she forfeits her quarantine. The common practice of resorting to marriage settlements, and making wills for the purpose of equitably adjusting the several interests of a family, obviates the harsh operation of the general laws relating to women, the fairness of which is extremely questionable. A widow may now marry again whenever she pleases.

The 8th chapter relates to Crown debts :—

We or our bailiffs shall not seize any land or rent for any debt, as long as the present goods and chattels of the debtor do suffice to pay the debt, and the debtor himself be ready to satisfy therefor. Neither shall the pledges of the debtor be distrained, as long as the principal debtor is sufficient for the payment of the debt. And if the principal debtor fail in payment of the debt, having nothing wherewith to pay, or will not pay where he is able, the pledges shall answer for the debts. And if they will, they shall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until they be satisfied of the debt which they before paid for him, unless the principal debtor can show himself to be acquitted against the said sureties.

This order of enforcing Crown-debts from debtors and their sureties appears to be clear and satisfactory. It is the prerogative of the Crown to claim priority for taxes and penalties before all other creditors, and to recover them by a very prompt and efficacious process, because thesaurus regis est pacis vinculum et bellorum nervi (the public revenue is at once the security of peace and the sinews of war).

The 9th chapter perpetuates our Teutonic right of self-government, the source and bulwark of our constitutional freedom. It enacts that :—

The City of London shall have all their old liberties and customs. Moreover, we will and grant that all other cities, boroughs, towns, and the barons of the five ports, and all other ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs.

The 10th chapter prohibited excessive distress for more service for a knight's-fee than was due, all which has been abolished.

The 11th chapter enacts that :—

Common Pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be holden in some place certain.

The courts of law originally held their sittings in the place where the sovereign was actually residing, so that they followed him in his progress throughout the country, a mode of procedure irksome, expensive and detrimental. The Court of Common Pleas, which adjudicated upon disputes as to property, and which was erected in the reign of Henry III. became by this chapter of Magna Charta the first fixed judicature in the country, and has ever since administered justice in the City of Westminster.

The 12th chapter relates to assizes and provides that :—

Assizes or recognitions of novel disseisin and mortancestor, shall not be taken but in the shires, and after this manner ; we, or if we be out of this realm, our chief justicers shall send our justicers through every county once in the year, which, with the knights of the shire, shall take the said assizes in those counties ; and those things that at the coming of our foresaid justicers, being sent to take those assizes in the counties, cannot be determined, shall be ended by them in some other place in their circuit ; and those things which for difficulty of some articles cannot be determined by them, shall be referred to our justicers of the bench, and there shall be ended.

Assizes or actions of novel disseisin and mortancestor have long been abolished, and more simple remedies established. A novel disseisin was so called to distinguish it from an ancient disseisin, and it arose in this way :—The judges in the olden time, when travelling was perilous and slow, went their circuits but once in seven years, all disseisins then or dispossessings of the lawful owners of lands which took place before the last circuits were ancient, but all disseisins since were novel. Mortancestor was an action brought against a person who had taken possession of property after the death of an ancestor, and before his heir-at-law had entered into their occupancy. This chapter of the Great Charter is interesting as showing that our circuits are a very old institution of our judicial system.

The 13th chapter relates to assizes of darrein presentment, a now abolished method of trying the right to present a priest to an ecclesiastical benefice.

The 14th chapter is directed against excessive fines, and provides that :—

A freeman shall not be amerced, i. e. fined for a small fault, but after the manner of the fault ; and for a great fault after the greatness thereof, saving to him his contenement ; and a merchant likewise, saving to him his merchandise ; and any other's villain than ours shall be likewise amerced, saving his wainage, if he fall into our mercy. And none of the said amerciaments shall be assessed, but by the oath of honest and lawful men of the vicinage. Earls and barons shall not be amerced but by their peers, and after the manner of their offence. No man of the church shall be amerced after the quantity of his spiritual benefice, but after his lay-tenement, and after the quantity of his offence.

A man's contenement is that which is absolutely necessary for his support and maintenance, as his tools and instruments of trade, and wainage is that that is necessary for the laborer and the farmer for the cultivation of his land, as carts, implements of husbandry.

The 15th and 16th chapters relate to the making of bridges and defending of river-banks, a subject which now forms part of local law.

The 17th chapter enacts that :—

No sheriff, constable, escheator, coroner, nor any other our bailiffs, shall hold pleas of our Crown.

Pleas of the Crown comprehend the criminal department of the law. It was ever the anxious care of our ancestors that a person accused of crime should be tried by a superior judge and a jury, and not by an inferior magistrate, since an incompetent judge is too often calamitous to the innocent. It appears, indeed, to be a subject of very serious consideration, whether the powers of summary punishment, which are being given, session after session, to the local magistracy, is not a wide departure from our constitutional principles, and a mode of administering, carelessly and precipitately, the criminal law of the land, without a proper regard to the due execution of justice and the perfect maintenance of truth.

If any that holdeth of us lay-fee do die, and our sheriff or bailiff do show our letters-patent of our summons for debt, which the dead man did owe to us, it shall be lawful to our sheriff or bailiff to attach and inroll all the goods and chattels of the dead, being found in the said lay fee, to the value of the same debt, by the sight of lawful men, so that nothing thereof shall be taken away, until we be clearly paid off the debt, and the residue shall remain to the executors to perform the testament of the dead, and if nothing be owing unto us, all the chattels shall go to the use of the dead (saving to his wife and children their reasonable parts).

Debts owing to the Crown take precedence of all other debts, and this appears to be perfectly fair, for it is only by the certain payment of taxes that the government of a country can be carried on. The old law which prohibited a man from willing away all his property from his wife and children has long since been abrogated, and a man can now by a valid will deprive his widow and children of any participation in the property which he may leave. Whether the abolition of this wholesome law was expedient is a very nice question. It is not universally safe to rely altogether upon the conscientious obligations of men to do that which is right, and since no law will affect the dispositions of a just man, it would perhaps have been better not to have altered this old doctrine.

The subjects of the 19th, 20th, and 21st chapters, relating to purveyance for a castle, doing of castle ward, and taking of horses, carts, and woods for the service of the royal castles, have been rendered obsolete by the abolition of feudalism.

The 22nd chapter declares thus:—

We will not hold the lands of them that be convict of felony but one year and one day, and then those lands shall be delivered to the lords of the fee.

The addition of the day to the year appears to have been intended to prevent any dispute about whether the year is to be calculated as inclusive or exclusive of its last day.

The 23rd chapter enacts that :—

All wears from henceforth shall be utterly pulled down in the Thames and Medway, and through all England, except by the sea-coast.

It is obvious that wears in navigable rivers would be obstructive of free communication.

The 24th chapter relates to the writ called præcipe in capite, which has been abolished.

The 25th chapter directs that :—

One measure of wine shall be through our realm, and one measure of ale, and one measure of corn, that is to say, the quarter of London; and one breadth of dyed cloth, ruffets and haberjects, that is to say, two yards within the lists, and it shall be of weights as it is of measures.

The subject of weights and measures is now regulated by the 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63. There appears to be a growing feeling amongst commercial men to introduce the decimal system of coinage, weights and measures, but adhesion to old methods is likely to retard its introduction.

The 26th, 27th, and 28th chapters, relating to the writ of inquisition of life and member, and the old feudal tenures and wager of law, have been entirely superseded by their abolition.

The 29th chapter emphatically declares that:—

No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or be dissesed of his freehold, or liberties, or free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. We will sell to no man, we will not deny, or delay to any man, either justice or right.

This is a very important passage of the Great Charter, as it is declaratory of the ancient and fundamental law of this country. The lawful judgment of one's peers is that never to be over-rated right belonging to every Englishman to a trial by a jury of his countrymen upon any litigation, whether relating to his private rights or his public wrongs. This ancient and valuable institution it behoves every Englishman jealously to preserve; it behoves us all actively to defeat every attempt to innovate upon or supersede it, for it is the soul and spirit of our national jurisprudence, the repressor of tyranny, the safeguard of the poor, the buckler of innocence, and the vindicator of our rights, our liberties, opinions, and political principles.

It is required by our law that the twelve jurors be unanimous in their verdict, the reason for which would appear on criminal trials to be out of compassion to the prisoner, by giving him the benefit of every doubt, in accordance with the benignant quality of mercy. The unanimity required in trials of a civil nature is said to have arisen from the now abolished punishment, to which every juror was liable, for returning an improper verdict, and as each juror might have been subjected to a conviction, it was no doubt reasonable that every one should have a power of dissenting, and not be concluded by the opinion of the others.

The 30th chapter evinces a liberal treatment of foreigners :—

All merchants (if they were not openly prohibited before) shall have their safe and sure conduct to depart out of England, to come into England, to tarry in and go through England, as well by land as by water, to buy and sell, without any manner of evil tolts, i. e. extortions, by the old and rightful customs, except in time of war. And if they be of a land making war against us, and such be found in our realm at the beginning of the war, they shall be attached without harm of body or goods, until it be known unto us, or our chief justice, how our merchants be intreated there in the land making war against us; and if our merchants be well intreated there, theirs shall be likewise with us.

It was by such humane and hospitable practices as these, that our country has attained the proud position of being the first commercial nation in the world.

The 31st, 32nd, and 33rd chapters, relating to the royal escheat, the lord's services and the patronage of abbeys, have been entirely superseded.

The 34th chapter would appear to be harsh and uncivil; it is this :—

No man shall be taken or imprisoned upon the appeal of a woman for the death of any other than of her husband.

Now, the occasion of this restriction was that when a woman brought an appeal of death, her opponent lost his right of defending himself against her by combat, and therefore, it was limited to widows. The present constitutional mode of prosecuting for the crime of manslaughter or murder is by indictment.

The 35th chapter, relating to county-courts, sheriffs, turns, and leets, has long since fallen into desuetude by reason of new laws upon these subjects.

The 36th chapter enacts that :—

It shall not be lawful from henceforth to any to give his land to any religious house, and to take the same land again to hold of the same house. Nor shall it be lawful to any house of religion to take the lands of any, and to lease the same to him of whom it received them. If any from henceforth give his lands to any religious house, and thereupon be convict, the gift shall be utterly void, and the land shall accrue to the lord of the fee.

It is curious to trace the ingenious devices to which the ecclesiastics had recourse for the purpose of acquiring land and accumulating wealth; to defeat these mischievous contrivances many acts of parliament beginning with this chapter of Magna Charta, and ending with the 9 Geo. II. c. 36, have been passed. This last statute imposes many restrictions and conditions upon the gifts of land and funded property to charities.

The concluding chapter of Magna Charta sets forth that its establishment was bought from the Crown, like most of our great liberties, with a fifteenth of our moveable property, in consideration of which the king grants 'for us and our heirs, that neither we nor our heirs shall attempt to do anything whereby the liberties contained in this charter may be infringed and broken. And if anything should be done to the contrary, it shall be held of no force or effect.'

As to the difficulty of overrating its value, see 2 Hall. M. A., p. 326.

Magna Charta et Charta de Foresta sont appelés les deux grandes charters.—2 Inst. 570. (The Magna Charta, and the Charter of the Forest, are called the two great charters.)

Magna fuit quondam magnæ reverentia chartæ.—2 Inst. Proem.—(Reverence for the Great Charter was formerly great.)

Magna precaria, a great or general reap-day.

Magnus portus, the town and port of Portsmouth.

Maha-gen, a banker or any great shopkeeper among the Hindoos.

Mahal [Indian, literally, a place], any land or public fund producing a revenue to the government of Hindostan. Mahalaat is the plural.

Maiden, an instrument formerly used in Scotland for beheading criminals. It consisted of a broad piece of iron about a foot square, very sharp in the lower part, and loaded above with lead. At the time of execution it was pulled up to the top of a frame about ten feet high, with a groove on each side for it to slide in. The prisoner's neck being fastened to a bar underneath, and the sign given, the maiden was let loose, and the head instantly severed from the body. It was the prototype of the French guillotine.

Maiden Assise, an assise whereat no capital conviction takes place. In such a case, the sheriff of the county presents the judges with white gloves.—Encyc. Lond.

Maiden Rents, a noble paid by the tenants of some manors on their marriage. This was said to be given to the lord for his omitting the custom of mercheta, whereby he was to have the first night's lodging with his tenant's wife; but it seems more probably to have been a fine for license to marry a daughter.

Maignagium [fr. maignen, Fr.], a brazier's shop, or perhaps a house.

Maihem. See MAYHEM.

Maihemium est inter crimina majora minimum, et inter minora maximum.—Co. Litt. 127.—(Mayhem is the least of great crimes, and the greatest of small.)

Maihemium est membri mutilatio; et dici poterit, ubi aliquis in aliquâ parte sui corporis effectus sit inutilis ad pugnandum.—Co. Litt. 126.—(Mayhem is the mutilation of a member, and can be said to take place when a man is injured in any part of his body so as to be useless in fight.)

Maihemium est homicidium inchoatum.—3 Inst. 118.—(Mayhem is incipient homicide.)

Mail [fr. malle, Fr., a trunk], a bag of letters carried by the post, or the vehicle which carries the letters. Also, armour.

Maile, a kind of ancient money, or silver halfpence; a small rent.—9 Hen. V.

Maills and Duties, the rents of an estate, whether in money or victuals.—Scotch phrase.

Maiming, depriving of any necessary part. See MAYHEM.

Mainad, a false oath, perjury.

Maine-port, a small tribute, commonly of loaves of bread, which in some places the parishioners pay to the rector in lieu of small tithes.

Mainovre, or Mainœuvre, a trespass committed by hand.

Mainour, Manour, or Meinour, a thing taken away which is found in the hand (in manu) of the thief who took it.

Mainpernable, that which may be held to bail.

Mainpernor [fr. main, Fr., hand, and preneur, taker], surety, a kind of bail. See BAIL.

Mainprize [fr. main, Fr., and pris, taken], delivery into the custody of a friend upon security for appearance. The writ of mainprize is obsolete.

Main-rent, vassalage.

Mainsworn, forsworn.

Maintainors, persons who second or support a cause in which they are not interested, by assisting either party with money, or in any other manner.

Maintenance, an officious intermeddling in a suit which in no wise concerns one, by assisting either party with money, or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it. By the Roman law, it was a species of crimen falsi to enter into any confederacy, or do any act to support another's law-suits, by money, witnesses, or patronage.

It is either ruralis, in the country, as where one assists another in his pretensions to lands, by taking or holding the possession of them for him; or where one stirs up quarrels or suits in the country; or it is curialis, in a court of justice, where one officiously intermeddles in a suit depending in any court, which does not belong to him, and with which he has nothing to do.—2 Rol. Abr. 115. Maintaining suits in the spiritual courts is not within the statutes relating to maintenance.—Cro. Eliz. 549. A man may, however, maintain a suit in which he has any interest, actual or contingent; and also a suit of his near kinsman, servant, or poor neighbor, out of charity and compassion, with impunity.—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Maintenance.' It is an invidious inquiry, but suggested by the practice of a peculiar class of lawyers, how far an attorney may be guilty of this offence. An attorney ought not to undertake a suit upon an understanding that he should bear all the costs out of his own pocket, and that his client should be indemnified from all loss. If an attorney take up a doubtful claim, and inform the party of it, and offer to recover the same for him upon terms of future profit and advantage to himself, derivable from the fruits of such suit, he is, according to the generally received opinion, guilty of maintenance, and in the second instance, barratry; but secus the bare solicitation to conduct a suit. The simple advancing of money for the purpose of carrying on a suit, however poor the client may be, cannot be deemed maintenance if the attorney has any expectation of being repaid; and, indeed, such an act is a charitable office, where the motives are upright.

Any legitimate common interest will justify persons jointly subscribing to pay the expenses of a suit, even when it is carried on by a third party.

This offence is punished by common law, and also by 1 Ric. II. c. 4, by fine and imprisonment; and by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, by a forfeiture of 10*l.*

Also, the protection and support of children, parents, wives, &c. See 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 87; as to maintenance of infants in Equity, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 555; and see ALIMONY.

Maisnada, a family.

Maison de Dieu, a monastery hospital, or alms-house.

Maisura, a house, mansion, or farm.

Majesty, a title of sovereigns. It was first used among ourselves in the reign of Henry VIII.

Majestas is defined by Ulpian (Dig. 48, tit. 4, s. 1) to be 'crimen illud quod adversus populum Romanum vel adversus securitatem ejus committitur.' He then gives various instances of the crime of majestas, some of which pretty nearly correspond to treason in English law; but all the offences included under majestas comprehend more than our term treason. One of the offences included in majestas was the effecting, aiding in, or planning the death of a magistratus populi Romani, or of one who had imperium or potestas. Though the phrase, 'crimen majestatis,' was used, the complete expression was crimen læsæ, imminutæ, diminutæ, minutæ, majestatis.

Major [fr. maier, Old Eng., power], a mayor; an officer in the army; also, a person of full age, as distinguished from a minor.

Major hæreditas venit unicuique nostrûm à jure et legibus quam à parentibus.—2 Inst. 56. (A greater inheritance comes to every one of us from right and the laws than from parents.)

Major domo, a steward or master of a household.

Majora regalia, the greater rights of the Crown, such as regard the Royal character and authority.—1 Bl. Com. 241.

Majore pœnâ affectus quam legibus statuta est, non est infamis. – 4 Inst. 66.—(One affected with a greater punishment than is provided by the laws is not infamous.)

Majori inest minus.—(The less is in the greater.)

Majority, full age; the greater number; the office and rank of major.

Majua, a petty dealer in Hindostan.

Majun, a banker or considerable trader in Hindostan.

Majus jus, a writ or law-proceeding in some customary manors, in order to try a right to land.

Majus dignum trahit ad se minus dignum.—Co. Litt. 43.—(The more worthy draws to itself the less worthy.)

Majus est delictum seipsum occidere quam alium.—3 Inst. 54.—(It is a greater crime to kill one's self than another.)

Maker, the person who signs a promissory note, who stands in the same situation, after the note is endorsed, as the acceptor of a bill of exchange.

Making law, clearing one's self of an action, &c., by an oath and the oath of neighbors.

Mal, a prefix, meaning bad, wrong, fraudulent; as mal-administration, mal-practice, malversation, &c.

Mala, a mail, or port-mail; a bag, to carry letters, &c.

Mala fides, bad faith; the opposite to bona fides, good faith. Questions of bad faith must be judged of by a jury.—1 East, 318.

Mala grammatica non vitiat chartam. Sed in expositione instrumentorum mala grammatica quoad fieri possit evitanda est.—6 Co. 39.—(Bad grammar does not vitiate a charter. But in the exposition of instruments, bad grammar, as far as it can be done, is to be avoided.)

Mala in se, acts which are wrong in themselves, whether prohibited by human laws or not, as distinguished from mala prohibita; such as murder, robbery, perjury, &c.—1 Step. Com. 36–39.

Malandrinus, a thief or pirate.

Mala praxis. If the health of an individual be injured by the unskilful or negligent conduct of a surgeon, or apothecary, or general practitioner, in assuming to heal a dislocated or fractured limb, or internal disorder, an action for compensation may be sustained (8 East, 348); or the wrong doer may be proceeded against by censure in the college, or, for gross negligence or misconduct he might be indicted.—Com. Dig. 'Physician.' And if a medical practitioner, through ignorance or want of skill, should, in attempting to deliver a child, unnecessarily wound the same, and it be afterwards born alive, and then die of such wound, he will be guilty at least of manslaughter.—The King v. Long, 4 C. and P. 398; Rex v. Senior, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 346; 3 Step. Com. 462.

Mala prohibita, wrongs which are prohibited by human laws, but are not necessarily mala in se, or wrongs in themselves, as treason, playing at unlawful games.—Step. Com. i. 36, 39; iv. 96.

Malary, judicial, belonging to a judge or magistrate.—Roberts' Indian Glos.

Malberge [mons placiti, Lat.], a hill, where the people assembled at a court, like our assizes; which by the Scotch and Irish are called parley hills.—Du Cange.

Malconna, a treasury or store-house in Hindostan.—Rob. Ind. Glos.

Malecreditus, one of bad credit, who is not to be trusted.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xxxviii.

Maledicta expositio quæ corrumpit textum.—4 Co. 35.—(It is a bad exposition which corrupts the text.)

Malediction, a curse, which was anciently annexed to donations of lands made to churches or religious houses, against those who should violate their rights.

Malefaction, a crime, an offence.

Malefactor, an offender against law; a criminal.

Maleficia non debent remanere impunita; et impunitas continuum affectum tribuit delinquenti. 4 Co. 45.—(Evil deeds ought not to remain unpunished; and impunity affords continual incitement to the delinquent.)

Maleficia propositis distinguuntur.—Jenk. Cent. 290.—(Evil deeds are distinguished from evil purposes.)

Maleficium, waste; damage; injury.—Civ. Law.

Maleson [fr. malum, Lat., evil; and sonus, a sound], a curse.—Bailey.

Malesworn, or Malsworn, forsworn.

Maletent, Maletoute, a toll for every sack of wool.

Malfeasance, the commission of some unlawful act.

Malice [fr. malitia, Lat.], a formed design of doing mischief to another, technically called malitia præcogitata, or malice prepense or aforethought. It is either express, as when one with a sedate and deliberate mind and formed design kills another, which formed design is evidenced by certain circumstances discovering such intention, as lying in wait, antecedent menaces, former grudges, and concerted schemes to do him some bodily harm, or implied, as where one wilfully poisons another; in such a deliberate act the law presumes malice, though no particular enmity can be proved.—1 Chit. Gen. Pr. 46; 4 Step. Com. 154.

Malicious burning. The statute law of England and Ireland relating to the offences of maliciously setting fire to property, or maliciously attempting so to do, is consolidated and amended by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97. As to buildings, ss. 1–8; corn, trees, vegetable productions, ss. 16–18; mines, ss. 26 & 27; ships, ss. 43 & 44. By 12 Geo. III. c. 24, s. 1, which is unrepealed, the offence of maliciously setting fire to ships of war is a capital felony. See ARSON.

Malicious injuries, doing mischievous damage to private property, not with an intent to gain by another's loss, but out of a spirit of wanton cruelty or of deep revenge. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, consolidated and amended the laws relating to malicious injuries to property. As to the malicious destruction of works of art, science, &c., in public institutions, see s. 39.—4 Step. Com. 222.

Malicious prosecution, a prosecution preferred without reasonable or probable cause, by which a person's reputation is attempted to be wilfully destroyed. The remedy is an action on the case for a false and malicious prosecution, in which damages are recovered.

Malignare, to malign or slander; also to maim.

Malik, a proprietor.—Indian.

Malitia præcogitata, malice aforethought. See MALICE.

Malitia est acida; est mali animi affectus. Buls. 49.—(Malice is sour; it is the quality of a bad mind.)

Malitia supplet ætatem.—Dyer, 104 b.—(Malice supplies [the want of] age.)

Mallum and Mallus. See METHEL.

Malo grato, in spite; unwillingly.

Malt mulna, a quern or malt-mill.

Malt-shot, or Malt-scot, certain payment for making malt.

Malt-tax. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 18, ss. 7, 8.

Malum in se. See MALA IN SE.

Malum hominum est obviandum.—4 Co. 15. (The malice of men is to be avoided.)

Malum non habet efficientem, sed deficientem causam.—3 Inst. Proeme.—(Evil has not an efficient, but a deficient cause.)

Malum prohibitum. See MALA PROHIBITA.

Malum non præsumitur.—4 Co. 72.—(Evil is not presumed.)

Malum quo communius eo pejus.—(The more common an evil is, the worse.)

Malus usus est abolendus, quia in consuetudinibus, non diuturnitas temporis, sed soliditas rationis est consideranda.—Co. Litt. 141.—(An evil custom is to be abolished, because, in customs, not length of time, but solidity of reason, is to be considered.)

Malveilles [fr. malveillance, Fr.], ill-will; crimes and misdemeanors; malicious practices.

Malveisa, a warlike engine to batter and beat down walls.—Mat. Par.

Malveisin [fr. mauvais voisin, Fr.], an ill neighbor.

Malveis procurors, such as used to pack juries, by the nomination of either party in a cause, or other practice.—Art. super Chart. c. x.

Malversation, misbehaviour in an office, employment, or commission, as breach of trust, extortion, &c.

Man, Isle of, an island in the Irish Sea off the coast of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire. The island is divided into two districts, which are subdivided into six sheadings including 17 parishes. Each sheading has its own coroner, to whom the jury-list for sheading is committed, and who is bound to summon the juries from that list when required.—Hale's Hist. p. 255; 4 Inst. 283.

This was formerly a distinct territory, but by 5 Geo. III. cc. 26, 39, the whole island and all its dependencies, except the landed property of the Athol family, and some other rights belonging to them, are inalienably vested in the Crown, and subjected to the regulations of the British excise and customs. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 60, as to its trade regulations; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 63; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 104, s. 354; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 96, s. 24; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 61; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 56; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 86.

Mana, an old woman.

Manacle [fr. manus, Lat.], chain for the hands; shackle.

Manager, a superintendent, a conductor or director. As to a fraud by a manager of a company, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 82, 83, 84.

Managium, a mansion-house or dwelling-place.

Manbote, a compensation or recompense for homicide, particularly due to the lord for killing his man or vassal, the amount of which was regulated by that of the wer.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Manca, Mancus, or Mancusa, a square piece of gold coin, commonly valued at 30 pence.

Manceps [Lat.], a farmer of the public revenues; one who sold an estate with a promise of keeping the purchaser harmless; one who bought an estate by outcry; one who undertook a piece of work and gave security for the performance.

Manche-present, a bribe; a present from the donor's own hand.

Manchester, bishopric of, established by 10 & 11 Vict. c. 108.

The 'Manchester Parish Division Act, 1850,' is 13 & 14 Vict. c. 41. The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 69, enables the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England to apply certain funds towards the repairs of the cathedral or collegiate church of Manchester.

Mancipate, to enslave; to bind; to tie.

Mancipatio. Every father, in the Roman law, had such an authority over his son, that before the son could be released from his subjection and made free, he must be twice sold and bought, his natural father being in the first instance the vendor. The vendee was called pater fiduciarius. After this fictitious bargain, the pater fiduciarius sold him again to his natural father, who could then, but not till then, manumit or make him free. The imaginary sale was called mancipatio; and the act of giving him liberty, or setting him free, was called emancipatio.

Also, the selling or alienating of certain lands by the balance or money paid by weight, and in the presence of five witnesses. This mode of alienation took place only among Roman citizens, and that only in respect to certain estates situated in Italy, which were called mancipia.—Encyc. Lond. Abolished by Justinian, when he obliterated the distinction between things mancipi, and things nec mancipi. See Sand. Just. 175.

Manciple [fr. manceps, Lat.], a clerk of the kitchen or caterer, especially in colleges.

Mandamus (we command), a high prerogative writ of a most extensive remedial nature. In form it is a command issuing in the Queen's name from the Court of Queen's Bench only (except a mandamus to examine witnesses in India, &c., under 1 Wm. IV. c. 22, s. 1, and a mandamus under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, which may be awarded by any of the three superior courts of common law), and addressed to any person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature within the Crown's dominions, requiring them to do some particular thing therein specified, which appertains to their office and duty, and which the Court of Queen's Bench has previously determined, or at least supposes to be consonant to right and justice.

It is used principally for public purposes, and to enforce performance of public rights or duties. It enforces, however, some private rights when they are withheld by public officers.

It is a general rule that this writ is only to be issued where a party has no other specific remedy; and he must apply to the court without delay. To induce the court to interfere, there must be not only a specific legal right, but also the absence of any other specific legal remedy. The jurisdiction is to be exercised with great caution, because it is altogether in the discretion of the court, and no proceeding in error lies upon it.

By mandamus, arbitrations and awards, when made under public acts, may be enforced; overseers and public officers may be compelled to deliver up parish books, &c. to their successors; burial may be enforced, and also the statement of a special case, when the sessions have agreed that there should be a case. It will lie to compel justices to set out evidence in their convictions, in pursuance of the 3 Geo. IV. c. 23, s. 1, and generally to perform their duties. But by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5, the court may, in lieu of a mandamus, grant a rule ordering justices to do an act. It also lies to compel lords of manors to admit copyholders, and corporations to fill up vacant offices, and to proceed to the election of mayor; to restore persons wrongfully ousted from an office or right, or to admit a person wrongfully refused. So it formerly lay to the Ecclesiastical Courts to compel probate to the executor named in a will, or letters of administration to the next of kin.

The remedy by mandamus is extended by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which provides (ss. 68–77), that the plaintiff in any action in any of the superior courts, except replevin and ejectment, may indorse upon the writ and copy to be served a notice that he intends to claim a writ of mandamus, and may, thereupon, claim in the declaration, either together with any other demand which may now be enforced in such action, or separately, a writ of mandamus, commanding the defendant to fulfil any duty in the fulfilment of which the plaintiff is personally interested. The declaration in such action must set forth sufficient grounds upon which such claim is founded, must show that the plaintiff is personally interested therein, that he sustains or may sustain damage by the non-performance of such duty, and that performance thereof has been demanded by him, and refused or neglected. The pleadings and other proceedings in any action in which a writ of mandamus is claimed are the same in all respects, as nearly as may be, as in an ordinary action for the recovery of damages, and costs are recoverable by either party. The provisions of the C. L. P. A. 1852 & 1854, so far as they are applicable, apply to the proceedings and pleadings upon a prerogative writ of mandamus issued by the Court of Queen's Bench.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 43, no man- damus shall in future issue to a judge or officer of a county-court for refusing to do any act relating to the duties of his office; but application must be made to a superior court or a judge for a rule or summons to show cause why such act should not be done.—4 Step. Com. 5–10, 72 n, 418 n, 604; Gude's Crown Prac.; Impey on Mandamus; and 2 Selw. Nisi Prius, 1083–1111; Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 229, 1102; and Day's C. L. P. Acts.

Mandant, the principal in the contract of mandate.

Mandatary [fr. mandatarius, Lat.], he to whom a mandate, charge, or commandment is given; also, he that obtains a benefice by mandamus.

Mandata licita strictam recipiunt interpretationem, sed illicita, latam et extensam.—Bacon. (Lawful commands receive a strict interpretation, but unlawful, a wide and broad interpretation.)

Mandatarius terminos sibi positos transgredi non potest.—Jenk. Cent. 53.—(A mandatary cannot exceed the bounds placed upon himself.)

Mandate [fr. mandatum, Lat.], a judicial command, charge, commission.

Also, a bailment of goods, without reward, to be carried from place to place, or to have some act performed about them. The person employing is called in the civil law mandant, or mandator, and the person employed mandatarius or mandatory.

The distinction between a mandate and a deposit is, that in the latter, the principal object of the parties is the custody of the thing; and the service and labor are merely accessorial. In the former, the labor and service are the principal objects of the parties, and the thing is merely accessorial.

Three things are necessary to create a mandate: (1) that there should exist something which should be the subject of the contract, or some act or business to be done; (2) that it should be to be done gratuitously; (3) that the parties should voluntarily intend to enter into the contract.

A mandatory incurs three obligations: (1) to do the act which is the object of the mandate, and with which he is charged; (2) to bring to it all the care and diligence that it requires; (3) to render an account of his doings to the mandator.

A mandator contracts to reimburse a mandatary for all expenses and charges reasonably incurred in the execution of the mandate, and also to indemnify him for his liability on all contracts which arise incidentally in the proper discharge of his duty.

The contract of mandate may be dissolved either by the renunciation of the mandatary at any time before he has entered upon its execution, or by his death; for, being founded in personal confidence, it is not presumed to pass to his representatives, unless there is some special stipulation to that effect. But if the mandate be partly executed, there may in some cases arise a personal obligation on the part of the representatives to complete it.—Story's Bailments, c. iii.

In the canon law, a rescript of the pope, by which he commands some ordinary collator or precentor to put the person there nominated in possession of the first benefice vacant in his collation. As to their abuses, see 2 Hall. M. A. p. 212.

Royal mandates to judges for interfering in private causes, constituted a branch of the royal prerogative, which was given up by Edward I. And the 1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2, declared that the pretended power of suspending or dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of Parliament, is illegal.

Mandati Dies, Maundy Thursday.

Mandato, panes de, loaves of bread given to the poor upon Maundy Thursday.

Mandator, director. See MANDATE.

Mandatory, preceptive; directory.

Mandatum, a fee or retainer given by the Romans to the procuratores and advocati. Mandatum is sometimes used in the sense of a command from a superior to an inferior.

Mandavi ballivo (I have commanded the bailiff). If a bailiff of a liberty have the execution and return of a writ, the sheriff may return that he commanded the bailiff to execute it; and if the bailiff have not made a return, the sheriff should return that fact accordingly (mandavi ballivo, qui nullum dedit responsum); or if he have made a return, the sheriff should return it.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 618.

Manentes [fr. maneo, Lat., to continue], tenants. Obsolete.

Manerium dicitur à manendo, secundum excellentiam, sedes magna, fixa, et stabilis.—Co. Litt. 58.—(A manor is called from 'manendo,' a seat, according to its excellence, great, fixed, and firm.)

Mangonare, to buy in a market.

Mania, mental alienation, which see.

Mania a potu, otherwise denominated delirium tremens, a disease induced from the intemperate use of spirituous liquors, or certain other diffusible stimuli.

Manifesta probatione non indigent.—7 Co. 40.—(Things manifest do not stand in need of proof.)

Manifesto, or Manifest, a public declaration made by a prince, in writing, showing his intentions to begin a war or other enterprise, with the motives that induce him to it, and the reasons on which he founds his rights and pretensions.—Encyc. Lond.

In commercial navigation, a document signed by the master, containing the name or names of the places where the goods on board have been laden, and the place or places for which they are respectively destined, the name and tonnage of the vessel, the name of the master, and the name of the place to which the vessel belongs, a particular account and description of all the packages on board, with the marks and numbers thereon, the goods contained in such packages, and the names of the respective shippers and consignees, as far as such particulars are known to the master. A separate manifest is required for tobacco. The manifest must be made out, dated, and signed by the captain, at the place or places where the goods, or any part of the goods, are taken on board.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Manner, act; as to take a thief in the act of stealing.

Manning, a day's work of a man.

Mannire, to cite any person to appear in court and stand in judgment there; it is different from bannire; for both of them are citations; this is by the adverse party, and that is by the judge.—Du Cange.

Mannopus, goods taken in the hands of an apprehended thief.—Cowel. See MANU OPERA.

Mannus, a horse.

Manor [fr. manerium, Lat.; manoir, Fr., habitation, or manendo, of abiding there, because the lord usually resided there], a noble sort of fee, granted partly to tenants for certain services to be performed, and partly reserved to the use of the lord's family. The tenementales were granted out; the dominicales were reserved to the lord; the whole fee was termed a lordship or barony; and the court appendant to the manor the Court Baron. See Co. Litt. 58 a; 1 Step. Com. 219, 225; and COPYHOLD.

Man-queller [fr. man, and cwellan, Sax.], a murderer.

Manrent, a kind of bond between lord and vassal, by which protection was stipulated on the one hand, and fidelity with personal service on the other.—Rob. Scot. b. 1.

Mansa, or Mansum, a mansion or house.—Spelm.

Manse, a house or habitation, either with or without land.

Manse, or Mansum presbyteri, a parsonage or vicarage-house; sometimes called presbyterium.

Manser, a bastard.—Cowel.

Mansion [mansio, Lat., à manendo], the lord's house in a manor.

Mansion-house, a dwelling house.—3 Inst. 64.

Manslaughter, the unlawful killing of another without malice express or implied. It is either—

(a) Voluntary, upon a sudden heat, or (β) Involuntary, upon the commission of some unlawful act.

Both are felony; and punished at the discretion of the court, by penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for any term not exceeding two years, or by a fine.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 5. See 4 Step. Com. 147.

Manstealer, a kidnapper.

Mansum capitale, the manor-house, or lord's court.

Mansura, the habitation of people in the country.

Mansus, a farm.

Mantea, a long robe or mantle.—Old Records.

Mantheoff [fr. mannus, Lat., a nag, and theoff, Sax., a thief], a horse-stealer.—Leg. Alf.

Manticulate, to pick pockets.—Bailey.

Man-trap, engines to catch trespassers, now unlawful, unless set in a dwelling-house for defence between sunset and sunrise.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 31.

Manualia beneficia, the daily distributions of meat and drink to the canons and other members of cathedral churches for their present subsistence.

Manualis obedientia, sworn obedience or submission upon oath.

Manucaptio, a writ that lay for a man taken on suspicion of felony, &c., who cannot be admitted to bail by the sheriff or others having power to let to mainprise.—F. N. B. 249.

Manucaptor, one who stands bail for another.

Manufacture, anything made by art. As to a patent for a manufacture, see LETTERS-PATENT.

Manu forti (with strong hand).

Manumission, the act of giving freedom to slaves.

Among the Romans it was performed in three several ways: 1st, when, with his master's consent, a slave had his name entered in the census or public register of the citizens; 2nd, when the slave was led before the prætor, and that magistrate laid his wand (vindicta) on his head; 3rd, when the master, by his will, gave his slave freedom.

Among us, in the time of the Conqueror, villeins were manumitted by their master delivering them by the right hand to the viscount in full court, showing them the door, giving them a lance and a sword, and proclaiming them free. Others were manumitted by charter. There was also an implied manumission, as when the lord made an obligation for payment of money to the bondman at a certain day, or sued him where he might enter without suit, and the like.—Encyc. Lond.

Manumittere, idem est quod extra manum vel potestatem ponere.—Co. Litt. 137.—(To manumit is the same as to place beyond hand and power.)

Manung, or Monung, the district within the jurisdiction of a reeve, apparently so called from his power to exercise therein one of his chief functions, viz., to exact (amanian) all fines.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Manu opera, cattle or implements of husbandry; also, stolen goods taken from a thief caught in the fact.

Manupastus, a domestic; perhaps the same as hlafæta.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Manupes, a foot of full and legal measure.

Manus, an oath, from the ceremony of laying the hand on the book; also, the person taking an oath, or compurgator.

Manus mortua, quia possessio est immortalis, manus pro possessione et mortua pro immortali. Co. Litt. 2.—(Mortmain (dead hand), because it is an immortal possession; manus stands for possession, and mortua for immortal.)

Manus mediæ, or infimæ homines, men of a mean condition, or of the lowest degree.

Manutenentia, the old writ of maintenance. Reg. Orig. 182.

Manwyrth, the value or price at which a man is estimated, according to his degree; apparently synonymous with wer-geld. It occurs only in the laws of Hlothhære and Eadric.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Mara, a mere, lake, or great pond, that cannot be drawn dry.—Par. Antiq. 418.

Marcatus, the rent of mark by the grant anciently reserved in leases, &c.

Marchandises avariées [Fr.], damaged goods.

Marchers, or Lord Marchers, those noblemen who lived on the marches of Wales and Scotland, who, in times past, had their laws and regal power, until they were abolished by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26.

Marches, the boundaries of countries and territories; the limits between England, Wales, and Scotland. Also, in Scotland, the boundaries between private properties.—Co. Litt. 106 b.

Marches, Court of, an abolished tribunal in Wales, where pleas of debt or damages, not above the value of 50*l.*, were tried and determined.—Cro. Car. 384.

Marchet, or Marchetta, a pecuniary fine, anciently paid by the tenant to his lord for the marriage of one of the tenant's daughters. This custom obtained, with some difference, throughout all England and Wales, as also in Scotland; and it still continues to obtain in some places. It is also denominated gwahr-merched, i. e. maid's fee.—Co. Litt. 117 b, 140 a.

Marchioness [formed by adding the English female termination to the Latin marchio], a dignity in a woman answerable to that of marquess in a man, conferred either by creation, or by marriage with a marquess.

Mareschall, or Mareshal, a marshal.

Marettum [fr. maret, Fr., a fen or marsh], marshy ground overflowed by the sea or great rivers.—Co. Litt. 5.

Marinariorum Capitaneus, an admiral or warden of the ports.

Marinarius, a mariner or seaman.

Marine, a general name for the navy of a kingdom or state; as also the whole economy of naval affairs, or whatever respects the building, rigging, arming, equipping, navigating, and fighting ships. It comprehends also the government of naval armaments, and the state of all the persons employed therein, whether civil or military. Also one of the marines, which see.

Marine Insurance. See INSURANCE.

Marines, a military force drilled as infantry, whose especial province is to serve on board ships of war when in commission. The force was first established about the middle of the last century. When serving on board ship, their discipline is regulated by the Naval Discipline Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 115; when on shore by an Act annually passed, called the Marine Mutiny Act. See 26 & 27 Vict. c. 9.

Marine Society, a charitable institution for the purpose of apprenticing boys to the naval service, &c. incorporated by 12 Geo. III. c. 67.

Marischal, an officer in Scotland, who, with the Lord High Constable, possessed a supreme itinerant jurisdiction in all crimes committed within a certain space of the court, wherever it might happen to be.

Mariscus, a marshy or fenny ground.—Domesday; Co. Litt. 5 a.

Maris et fœminæ conjunctio est de jure naturæ.—7 Co. 13.—(The connection of male and female is by the law of nature.)

Maritagio amisso per defaltam, an obsolete writ for the tenant in frank-marriage to recover lands, &c. of which he was deforced.

Maritagium, the portion which is given with a daughter in marriage. Also the power which the lord or guardian in chivalry had of disposing of his infant ward in matrimony.—Spelm. See 1 Reeves, c. iii., p. 121, and c. v., 297. N. B. In this volume of Reeves, sheets I and K have been paged alike.

Maritagium est aut liberum aut servitio obligatum; liberum maritagium dicitur ubi donator vult quod terra sic data quieta sit et libera ab omni seculari servitio.—Co. Litt. 21.—(A marriage portion is either free or bound to service; it is called frank-marriage when the giver wills that land thus given be exempt from all secular service.)

Maritagium habere, for Maritare, to have the free disposal of an heiress in marriage.

Marital [fr. maritus, Lat.], pertaining to a husband; incident to a husband.

Maritated, having a husband.

Maritima Angliæ, the profit and emolument arising to the Crown from the sea, which anciently was collected by sheriffs; but it was afterwards granted to the Lord High Admiral. Par. 8 Hen. III. m. 4.

Maritime Courts, the Court of Admiralty and its court of appeal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Courts of Vice-Admiralty are established in Her Majesty's possessions beyond the seas, with jurisdiction over maritime causes, including those relating to prize. By 2 Wm. IV. c. 51, it is enacted, that in all cases where a ship comes within the local limits of a court of Vice-Admiralty, suits may be commenced therein for 'seamen's wages, pilotage, bottomry, damage to ships by collision, breach of regulations of the royal service at sea, salvage, and droits of admiralty,' notwithstanding the cause of action may have arisen out of the local limits of such courts.

Maritime law, the law relating to harbors, ships, and seamen. It forms an important branch of the commercial law of all maritime nations. It is divided into a variety of different departments, such as those with respect to harbors, the property of ships, the duties and rights of masters and seamen, contracts of affreightment, average, salvage, &c. No system or code of maritime law has ever been issued by authority in Great Britain. The laws and practices that now obtain amongst us in reference to maritime affairs have been founded principally on the practices of merchants, the principles laid down in the civil law, the laws of Oleron and Wisby, the works of distinguished jurisconsults, the judicial decisions of our own and foreign countries, &c. A law so constructed has necessarily been in a progressive state of improvement, and, though still susceptible of amendment, it corresponds at this moment more nearly, perhaps, than any other system of maritime law, with those universally recognised principles of justice and general convenience by which the transactions of merchants and navigators ought to be regulated.

The decisions of Lord Mansfield did much to fix the principles and to improve and perfect the maritime law of England. It is also under great obligations to Lord Stowell. The decisions of the latter, chiefly, indeed, respect questions of neutrality, growing out of the conflicting pretensions of belligerents and neutrals during the late war; but the principles and doctrines which he unfolds in treating those questions throw a strong and steady light on all branches of maritime law. It has occasionally, indeed, been alleged—and the allegation is probably, in some degree, well founded—that his lordship has conceded too much to the claims of belligerents. Still, however, his judgments must be regarded, allowing for this excusable bias, as among the noblest monuments of judicial wisdom of which any country can boast. 'They will be contemplated,' says Mr. Serjeant Marshall (Insur. Prel. Disc.), 'with applause and veneration, as long as depth of learning, soundness of argument, enlightened wisdom, and the chaste beauties of eloquence hold any place in the estimation of mankind.'—McCull. Comm. Dict. As to the maritime laws of early times, see 3 Hall. M. A., p. 333.

Maritime State, consists of the officers and mariners of the British navy, who are governed by express and permanent laws, or the articles of the navy, established by Act of Parliament.

Mark [fr. marc, Welsh; mearc, Sax.; merche, Dut.; marque, Fr.], a token; an impression; a proof; an evidence; license of reprisals; also, a sum of 13*s.* 4*d.*

In commerce and manufacture, a certain character struck or impressed on various kinds of commodities, either to show the place where they were made, and the persons who made them; or to witness that they have been viewed and examined by the officers charged with the inspection of manufactures; or to show that the duties imposed thereon have been paid. It is also used to indicate the price of a commodity. If one use the mark of another, to do him damage, an action on the case will lie, and an injunction may be obtained in Chancery. 2 Cro. 471.

Those who are unable to write sign a cross, for their mark, when they execute any document.

Markepenny, a penny anciently paid at the town of Maldon by those who had gutters laid or made out of their houses into the streets.—15 Edw. I.

Market [anciently written mercat, fr. mercatus, Lat.], a public time and appointed place of buying and selling; also purchase and sale. It differs from the forum, or market of antiquity, which was a public market-place on one side only, or during one part of the day only, the other sides being occupied by temples, theatres, courts of justice, and other public buildings.

A market can only be set up by virtue of a royal grant, or by long and immemorial usage, which presupposes a grant.

All contracts for anything vendible in fairs or markets overt are binding, if made according to the following rules:—(1) the sale must be in a place that is open, so that any one who passes by may see it, and that is proper for the sale of such goods; (2) it must be an actual sale for a valuable consideration; (3) the buyer must not know that the seller has a wrongful possession of the goods sold; (4) the sale must not be fraudulent between two to bar a third person of his right; (5) there must be a sale and a contract by persons able to contract; (6) the contract must be originally and wholly in the market overt; (7) toll ought to be paid where required by statute; (8) the sale ought not to be in the night, but between sun and sun; though, if the sale be made in the night, it may bind the parties.—5 Rep. 83. See 1 Step. Com. 671; ii., 53, 72, 537; and iii., 520.

Market, Court of Clerk of the, a tribunal incident to every fair and market in the kingdom, to punish misdemeanors therein; as a court of piedpoudre is to determine all disputes relating to private or civil property. The object of this, the most inferior criminal jurisdiction, is principally the recognisance of weights and measures, to try whether they be according to the true standard thereof or not, which standard was anciently committed to the custody of the bishop, who appointed some clerk under him to inspect the abuse of them more narrowly; and hence this officer, though usually a layman, is called the clerk of the market.

The 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63, has superseded his functions as regards weights and measures, and enacts that inspectors or examiners of weights and measures shall be appointed, who shall attend with the stamps and copies of the imperial standard weights in their custody at each of the several market towns, and examine and stamp, if found correct, such weights and measures as shall be brought to them for that purpose, and give, if required, a certificate of such stamping, and that it shall be lawful for any magistrate or authorized inspector, to enter, at all reasonable times, any shop or other place where goods are exposed for sale, in order to examine the weights and measures, and if found incorrect, such weights and measures shall be liable to be seized and forfeited, and the person in whose possession the same shall be found, or who shall obstruct such examination, shall be liable to a penalty of five pounds. See 4 Step. Com. 403.

Market geld, the toll of a market.

Market overt, an open market. See MARKET.

Market price. See VALUE.

Market towns, those towns which are entitled to hold markets.—1 Step. Com. 128.

Marketable, such things as may be sold; such for which a buyer may be found.

Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14.

Marketzeld. See MARKET GELD.

Marksman, a person who cannot write, and therefore makes his mark only in executing instruments, another writing his name opposite to such mark.

Marlebridge, Statute of, 52 Hen. III. A.D. 1267, enacted at Marlebridge, now said to be Marlborough. See Barr on Stat. 60; 2 Reeves, vii. 62; and Hale's Hist., note b.

Marque [fr. mearc, Sax.; signum, Lat.], a mark, a sign; reprisals. See LETTER OF MARQUE.

Marquis or Marquess [fr. marquis, Fr.; marchio, Lat.; margrave, Ger.], one of the second order of nobility, next in order to a duke. The first marquis was Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, whom Richard II. in the year 1386 made Marquis of Dublin. The first and last woman that was created a marquess was the lady Ann Bolein, and then the spelling marquess seems to have been considered a feminine term.

The general style of a marquis is 'most high and mighty prince,' and he is styled by the sovereign 'our right-trusty and entirely-beloved cousin.' His title is 'most honourable;' and his sons, by courtesy, are styled lords, and his daughters ladies.

The word, according to some authors, comes from the Marcomanni, an ancient people who inhabited the marshes of Brandenburgh. Others derive it from the German marche, limit; and others from marcisia, which, in the Celtic language, signifies a wing of cavalry. Nicod derives it from the corrupt Greek νομαρχία, a province. Alciat and Pauchet bring it from marc, a horse, taking a marquis to be properly an officer of horse. Menage derives it from marca, a frontier; and Selden, Krantzius, and Hottoman, do the same. Pasquier, from the old French marche, or from marchir, to confine, the guard of the frontiers being committed to them.—Encyc. Lond.

Marquisate, the seigniory of a marquis.

Marriage [fr. maritagium, low Lat.], a solemn contract, dictated by nature, and instituted by Providence, whereby a man is united to a woman for the lawful purposes of civilised society. The common law treats it as a civil contract, and deems it to be good and valid where it is entered into by persons willing and able to contract, and who actually do contract, according to the solemnities established by law. Each party must exercise free-will in entering into the contract, for it is the consent, and not the mere union of the parties, which constitutes the marriage. If either party to the marriage has not consented to it, or if the consent of either of them has been obtained by fraud, error, or duress, such marriage is absolutely void, although all the formalities required by law to constitute a valid marriage may have been observed. It follows that persons who have not sufficient mental capacity to enable them to consent, i. e. lunatics, idiots, and children, cannot contract a valid marriage. The marriage of a lunatic contracted during a lucid interval is good, unless a commission of lunacy has been taken out and remains unrevoked at the time of the marriage, when it is void by 15 Geo. II. c. 30.

The marriage of a child under seven years of age is a mere nullity. The age of consent is fourteen in males and twelve in females. If either of the parties are between the age of seven and the respective ages of fourteen and twelve, the marriage is not absolutely void, but inchoate or imperfect. It cannot be annulled until the party wishing to annul it has arrived at the age of consent. Either of them upon attaining that age may declare the marriage void; or upon their both attaining it they may agree to live together; in the former case a judicial dissolution would not be necessary, and in the latter another marriage ceremony would not be requisite. It is to be observed that a promise to marry in futuro is not binding, if the party be not twenty-one years of age; but where there are mutual promises to marry between two persons, one of whom is of the age of twenty-one, and the other under that age, the adult is bound by the promise, but the minor is not, and if the adult break the promise, the minor may maintain an action on the breach, in order to recover damages; but if the minor break the promise, no action can be maintained upon it by the adult.

The parties to a marriage must be able as well as willing to contract, i. e. they must not labor under any legal disability. The disabilities are:—

(1) A prior marriage undissolved, and the former husband or wife still living; a second marriage under such circumstances is absolutely void, and is punishable as a felony. See BIGAMY.

(2) Proximity of relationship, i. e. being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity.

Consanguinity comprehends those related to a person by blood; they are either of lineal or of collateral consanguinity; affinity comprehends those related by marriage.

Before the year 1835, marriages between the prohibited degrees were voidable but not absolutely void, i. e. if their validity was questioned during the lifetime of the parties, they would be pronounced void, but after the death of either party their validity could not be questioned, and they were treated as valid to all intents and purposes. But in 1835, the statute 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 54 came into operation, whereby it was enacted that all marriages celebrated between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity shall be absolutely void for all purposes whatever. The marriages which are now illegal in respect of proximity of degree are the following:—Those between persons in the ascending and descending lines, in infinitum. The ascending and descending lines form what is called lineal consanguinity, as, father, grandfather, great grandfather, and so upwards, in the direct ascending line, and son, grandson, great grandson, &c. in the direct descending line. Every generation, in lineal consanguinity, whether in the ascending or descending line, constitutes a degree, thus:—a man's father and his son are related to him in the first degree, his grandfather and grandson in the second, his great grandfather and great grandson in the third degree, and so on.

Marriages, also, between collaterals to the third degree inclusive, according to the mode of computation in the civil law, are prohibited. Collaterals are those who descend from a common ancestor, but do not ascend or descend from one another, as brothers, uncles, nephews, &c. A man's parents are counted as one degree in collaterals; his brothers and sisters, grandfather and grandmother, are in the second degree; and his uncles, aunts, nephews, and nieces, in the third degree. The prohibition as to collaterals extends not only to consanguinity, but also to affinity. Cousins-german, or first cousins, being in the fourth degree of collaterals, may marry; a nephew and great aunt, or a niece and great uncle, are also in the fourth degree, and may marry; and although a man may not marry his grandmother, he can, if he like, marry his grandmother's sister. But a man can marry neither his sister nor his wife's sister, for both are related to him in the second degree; nor his sister's daughter, nor wife's sister's daughter, for both are in the third degree. Though those of the consanguinity of the wife are always related by affinity to the husband, and vice versâ, yet those of the consanguinity of the husband are not at all necessarily related to those of the consanguinity of the wife; hence two brothers may marry two sisters, or father and son may marry mother and daughter. If a brother and sister marry two persons not related, and the brother and sister die, the widow and widower may intermarry, for, though a man is related to his wife's brother by affinity, he is not so to his wife's brother's wife, whom, if other circumstances will admit, it would not be unlawful for him to marry. These prohibitions extend to the relations of the half blood, as well as to the whole blood, and they also apply though one of the parties be a bastard; for though, as to many civil consequences a bastard is deemed nullius filius, the law recognises his relationship to his natural parents for moral purposes.

(3) Impotence or inability to consummate the marriage, arising from corporal defect or infirmity. In order to nullify the marriage the impotence must have existed at the time when it was solemnised, and must be incurable.

(4) The fraudulent suppression or alteration of the name of one or both of the parties in the publication of banns. A suit for nullity on this ground cannot be instituted by the person who was guilty of the fraudulent suppression or alteration against the other spouse, if he or she was not a party to it. If both were cognisant of it either may maintain the suit. If one only was cognisant of it the innocent party can take advantage of it. In the case of a marriage by license, however, the fraudulent suppression or alteration of a name does not invalidate the marriage. See Bevan f. c., M'Mahon v. M'Mahon, 2 Sw. & Tr. 230.

The 22nd section of the 4th Geo. IV. c. 76, enacts that 'if any person shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry in any other place than a church or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, without due publication of banns or license from a person having authority to grant the same first had and obtained, or shall knowingly and wilfully consent to or acquiesce in the solemnisation of marriage by any person not being in holy orders, the marriage of such persons shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.'

(5) After a marriage has been dissolved neither party can contract a second marriage until the time limited for an appeal against the decree of dissolution has expired without any appeal being presented, or until such appeal has been dismissed, or until in the result of such appeal the marriage has been declared to be dissolved (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 57). The time limited for an appeal is three months from the date of the decree, if Parliament be then sitting, or if Parliament be not sitting at the end of the three months then fourteen days next after its meeting. A second marriage contracted by a person whose first marriage had been dissolved within three months of the decree of dissolution, was pronounced null and void.—Chichester v. Mure, f. c. Chichester, 32 L. J. (P. M. & A.) 120.

The 7th Geo. IV. c. 76, directs that the consent of parents or guardians shall be obtained to the marriage of minors, but the marriage is not invalidated by the want of such consent. The consent required is either of the father, or, if the father be dead, then of a guardian lawfully appointed, if there be no guardian, then of the mother, being unmarried, and if there be no mother unmarried, then of any guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery. But where the person whose consent is required is non compos mentis, or where such person, being the guardian of the mother, is abroad, or the consent to a proper marriage is unreasonably, or from undue motives, withheld, the Lord Chancellor, upon petition, has power to give relief. If the marriage is by the publication of banns, and the party whose consent is required dissent from the marriage, he or she attends the church and states his objection immediately after the banns are published by the minister, who will request the attendance of the dissenting party in the vestry room after the conclusion of divine service, when the sufficiency of the objection will be decided upon by the minister; and if the objection be valid, the publication of the banns will be void; but if the objection be invalid, the marriage will be duly solemnised. If a marriage be about to be effected by license, and there is an objection to the same, the person whose consent is required enters a caveat against the granting a license with the master of the faculties, before whom a discussion will take place upon it, and he will decide the question according to his discretionary jurisdiction. It is to be observed, that if the minor be a widow or widower, no consent is necessary, since he or she would be then deemed emancipated.

In January 1858 the Divorce Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85) came into operation, and the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in England in respect of all suits and matters matrimonial, except so far as relates to the granting of marriage licenses, was transferred to the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. The Act also gave the court a jurisdiction to dissolve marriages and to deal with the property of persons whose marriage was dissolved, and with the custody of their children. Any husband may obtain a dissolution of his marriage upon proving to the satisfaction of the court that his wife has been guilty of adultery; and any wife may obtain a dissolution who can prove that her husband has been guilty of incestuous adultery, or of bigamy with adultery, or of rape, or of sodomy, or beastiality, or of adultery coupled with cruelty, or with desertion without reasonable excuse for two years and upwards (ss. 27 & 31). But if the petitioner has been accessory to or conniving at the adultery of the other party to the marriage, or has condoned the adultery complained of, or has presented or prosecuted the petition in collusion with the other parties to the suit, the court is bound to dismiss the petition (s. 30). And if the petitioner has been guilty of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting the petition, or of cruelty towards the other party to the marriage, or of having deserted or wilfully separated himself or herself from the other party before the adultery complained of and without reasonable excuse, or of such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the adultery, the court has a discretionary power either to pronounce or to refuse a decree (s. 31).

Divorces a mensâ et thoro are abolished by the Act, and judicial separations are substituted (ss. 6, 7). A sentence of judicial separation may be obtained either by a husband or wife on the ground of adultery, or cruelty, or desertion without cause for two years and upwards. A sentence of judicial separation has the same force and effect as a divorce a mensâ et thoro formerly had (ss. 7 & 16). It also places the wife in the position of a feme sole, with respect to property, from the date of the sentence, as long as the separation continues, and in the event of her dying intestate, her property is dealt with as if her husband were dead (s. 25). She is also considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contracts, wrongs, and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding (s. 26). Her husband is in no way liable for her contracts or torts, except in cases where he has neglected to obey an order for the payment of alimony to her when he is liable for necessaries (s. 26). See RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS; JACTITATION OF MARRIAGE.

The law respecting the jurisdiction of the courts of one country to determine the validity or invalidity of marriage contracts between subjects of another country, or between subjects of their own country who have been married abroad, and respecting their jurisdiction to dissolve such marriages, is so uncertain and unsettled that it is impossible to give a clear or correct summary of it. It may, however, be useful to direct attention to a few of the principal decisions since the passing of the Divorce Act. An English court has jurisdiction to inquire into and to determine the validity or invalidity of any marriage which has been solemnised in England. Thus, where two French persons came to this country for the purpose of evading the law of France, and were married here, and returned immediately after the marriage, and the marriage was held null and void by the French court, the English court held it to be valid.—Simonin v. Mallac, 2 Sw. & Tr. 67.

In a case where marriages were alleged to have taken place in Scotland and in Ireland, but the husband had never been domiciled in England, the court refused to entertain a petition for restitution of conjugal rights presented by the wife.—Yelverton v. Yelverton, 1 Sw. & Tr. 574.

In suits for dissolution by a husband, it is necessary to satisfy the court that the husband has a bonâ fide domicile in England at the time of the commencement of the suit.—Brodie v. Brodie, 2 Sw. & Tr. 259.

But in one case where it did not appear whether the husband's domicile was English or Irish, the court made a decree at the instance of the wife.—Bond v. Bond, 2 Sw. & Tr. 93.

In another case, where the husband and wife had abandoned their English domicile and settled in America, where the husband deserted the wife and contracted a marriage with another woman, the court dissolved the first marriage at the wife's prayer.—Deck v. Deck, 2 Sw. & Tr. 91.

Marriage was formerly treated as indissoluble, and the divorces pronounced by the Scotch and other foreign courts were not recognised by the English courts. The well-known case of R. v. Lolley, Russ. & Rep. 237, proceeded upon this principle. Subsequent decisions have, however, very much shaken its authority, and the question has never been raised since the passing of the Divorce Act, which, for the first time, rendered marriage dissoluble in England.

The ancient Greek legislators considered the relation of marriage as a matter not merely of private, but also of public or general interest. This was particularly the case at Sparta, where the subordination of private interests and happiness to the real or supposed exigencies of the state was strongly exemplified in the regulations on this subject. For instance, by the laws of Lycurgus, criminal proceedings might be taken against those who married too late (γραφὴ ὀψιγαμίου), or unsuitably (γραφὴ κακογαμίου), as well as against those who did not marry at all (γραφὴ ἀγαμίου). These regulations were founded on the generally recognised principle, that it was the duty of every citizen to raise up a strong and healthy progeny of legitimate children to the state. So entirely, in fact, did the Spartans consider the τεκνοποιΐα, or the production of children, as the main object of marriage, and an object which the state was bound to promote, that whenever a woman had no children by her own husband, she was not only allowed but even required by the laws to cohabit with another man.—Xen. de Rep. Lac. i. 8.

The consequences of marriage among the Romans were:—(1) The power of the father over the children of the marriage, which was a completely new relation, an effect indeed of marriage, but one which had no influence over the relation of the husband and wife. (2) The liabilities of either of the parties to the punishments affixed to the violation of the marriage union. (3) The relation of husband and wife with respect to property, to which head belong the matters of Dos, Donatio inter virum et uxorem, Donatio propter nuptios, &c. Many of these matters, however, are not necessary consequences of marriage, but the consequences of certain acts which are rendered possible by marriage. The Roman notion of marriage was that of a complete personal unity of the husband and wife (consortium omnis vitæ), as shown by a continuous cohabitation, the evidence of continuing consent; for the dissent of either party, when formally expressed, could dissolve the relation. Neither in the old Roman law, nor in its later modifications, was a community of property an essential part of the notion of marriages, unless we assume that, originally, all marriages were accompanied with the conventio in manum, for, in that case, the wife became filiæ-familias loco, and passed into the familia of her husband; or if her husband were in the power of his father, she became to her husband's father in the relation of a granddaughter. The legal deduction from this is, that her legal personality was merged in that of her husband, all her property passed to him by a universal succession (Gaius, ii. 96, 98); and she could not thenceforward acquire property for herself. Thus she was entirely removed from her former family as to her legal status, and became as the sister to her husband's children. In other words, when a woman came in manum, there was a blending of the matrimonial and the filial relation. The position of a Roman woman, after marriage, was very different from that of a Greek woman. The Roman presided over the whole household; she educated her children, watched over and preserved the honor of the house, and, as the mater-familias, she shared the honors and respect shown to her husband. Far from being confined, like the Greek women, to a distinct apartment, the Roman matron, at least during the better centuries of the republic, occupied the most important part of the house, the atrium.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Marriage among the Hebrews is a matter of strict obligation, for they understand literally, and as a precept, the words uttered to our first parents, Gen. i. 28.

Marriage Acts, 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 85, amended by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, 23 Vict. c. 24, and 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 27, 90.

The 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, directs that all the rules prescribed by the rubric, prefixed to the office of matrimony in the Book of Common Prayer, shall be duly observed, and prescribes, in conformity with the canons of the church, the previous publication of banns, or in lieu thereof, a license from the ecclesiastical authority to marry without banns. It also requires that the marriage shall be in a church or public chapel, wherein banns may be lawfully published, and shall take place between eight and twelve in the forenoon, except in the case of a special license, and be solemnised by a person in holy orders.

The 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 85, for the relief of Dissenters, which was amended by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72, has introduced new regulations, which provide that the officer called the superintendent registrar, appointed for every poor law union, parish, or place, under the 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, shall be the superintendent registrar of marriages therein, and has established two new modes of proceeding to celebrate marriage, in addition to those sanctioned by the former Marriage Act, viz., a marriage by the superintendent registrar's certificate, without license, or by his certificate with license.

Neither of these acts extend to the marriages of the royal family, nor to any marriage taking place out of England.

Marriage articles, an agreement in order to marriage; a stipulation between the parties, which is to be binding in case of marriage.

Marriage brokage, a consideration paid for contriving a marriage, and illegal as contrary to public policy.

Marriage consideration, the highest consideration recognised by law. A marriage consideration, in a settlement made prior to marriage, or in pursuance of articles entered into before marriage, runs through the whole settlement, as far as it relates to the husband and wife and issue, and protects them.

Marriage portion, the portion of one given in marriage.

Marriage Registry Act, the 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, amended by 1 Vict. c. 22. See BIRTHS, BURIALS, AND MARRIAGES.

Marriage settlement, a conventional arrangement usually made before marriage, and in consideration of it (which is the highest consideration known to the law), whereby a jointure is secured to the wife, and portions to children, in the event of the husband's death. If it be made after marriage, it will, as a general rule, be fraudulent and void against all persons who are creditors of the husband at the time of the settlement, unless such settlement contain a provision for debts, or is made in pursuance of articles made before marriage, or unless it be against a single debt, or the debt be secured by mortgage, in which case it would not affect the settlement, for to do that, it seems the party must be insolvent at the time.

These settlements seem to have been in use among the ancient Germans, and their kindred nation the Gauls. Of the former Tacitus gives us this account:—'Dotem non uxor marito, sed uxori maritus offert. Intersunt parentes et propinqui, ac munera probant.'—De Mor. Ger. c. xviii. And Cæsar has given us the terms of a marriage settlement among the Gauls, as nicely calculated as any modern jointure:—'Viri quantas pecunias ab uxoribus, dotis nomine, acceperunt; tantas ex suis bonis, æstimatione factâ, cum dotibus communicant. Hujus omnis pecuniæ conjunctim ratio habetur, fructusque servantur. Uter eorum vitâ superârit, ad eum pars utriusque, cum fructibus superiorum temporum, pervenit.'—De Bel. Gall. l. 6, c. xvii.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 45, the Divorce Court is empowered, in cases where a marriage has been dissolved, or a sentence of judicial separation has been pronounced on the ground of the wife's adultery, to order such settlement, as it shall think reasonable, to be made of any property to which the wife is entitled, either in possession or in reversion, or of any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party, and of the children of the marriage, or either or any of them. By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5, the court is empowered, after a final decree of nullity of marriage, or dissolution of marriage, has been pronounced, to inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and to make such orders, with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled, either for the benefit of the children of the marriage, or of their respective parents, as to the court shall seem fit.

Marrow, author of a famous book, written in the reign of Henry VII., and said to be still in manuscript, on the office of a justice of peace—a work which has been quoted by later writers, such as Fitzherbert and Lambard, with great commendation, and seems to have been followed by them on the subject.—4 Reeves, c. xxvii., p. 186.

Marshal, or Mareschal, primarily denotes an officer who has the care or command of horses. Nicod derives the word from polemarchus, master of the camp; Matthew Paris, from martis senescallus. In the old Gaulish language, march signified horse; whence mareschal might signify him who commanded the cavalry. Spelman, Skinner, and Menage derive it from the German maer, a horse, and schalk, servant, which makes some imagine the title was first given to farriers, or those who shod and bled horses; and that in time it passed to those who commanded them. There are several officers of this name, the chief of whom is the Earl Marshal of England, which see.

There are other inferior officers called marshals, who attend the judges on the assizes, and receive records for trials, &c. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 73, s. 7.

Marshal (Lord). See CHIVALRY, Court of.

Marshal of the Queen's Bench, an officer who had the custody of the Queen's Bench Prison. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, abolished this office, and substituted an officer, who is called Keeper of the Queen's Prison.

Marshalling, the act of arranging or of putting into proper order.

The doctrine of marshalling assets and securities depends upon the principle, that a person having two funds out of which to satisfy his demands, shall not, by his election, prejudice a person who has only one such fund. If, therefore, one who has a claim upon two funds, resorts to the only fund upon which another has a claim, the latter stands in his place for so much against the fund, to which otherwise he could not have access; the object being that every claimant shall be satisfied as far as, by any arrangement consistent with the nature of the several claims, the property which they seek to affect can be applied in satisfaction of such claims. This is in accordance with the great ethical maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas—so exercise your own right as not unnecessarily to defeat that of your neighbor.

The doctrine, as exercised in the administration of a deceased's assets, comprehends five different classes of persons:—

(1) Between creditors. Since freehold and copyhold estates have been rendered liable to simple contract debts, it is not now necessary to resort to this doctrine for the purpose of enforcing their payment.

(2) Between legatees. Where one or more legacies are charged upon real estate, and other legacies are not so charged, if the personal estate prove insufficient to pay them all, the legacies charged on the real estate shall be paid thereout; or if they have been paid out of the personal estate, the other legacies, as to so much thus paid thereout, shall stand in their place as a charge upon the land; but where the charge of a legacy upon real estate fails to affect it, in consequence of an event happening subsequently to the death of the testator, as the death of the legatee before the time of payment, equity will not marshal so as to turn such legacy upon the personal estate, in which case it would be vested and transmissible, whereas, as against the real, it would sink by the death of the legatee.

(3) Between creditors and legatees. Where there are specialty debts and legacies, and the real estate descends, if the creditors exhaust the personal estate the legatees stand in their place, and can come upon the real estate, against the heir-at-law. But if a testator devises his real estate, and gives general pecuniary legacies not charged on such real estate, and dies leaving specialty debts, and the specialty creditors exhaust the personal estate, the legatees shall not stand in their place and come on the realty, because it was the intention of the testator that the devisee should have the real estate as well as that the legatees should be paid. Nevertheless, where a mortgagee of a devised, as well as of a descended estate, has exhausted the personal assets by resorting to them in the first instance, a legatee shall stand in his place and be satisfied out of the mortgaged premises to the extent of the personalty applied in their exoneration; for the application of the personal assets in exoneration of the real estate mortgaged does not take place so as to defeat a legacy. A specific legatee will not be allowed to stand in the place of specialty creditors as against real estate devised, although the devisee be the heir. A devisee and a specific legatee must contribute pro ratâ to satisfy such specialty debts of a testator as his general personal estate is insufficient to pay. If land be devised for, or made subject to, the payment of debts, assets will be marshalled in favor of legatees who will stand in the place of the creditors who may have been satisfied out of the personal assets. Where simple contract creditors exhaust the personal assets, the legatees may stand in their place as to the real estate descended.

(4) Between legatees and vendors. Where a vendor, having a lien upon land for the unpaid purchase money, resorts to the personalty in the first instance for the realisation of his claim, the purchased estate, when it descends, and the personal assets will, as against the heir, be marshalled in favor of simple contract creditors and pecuniary legatees; but where the purchased estate is devised, then marshalment against the devisee will take place in favor of the simple contract creditors only, and not of legatees.

It is a general rule, that assets are not marshalled in favor of legacies given to charities. Thus, if a testator gives his real estate and personal estate, consisting of personalty savouring of realty, as leaseholds and mortgage securities, and also pure personalty, to trustees, upon trust to sell, and pay his debts and legacies, and bequeathed the residue to a charity, equity will not marshal the assets by throwing the debts and ordinary legacies upon the proceeds of the real estate, and the personalty savoring of the realty, in order to leave the pure personalty for the charity.

(5) Between widows and legatees. A widow's paraphernâlia (the necessary wearing apparel excepted) are liable to her deceased husband's debts; but a widow being preferred to a general legatee, she is entitled to marshal assets in those cases in which a general legatee would be entitled to do so, i. e. as against realty descended or devised, should it be subjected by the will to the payment of debts. If a devised estate be subject to a mortgage or other specific incumbrance, she will be entitled to marshal the assets as against the devisee, by throwing the charge upon the estate, since a legatee would have that right.

Where a person having two estates mortgages both to one mortgagee, and afterwards only one of such estates to a second mortgagee, who has no notice of the first mortgage, the court, in order to relieve the second mortgagee, has directed the first to take his satisfaction out of that estate only which is not in mortgage to the second mortgagee, if that be sufficient to satisfy the first mortgage, in order to make room for the second mortgage, even though the estates descended to two different persons. And if one of two estates in mortgage is subject to a portion, the person entitled to the portion may, if it be necessary, compel the mortgagee to resort to the other estate, so that the payment of the portion, as well as the mortgage, may be worked out. But this marshalling will not be enforced to the prejudice of a third party. The doctrine also has been carried to a great extent in bankruptices; 'for,' as observed by Lord Eldon, in Aldrich v. Cooper (8 Ves. 382, 1802), 'a mortgagee whose interest in the estate was affected by an extent of the Crown, has found his way, even in a question with the general creditors, to this relief, that he was held entitled to stand in the place of the Crown, as to those securities which he could not affect per directum, because the Crown affected those in pledge to him.' See 2 Tudor's Lead. Cas. 49–71.

Marshalling court-armour has now fallen into the hands of the heralds.

Marshalsea, Court of the, originally held before the steward and marshal of the royal house, and instituted to administer justice between the sovereign's domestic servants, that they might not be drawn into other courts, and thereby their service become lost. It held pleas of all trespasses committed within the verge of the court (twelve miles round the sovereign's residence), where only one of the parties was in the royal service (in which case the inquest was taken by a jury of the country); and of all debts, contracts, and covenants, where both of the contracting parties belonged to the royal household, and then the inquest was composed of men of the household only. But this court being ambulatory, Charles I. erected a new court of record, called the curia palatii or palace court, to be held before the steward of the household and knight marshal, and the steward of the court or his deputy, with jurisdiction to hold plea of all manner of personal actions whatsoever, which should arise between any parties within twelve miles of the royal palace at Whitehall, not including the city of London.

The court was held once a week for causes under 20*l.* together with the ancient Court of Marshalsea in the borough of Southwark, and a writ of error lay thence to the Court of Queen's Bench. Abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, s. 13.

Marshalsea Prison. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 7, this prison is consolidated with others, and denominated the Queen's Prison, which see.

Mart [contracted fr. market], a place of public traffic.

Martial, Courts, military and naval tribunals with jurisdiction over offences, committed by persons serving in the army, navy, or marines, against the articles of war, and the provisions of the Mutiny Act, the Naval Discipline Act, or the Marine Mutiny Act. Such persons are, however, amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil and criminal courts in respect of offences cognizable by those courts. See Simmons on Courts-martial, 30; Thring's Criminal Law of the Navy. As to the more speedy trial of a person subject to the Mutiny Act, who may be guilty of the murder or manslaughter of a person subject to that Act, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 65.

Martial law, that rule of action which is imposed by the military power; it has no place in the institutions of this country, unless the articles of war established under the mutiny acts be considered as of that character. The prerogative of proclaiming martial law within this kingdom is destroyed, as it would appear, by the Petition of Right.

Martinmas, the feast of St. Martin of Tours on the 11th November; commonly corrupted into martilmas or martlemas. It is the third of the four cross quarter-days of the year.

Martyria, a figure by rhetoric, by which the speaker brings his own experience in proof of what he advances.

Masagium, a messuage.

Masculine, relating to the male sex. A statute frequently declares that words in it which import the masculine gender shall be deemed to include females, unless there is something in the act inconsistent with such construction; and by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 21, s. 4, it is enacted that in all acts passed after the commencement of the next session, such words shall be deemed and taken to include females, unless the contrary is expressly provided.

Master [fr. meester, Dut.; maistre, Fr; magister, Lat.], a director; a governor; a teacher; one who has servants. It is a title given to several officers and persons of authority and command.

Master and Apprentice, a business relationship which should be constituted by deed, containing all proper and explicit stipulations. If the apprentice be under age, an adult person should covenant for his good conduct, because a minor cannot be sued for misconduct.

At Common Law a master has such an interest in the apprentice, that he may defend him with force, or maintain an action for any injury to him, whereby a loss of service accrues; he may also support an action for his detention. The master is entitled to all the apprentice's earnings, however considerable, in case he should wrongfully absent himself.

An apprentice may compel maintenance and enforce proper instruction; and magistrates or a Court of Equity will, in some cases, enforce a return of the premium, or a just proportion of it. Consult Chitty on Apprentices.

Master and Clerk. A clerk is a superior order of servant, and his duty is limited to the particular trade or employment for the service in which he is hired. If he be hired at specified yearly wages, he is to be considered as hired for an entire year, and the service cannot be put an end to before the end of an entire year, unless upon some adequate ground of misconduct by one of the parties. See Huttman v. Bullnois, 2 C. and P. 510; and Archard v. Homer, 3 C. and P. 349.

If a bond or covenant be taken from a surety for the faithful conduct of a clerk, it should be so framed as to continue to operate, notwithstanding any change in the firm or partners by death or other event, for otherwise it would cease to operate on the retiring or addition of a partner. And on behalf of a surety, it should be expressly provided that he shall be at liberty to withdraw his guarantee, upon giving a certain reasonable notice, for otherwise he might continue liable, notwithstanding notice of his desire to determine his liability, and notwithstanding a new security had been taken and the original hiring was only as long as the employer and the clerk should think fit. It should also be stipulated that the obligee or master shall, at stated periods, ascertain and communicate to the surety the state of the clerk's accounts, for, otherwise, it frequently happens that the master, confiding in the surety, lets the clerk proceed in his irregularities to a ruinous extent, and then sues the surety for the whole defalcation; and, unless it be expressly so stipulated, delay in examining the clerk's accounts, or any conduct short of stipulated indulgence, will not release a surety from liability even in equity.—5 B and Ald. 187. As to embezzlement by clerks, see EMBEZZLEMENT.

Masters in Chancery, officers of the High Court of Chancery. They were either ordinary or extraordinary. Abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c 80. See CHIEF CLERKS; COMMISSIONERS TO ADMINISTER OATHS IN CHANCERY; and TAXING MASTERS.

Masters of the Common Law Courts. There are five masters on the plea side of each of the courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer, and also in the Common Pleas. They are appointed by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 30, and their duties are to tax costs, compute damages, attend the judges in court, &c.—R. H. 32 Geo. III.; 4 T. R. 580, Q. B.; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 10.

Master of the Crown Office, the Queen's coroner and attorney in the criminal department of the Court of Queen's Bench, who prosecutes at the relation of some private person or common informer; the Crown being the nominal prosecutor.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 20. See CROWN OFFICE.

Master of the Faculties, an officer under the archbishop, who grants licenses and dispensations, &c.

Master of the Horse, the third great officer of the royal household, being next to the Lord Steward and Lord Chamberlain. He has the privilege of making use of any horses, footmen, or pages belonging to the royal stables.

Masters in Lunacy. See LUNACY, MASTERS IN.

Master of the Mint, an officer who receives bullion from goldsmiths for coinage, and pays them for it, and superintends everything belonging to the mint. He is usually called the warden of the mint.

Master of the Ordnance, a great officer, to whose care all the royal ordnance and artillery were committed.—39 Eliz. c. 7. But see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 117.

Master of Reports and Entries. This Chancery official is not to be continued after the next vacancy.—18 & 19 Vict. c. 134.

Master of the Rolls [magister rotulorum, Lat.] The chief of a body of officers called the Masters in Chancery, of whom there were eleven others, including the Accountant-General. He is judge of the equity court, which ranks next to that of the Lord Chancellor, and has the keeping of the rolls and grants which pass the Great Seal, and the records of the Chancery. All orders and decrees by him made, except such as by the course of the court are appropriated to the Great Seal alone, shall be deemed to be valid, subject, nevertheless, to be discharged or altered by the Lord Chancellor, and so as they shall not be enrolled till the same are signed by the Lord Chancellor.—3 Geo. II. c. 30. But by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 94, he is specially directed to hear motions, pleas, and demurrers, as well as causes generally.—5 Reeves, 160.

Master and Servant, a relation founded in convenience, whereby a person calls in the assistance of others, where his own skill and labor are not sufficient to carry out his own business or purpose.

Servants are of several descriptions:—'

1st. Servants in husbandry, termed laborers. These are placed, by virtue of several statutes, under the control of magistrates, who have power to regulate their hours of work and amount of wages, and of compelling the payment thereof in money and not in goods, and prescribing punishment for misconduct. Servants in husbandry are very generally hired by the year, as from Michaelmas to Michaelmas, and this is an entire hiring for a year; and, unless otherwise stipulated, no wages are payable until the end of the year. A master cannot, by way of correction, even moderately beat his servant or laborer in husbandry or otherwise, as he might his child or apprentice; and if he do, the servant may lawfully depart or obtain his discharge by application to a justice, and support an action for the battery.—5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 19. Consult Burn's Justice, tit. 'Servants.'

2nd. Servants in particular trades. These are also subject to the control of the magistrates, under several acts, some of them confined to particular trades, as the silk, cloth, woollen, linen, fustian, cotton, iron, leather, hat, lace, clock, paper, tailor, shoemaker, and other trades; and disputes between master and servants in husbandry, artificers, calico printers, handicraftsmen, miners, colliers, keelmen, pitmen, glass-blowers, and other laborers in general, are regulated by several more general acts. They will be found collected in Burn's Justice, tit. 'Servants.'

3rd. Menial or domestic servants. If no terms be stipulated, it is considered a hiring, with reference to the general understanding on the subject, that is, a continuing service, until the expiration of a month's warning given by either party. In the case of a domestic servant hired in the usual way, it appears to have been considered that he is entitled to his wages up to the time he actually serves, though he die or do not continue in the service the whole year, either for misconduct or otherwise, but not to any wages after the time of such discharge (6 T. R. 226). A master cannot, without express stipulation, deduct from the wages the value of articles broken or lost by a servant's want of care, however gross (4 Camp. 134). If a yearly servant be dismissed before the year expires, for misconduct which will justify his dismissal, he will not be entitled to any wages even for any part of the time during which he served (6 Car. and P. 15).

It is not legally compulsory on a master or mistress to give a discharged servant any character; and no action is sustainable for the refusal; but if a character be given, it must accord with the truth; for if a false good character be given, and the servant afterwards rob his new master, the person who gave such false character is liable to an action, and to compensate for the entire loss; and he is liable to punishment in certain cases of false character under 32 Geo. III. c. 56. And if a bad character be untruly and maliciously given, the party giving it will be liable to an action for defamation, though, until the untruth of the character given and express malice have been proved, the communication is presumed to have been privileged, and no action is sustainable (8 B. and C. 578).

A master is, in general, liable, civilly, and sometimes criminally, for torts committed by his servant in the course of or under color of his employ, but he is not liable for the wilful misfeasance of his servant, who has wholly lost sight of his duty (1 East, 106). As to embezzlement by servants, see EMBEZZLEMENT. As to the starving or ill-treatment of a servant by his master, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 26.

The offence of taking corn or other food by a servant from the possession of his master, contrary to his orders, for the purpose of giving the same to horses or other animals of such master, which was a felony at Common Law, is no longer a felony, but is punishable upon summary conviction by fine or imprisonment. See 26 & 27 Vict. c. 103.

Master of a ship [magister navis, Lat.], the person intrusted with the care and navigation of a ship, possessing what some foreign jurists have called the exercitatorial power over her. The master may delegate his power whenever it may be for the welfare of the ship and the due accomplishment of the voyage.

The master of a ship is the confidential servant or agent of the owners; and in conformity with the rules and maxims of the law of England, the owners are bound to the performance of every lawful contract made by him relative to the usual employment of the ship.

From this rule of law it follows that the owners are bound to answer for a breach of contract, though committed by the master or mariners against their will, and without their fault. Nor can the expediency of this rule be doubted. The owners. by selecting a person as master, hold him forth to the public as worthy of trust and confidence. And in order that this selection may be made with due care, and that all opportunities of fraud and collusion may be obviated, it is indispensable that they should be made responsible for his acts.

The master has power to hypothecate or pledge both ship and cargo for necessary repairs executed in foreign ports during the course of the voyage; but neither the ship nor cargo can be hypothecated for repairs executed at home.

The master has no lien upon the ship for his wages, nor for money advanced by him for stores or repairs.

The master is bound to employ his whole time and attention in the service of his employers, and is not at liberty to enter into any engagement for his own benefit that may occupy any portion of his time in other concerns; and therefore, if he do so, and the price of such engagement happen to be paid into the hands of his owners, they may retain the money, and he cannot recover from them.

During war, a master should be particularly attentive to the regulations as to sailing under convoy; for, besides his responsibility to his owners or freighters, he may be prosecuted by the Court of Admiralty, and fined in any sum not exceeding 500*l.* and imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, if he wilfully disobey the signals, instructions, or lawful commands of the commander of the convoy, or desert it without leave.

A penalty of 10*l.* in addition to the payment of the wages due is imposed on every master of a vessel who, having, on account of unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, left any seafaring man at any foreign port or place, shall neglect or refuse to deliver an account of the wages due to him, and to pay the same.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 209.

The law makes no distinction between carriers by land and carriers by water. The master of a merchant ship is, in the eye of the law, a carrier, and is as such bound to take reasonable and proper care of the goods committed to his charge, and to convey them to the place of their destination, the act of God and the Queen's enemies only being excepted. Every act which may be provided against by ordinary care renders the master responsible. He would not, for example, be liable for damage done to goods on board in consequence of a leak in the ship occasioned by the violence of a tempest, or other accident, but if the leak were occasioned by rats he would be liable, for these might have been exterminated by ordinary care, as by putting cats on board, &c. On the same principle, if the master run the ship in fair weather against a rock, or shallow, known to expert mariners, he is responsible. If any injury be done to the cargo by improper or careless stowage the master will be liable.—Abbott on Shipping, pt. 2 c. ii.; Maude and Pollock on Shipping, c. iii.; McCull. Comm. Dict.

Master of the Temple, the chief ecclesiastical minister of the Temple Church, London.

Masura, a decayed house; a wall; the ruins of a building; a certain quantity of lands, about four oxgangs.—Old Records.

Match-maker, one who contrives marriages.

Mate, the deputy of the master in a merchant ship, taking, in his absence, the command. There are sometimes only one, and sometimes two, three, or four mates in a merchantman, according to her size, denominated first, second, third, &c. mates. The law, however, recognises only two descriptions of persons in a merchantman—the master and mariners; the mates being included in the latter, and the captain being responsible for their proceedings.

In men-of-war the officers immediately subordinate to the captain are called lieutenants. But the master or officer whose peculiar duty it is to take charge of the navigation of the ship, has certain mates under him selected from the midshipmen. The boatswain, gunner, carpenter, &c. have each their mates or deputies taken from the crew.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Matelotage [fr. matelot, Fr.], the hire of a ship or boat.—Cole.

Mater-familias, the mother or mistress of a family.—Civ. Law.

Material evidence, evidence which tends to prove the affirmative or negative of a question in issue.

Matertera, a maternal aunt; the sister of one's mother.

Matertera magna, a great aunt.

Math, a mowing.

Mathematical evidence, proof established by a demonstration.

Matricide, slaughter of a mother.

Matricula, a register of the admission of officers and persons entered into any body or society, whereof a list is made; hence those who are admitted into our universities are said to be matriculated. The stamp-duties on matriculations at Oxford are repealed by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 36, s. 1; and at Cambridge by 21 Vict. c. 11. It is also a kind of alms-house.

Matrimonial causes, suits for the redress of injuries respecting the rights of marriage. They were formerly a branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but have been transferred to the jurisdiction of the court for divorce and matrimonial causes by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85.

They are either:—

(1) Causæ jactitationis matrimonii, a suit instituted when one of the parties boasts or gives out that he or she is married to the other, whereby a common reputation of their marriage may ensue. The party injured may petition the divorce court, which will enjoin a perpetual silence on that head.

(2) Restitution of conjugal rights. A suit brought when a husband or wife is guilty of the injury of living apart from the other without any sufficient reason. The court will compel them to come together again.

(3) Judicial separation, and (4) dissolution of marriage, which have superseded the divorces à mensâ et thoro, and à vinculo matrimonii. See MARRIAGE.

Matrimonial crown, a grant by which the husband of the Scottish queen acquired the right to assume the title of king, to have his name stamped upon the coin, and to sign all public instruments together with the queen. In such cases the subjects took an oath of allegiance to him; his authority became, in some measure, co-ordinate with that of the queen, and without his signature no public deeds seem to have been considered as valid.—Encyc. Lond.

Matrimonia debent esse libera.—(Marriages ought to be free).

Matrimonium, the inheritance descending to a man ex parte matris (from his mother).

Matrimonium subsequens tollit peccatum præcedens.—Jur. Civ.—(Subsequent marriage cures preceding criminality).

Matrimonium subsequens legitimos facit quoad sacerdotium, non quoad successionem, propter consuetudinem regni quæ se habet in contrarium. Co. Litt. 345.—(A subsequent marriage makes the children legitimate as far as relates to the priesthood, not as to the succession, on account of the custom of the kingdom, which is contrary thereto.)

Matrimony, marriage; the nuptial state; the contract of man and wife.

Matrina, a godmother.

Matrix Ecclesia, the mother-church.

Matron, a married woman; a mother of a family.

Matron of Queen's Prison. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, s. 22.

Matrons, Jury of. See JURY-WOMEN.

Matter in ley ne serra mise in boutche del jurors.—Jenk. Cent. 180.—(Matter of law shall not be put into the mouth of the jurors.)

Maturiora sunt vota mulierum quam virorum. 6 Co. 71.—(The desires of women are more mature than those of men.)

Maturity, the time when a bill of exchange or promissory note becomes due.

Maundy [fr. maund, Sax., an alms-basket] Thursday [dies mandati, Lat., the day of the command], the day preceding Good Friday, on which princes give alms.

Maxim [fr. maximum, Lat.], an axiom; a general principle; a leading truth.

Maxims of the law are holden for law; and all other cases that may be applied to them shall be taken for granted.—1 Inst. 11.

Maxima ita dicta quia maxima est ejus dignitas et certissima auctoritas, atque quod maximè omnibus probetur.—Co. Litt. 11.—(A maxim is so called because its dignity is greatest, and its authority the most certain, and because universally approved by all.)

Maximè paci sunt contraria vis et injuria. Co. Litt. 161.—(Force and injury are chiefly contrary to peace.)

Maximus erroris populus magister.—Bacon. (The people is the greatest master of error.)

Mayhem, the deprivation of a member proper for defence in fight, as an arm, leg, finger, eye, or a foretooth, and some others; yet not, as it has been said, a jawtooth, or the ear, or a nose, because they have been supposed to be of no use in fighting. One remarkable circumstance peculiar to an action for mayhem is, that the court may, on view of the wound, afterwards increase the damages awarded by the jury.—3 Salk. 115. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 18, 29, and 2 Step. Com. 487 & iv. 162.

Mayhemavit (he has maimed).

Maynooth, St. Patrick's College at. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 104.

Mayor [according to some etymologists this word was anciently written meyr, and comes fr. the British miret, to keep, or fr. the old English maier, power, and not from the Latin major]. The annual chief magistrate of a corporation, who, in London, York, and Dublin, is called Lord Mayor.

Mayors of corporations are justices of the peace pro tempore. Their powers and duties depend generally on the provisions of charters, corporate usages, or express enactments in Acts of Parliament.

The 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, substitutes a declaration in lieu of the sacramental test. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 31, which prevents elections taking place on Sundays. As to elections under the Municipal Act, consult the Act itself, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76. A mayor is to hold office until its acceptance by his successor, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 4. As to the re-election of mayor, see 3 & 4 Vict. c. 47; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89; and as to his appointing a deputy, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 79, ss. 7, 8.

Mayoralty, the office of a mayor.

Mayoress, the wife of a mayor.

Mead, or Meadow [fr. mæde, Sax.], ground somewhat watery, not ploughed, but covered with grass and flowers.—Encyc. Lond.

Meal-rent, a rent formerly paid in meal.—Phillips.

Mean, or Mesne [fr. medius, Lat.], a middle between two extremes, whether applied to persons, things, or time. See MESNE.

Mease [fr, messuagium, Lat.], a messuage or dwelling-house; also, half of a thousand.

Meason-due [corruption of maison de Dieu, Fr.], a house of God; a monastery; religious house or hospital.

Measure [fr. mensura, Lat.], that by which anything is measured; the rule by which anything is adjusted or proportioned.

The sovereign, as the arbiter of commerce, has the regulation of weights and measures. By 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, 6 Geo. IV. c. 12, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 72, repealing the former acts on the subject, standards are fixed for length, weight and capacity; and it is provided that all contracts for sale, by weight or measure, where no special agreement is made to the contrary, shall be taken to refer to the standards so established. It is also enacted, that all articles sold by weight shall be sold by avoirdupois weight, except gold, silver, platina, diamonds, or other precious stones, which may be sold by troy weight; and drugs which, when sold by retail, may be sold by apothecaries' weight, and further, that it shall be penal for any person to sell by measure of capacity, other than one of the imperial measures, or some multiple or aliquot part thereof.

Measure of value. In the ordinary sense of the word, measure would mean something by comparison with which we may ascertain what is the value of anything. When we consider further, that value itself is relative, and that two things are necessary to constitute it, independently of the third thing which is to measure it; we may define a measure of value to be something by comparing with which any two other things, we may infer their value in relation to one another.—2 Mill's Pol. Eco. 101.

Measurer, or Meter, an officer in the city of London, who measured woollen clothes, coals, &c. See ALNAGER.

Measuring money, a duty which some persons exacted, by letters-patent, for every piece of cloth made, besides alnage. It is abolished.

Mederia, a house or place where metheglin or mead was made.—Old Records.

Med-sceat, a bribe; hush money.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Medfee, a reward; a bribe; that which is given to boot.—Scott.

Mediæ et infimæ manus homines, men of a mean and base condition.—Blount.

Medianus homo, a man of middle fortune.

Mediate testimony, secondary evidence, which see.

Mediators of questions, six persons authorised by statute, who, upon any question arising among merchants, relating to unmerchantable wool, or undue packing, &c. might, before the mayor and officers of the staple, upon their oath, certify and settle the same; to whose order and determination therein the parties concerned were to give entire credence, and to submit.—27 Edw. III. st. 2, c. 24.

Medical Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, amended by 22 Vict. c. 21, 23 Vict. c. 7, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 66.

Medical jurisprudence, forensic medicine, which see.

Medical practitioner. By 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 89, it is provided, that whenever it shall appear to a coroner that a deceased was attended at his death, or during his last illness, by any legally qualified medical practitioner, he may issue his order for the attendance of such practitioner as a witness at the inquest; and where the deceased was not so attended, an order for the attendance of any legally qualified medical practitioner, being at the time in actual practice, in or near the place where the death happened; and the coroner may also direct the performance, by the medical witness or witnesses, of a post mortem examination, with or without an analysis of the contents of the stomach or intestines, provided, however, that if any person shall state, on oath, before the coroner, his belief that the death was caused entirely or in part by the improper or negligent treatment of any person, such person shall not be allowed to perform or assist at the post mortem examination. It is also enacted, that where it shall appear to the majority of the jury that the cause of death has not been satisfactorily explained by the witnesses in the first instance, they may name to the coroner, in writing, any other legally qualified practitioner or practitioners, and require their attendance as witnesses, or for the performance of a post mortem examination, whether one shall have been previously performed or not. And further, that all such medical witnesses shall be allowed remuneration for their attendance and trouble, and on the other hand shall forfeit 5*l.* for every neglect to obey an order for their attendance, with a proviso, however, that when the death took place in any public hospital or infirmary, or any county or lunatic asylum, no such remuneration shall be allowed to any person whose duty it was to attend the deceased as a medical officer of such institution. As to medical relief to paupers, see 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 54.

For some valuable hints as to the conduct of medical witnesses, consult Beck's Med. Jurisp. tit. 'Medical Evidence.'

Medico-legal [medico-legalis, Lat.], relating to legal medicine.

Medietas linguæ. See DE MEDIETATE LINGUÆ.

Medio acquietando, a judicial writ to distrain a lord for the acquitting of a mesne lord from a rent, which he had acknowledged in court not to belong to him.—Reg. Jur. 129.

Meditatio fugæ, an intention of flight.—Scotch phrase.

Medlefe, Medleta, Medletum [fr. mêler, Fr., to meddle], a sudden scolding at and beating one another.—Bract. l, 3, c. xxxv.

Medsypp, a harvest supper or entertainment given to laborers at harvest home.—Cowel.

Meeting-house Act, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45.

Megbote, a recompense for the murder of a relation.—Saxon word.

Meigne, or Maisnader, a family.

Meiny, Meine, or Meinie, the royal household; a retinue.

Meldfeoh, the recompense due and given to him who made discovery of any breach of penal laws committed by another person, called the promoter's (i. e. informer's) fee.—Leg. Mæ. c. xx.

Melieur serra prize pour le roy.—Jenk. Cent. 192.—(The best shall be taken for the king.)

Melior dabit nomen rei.—Bacon—(The better will give a name to a thing.)

Melior est justitia verè præveniens, quam severè puniens.—3 Inst. Epil.—(Justice truly preventing is better than severely punishing.)

Melior est conditio possidentis, et rei quam actoris.—4 Inst. 180.—(The condition of the possessor is the better, and the condition of the defendant than that of the plaintiff.)

Melior est conditio possidentis ubi neuter jus habet.—Jenk. Cent. 118.—(The condition of the possessor is the better where neither of the two has a right.)

Meliorations, improvements, betterments.—Scotch term.

Meliorem conditionem ecclesiæ suæ facere potest prælatus deteriorem nequaquam.—Co. Litt. 101.—(A bishop can make the condition of his own church better, but by no means worse.)

Meliorem conditionem suam facere potest minor, deteriorem nequaquam.—Co. Litt. 337. (A minor can make his own condition better, but by no means worse.)

Melius est omnia mala pati quam malo consentire.—3 Inst. 23.—(It is better to suffer every ill than to consent to ill.)

Melius est recurrere quam malè currere.—4 Inst. 176.—(It is better to recede than to proceed badly.)

Melius est in tempore occurrere, quam post causam vulneratam remedium quærere.—2 Inst. 299.—(It is better to restrain in time than to seek a remedy after injury inflicted.)

Melius inquirendum, a writ that lay for a second inquiry, where partial dealing was suspected; and particularly of what lands or tenements a man died seised, on finding an office for the king.—F. N. B. 255.

Members, places where a custom-house has been kept of old time, with officers or deputies in attendance. They are lawful places of exportation or importation.

Members of Parliament. See HOUSE OF LORDS and HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Membrum, a slip or small piece of land.

Membrum pro membro (limb for limb), an obsolete law of retaliation.

Memorandum in error, a document alleging error in fact, accompanied by an affidavit of such matter of fact.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 158.

Memorial, that which contains the particulars of a deed, &c., and is the instrument registered, as in the case of an annuity, which must be registered.

Memory, time of legal. By Statute Westminster the First, 3 Edw. I. A.D. 1276, the time of memory was limited to the reign of Richard I. July 6, 1189. But see the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71.

Menace, a threat.

Men of straw. 'We have all heard of a race of men who used in former days to ply about our own courts of law, and who, from their manner of making known their occupation (i. e. by a straw in one of their shoes), were recognised by the name of straw-shoes. An advocate or lawyer who wanted a convenient witness, knew by these signs where to find one, and the colloquy between the parties was brief. "Do n't you remember?" said the advocate (the party looked at the fee, and gave no sign; but the fee increased, and the powers of memory increased with it)—"To be sure I do." "Then come into court and swear it!" And straw-shoes went into court and swore it. Athens abounded in straw-shoes.'—Quart. Rev. xxxiii. 344.

Mental alienation, insanity.

It was remarked some years back by Esquirol, that insanity belongs almost exclusively to civilized nations. That it should do so is an inference which we might almost draw à priori. In a savage state the mind is uncultivated, its reasoning powers undeveloped, and consequently free from the various exciting causes which are perpetually operating on highly cultivated minds. In civilized life we may be said to beat out or expand our brains, and thus expose a more extended surface to the action of external causes than those who are actuated only by the ordinary excitements of the natural wants and appetencies. Dr. Livingstone's black servant became insane at the sight of a ship! Dr. Prichard is disposed to think that congenital predisposition, so powerful a cause of insanity in civilized life, is wanting in the uncivilized state; and it is not going too far to suppose that as we see in refined states of society varieties of structure created, morbid varieties of organisation may be increased or multiplied. There are many diseases, constitutional in civilized life, wholly unknown in the savage state.

'Some writers,' says Foville, 'have endeavoured to turn altogether from the investigation of the material organic cause of madness, resting on the belief that this is not a physical or material disease, but rather a disease of the soul.

'This extraordinary proposition is evidently an absurd profession of materialism; is it not in fact to deprive the soul of its most noble attributes, to degrade and debase it to the level of matter, to suppose it susceptible of alteration?

'The soul should be a stranger to our researches; but considering the brain as the material instrument of its manifestation, as the organ of intelligence, we seek in this organ the cause of the derangement which occurs in its functions.'

Pinel placed the primary seat of insanity in the stomach and intestines, from which he supposed it radiated, and ultimately deranged the understanding; he afterwards, however, was inclined to give up all hope of ever being able to account for it by pathological appearances.

It is one of those metaphysical subtleties, so prevalent on the subject of insanity, that the acts of an insane mind are involuntary. It certainly can be of little practical consequence what epithet is applied to the acts of a mind admitted to be insane; though it seems to be an abuse of language to call any act involuntary which proceeds from a person's own free will. The exercise of the will may be greatly influenced by the condition of the mind, even to such an extent as to deprive a person of all criminal responsibility. But this does not necessarily prove insanity, unless, for instance, every man who commits a criminal act under the influence of strong passions is considered as insane. The objection to this distinction is, that it is used as a test in the decision of doubtful cases, every one being left to decide as he pleases what acts are voluntary, and what involuntary.

Before an individual can be accounted sane on a particular subject, it must appear that he regards it correctly, in all its relations to right and wrong. The slightest acquaintance with the insane will convince anyone of the truth of this position. In no school of logic, in no assembly of the just, can we listen to closer and shrewder argumentation, to warmer exhortations to duty, to more glowing descriptions of the beauty of virtue, or more indignant denunciations of evil doings than in the hospitals and asylums for the insane. And yet many of these very people may make no secret of entertaining notions utterly subversive of all moral propriety; and, perhaps, are only waiting a favorable opportunity to execute some project of wild and cruel violence. The purest minds cannot express greater horror and loathing of various crimes than madmen often do, and from precisely the same causes. Their abstract conceptions of crime, not being perverted by the influence of disease, present its hideous outlines as strongly defined as they ever were in the healthiest condition; and the disapprobation they express at the sight arises from sincere and honest convictions. The particular criminal act, however, becomes divorced in their minds from its relations to crime in the abstract; and, being regarded only in connexion with some favorite object, which it may help to obtain, and which they see no reason to refrain from pursuing, is viewed, in fact, as of a highly laudable and meritorious nature. Herein, then, consists their insanity, not in preferring vice to virtue, in applauding crime and ridiculing justice, but in being unable to discern the essential identity of nature between a particular crime and all other crimes, whereby they are led to approve what, in general terms, they have already condemned.

It is a fact not calculated to increase our faith in the march of intellect, that the very trait peculiarly characteristic of insanity has been seized upon as conclusive proof of sanity in doubtful cases; and thus the infirmity that entitles one to protection is tortured into a good and sufficient reason for completing his ruin.—Ray.

The preposterous distinction between civil and criminal cases gives rise in practice to one of the most curious and startling inconsistencies that human legislation ever presented. While the mental impairment is yet slight, comparatively, and the patient is quiet and peaceable, the law considers him incapable of managing himself or his worldly affairs, and provides him with a guardian and a place in the wards of an hospital; but when the disorder has proceeded to such a height as to deprive the maniac of all moral restraint, and precipitate him on some deed of violence, he is to be considered as most capable of perceiving moral distinctions, and consequently most responsible for his actions.

Jurists, who have been so anxious to obtain some definition of insanity, which shall embrace every possible case, should understand that such a wish is chimerical from the very nature of things. Insanity is a disease, and, as is the case with all other diseases, the fact of its existence is never established by a single diagnostic symptom, but by the whole body of symptoms, no particular one of which is present in every case. To distinguish the manifestations of health from those of disease requires the exercise of learning and judgment; and, if no one doubts this proposition, when stated in reference to the bowels, the lungs, the heart, the liver, the kidneys, &c., what sufficient or even plausible reason is there why it should be doubted when predicated of the brain? The functions of those organs proceed with the regularity and sameness of clockwork, compared with the ever-varying and unequal phenomena of this, and yet there are persons—who assume a magisterial tone in writing or talking of the latter—who would defer to a tyro's judgment in whatever concerns the others. If, when anxious to know all we can, respecting a disease of the lungs or stomach, we repair to those who have a high and well-founded reputation in the pathology of those parts, why adopt the converse of this rule in regard to diseases of the brain? No reasonable person would desire to set up an insuperable barrier between the domain of professional knowledge and that of common sense and common information; but it is not too much to insist that facts, established by men of undoubted competence and good faith, should be rejected for better reasons than the charge of 'groundless theory.'—Ray, 46.

It is a curious fact, that many benevolent people in their desire to palliate the sins of criminals have inculcated the same principle which Lord Hale entertained, viz., that all crime is the offspring of partial insanity, for the purpose of drawing from it a very different inference. Hale's inference was that partial insanity furnishes no excuse for crime. The logic by which such opposite conclusions are arrived at is certainly not unworthy the days of Dun Scotus or Thomas Aquinas. Says the latter: Crime must be punished; but all crime proceeds from madness, therefore madness furnishes no exemption from punishment. Says the former: Madmen are not responsible for their criminal acts; but madness is the source of all crime, therefore, madmen and criminals are equally irresponsible and exempt from punishment. Which of these two precious specimens of human subtlety can claim the triumph of absurdity it would not be easy to determine.—Ray on Insanity, 47.

There is one operation of the common law which is justly a cause of complaint, namely, that by which lunatics, even when under guardianship, are subject to be imprisoned like others, in default of satisfying a civil execution obtained against them; because whether such imprisonment be considered as a penal or a merely coercive measure, it is altogether inapplicable to the insane. It cannot coerce one who has no control over his own property, and whose mental condition is supposed to be such that he is unable to see any relation between the means and the end; and to punish a person for what he himself had no agency whatever in doing is a violation of the first principles of justice. To incarcerate some madmen in a common gaol would, in all probability, aggravate their disorder, and if the confinement were protracted to the extent which the law would allow, render it utterly incurable.

All our knowledge of human nature, all our experience of the past, forces us to the conclusion that the presence of mental alienation should be admitted in him who commits a crime without positive interest, without criminal motives, and without a reasonable passion.

The subject was thus classified by Esquirol, at least, in its main features:—

(1) Mania, an hallucination which extends to all kinds of objects, accompanied with excitement.

(2) Monomania, confined to a single or a small number of objects.

(3) Dementia, an incapacity of reasoning in consequence of functional disorder of the brain, not congenital.

Dementia appears under two different degrees of severity, which are designated as acute and chronic.

(4) Idiotism, congenital, from original malconformation in the organ of thought. In some countries this melancholy disease is not uncommon, and it has been particularly remarked in the Valais in Switzerland and Carinthia. In the former country the subjects of it are styled Cretins.

The most striking physical trait of idiocy, and one seldom wanting, is the diminutive size of the head, particularly of the anterior-superior portions, indicating a deficiency of the anterior lobes of the brain. Its circumference, measured immediately over the orbital arch and the most prominent part of the occipital bone, is fixed by Gall, whose observations on this subject are entitled to great confidence, at between $11\frac{1}{3}$ and $14\frac{1}{2}$ inches.—Sur les Fonctions, 329. The brain consequently equals that of a new-born infant; that is, about one-fourth, one-fifth, or one-sixth of the cerebral mass of an adult in the full enjoyment of his faculties.

In imbecility the development of the moral and intellectual powers is arrested at an early period of existence. It differs from idiocy, in the circumstance that while in the latter there is an utter destitution of everything like reason, the subjects of the former possess some intellectual capacity, though infinitely less than is possessed by the great mass of mankind.

Mental deficiency is manifested under two different forms, which Hoffbauer designates by the terms imbecility (blödmus) and stupidity (dummheit). The former consists in a defect of the intensity, the latter in a defect of the extensity, necessary to a sound and healthy mind. By intensity is meant the power of the mind to examine the data presented to it by the senses, and therefrom to deduce correct judgments; by its extensity, the mind perceives and embraces these data, and suffers none to escape—one, it may be added, is the reflective, the other the perceptive power.

Hoffbauer, while he acknowledges the various and almost imperceptible shades of difference between one case of imbecility and another, has reduced its numberless gradations to five degrees, and those of stupidity to three. To them, as described and explained by him, he looks for the means of a consistent and rational application of the legal principles that should regulate their civil and criminal relation. It hardly needs, however, the high authority of Esquirol to convince us, that these distinctions are drawn with a minuteness and show of accuracy that savours more of the labors of the closet than of the rigid and faithful observation of nature.

(5) Moral Insanity, i. e. a morbid perversion of the natural feelings, affections, inclinations, temper, habits, and moral dispositions, without any notable lesion of the intellect, or knowing and reasoning faculties, and particularly without any maniacal hallucination. Consult the interesting paper on insanity, by Dr. Prichard, in Cyc. of Prac. Med. The result of this species is various. In many it displays itself in an irresistible propensity to commit murder (homicidal monomania), in others to commit theft (kleptomania); while some are impelled to set fire to buildings, often of the most venerable description (pyromania). Their whole moral character is changed: the pious become impious; the liberal, penurious; the drunken, sober.

On the subject of homicidal monomania, M. Esquirol has made some excellent and practical remarks. He divides the subjects of this form of insanity into three classes:—

In the first group, the individuals who have the desire to kill are incited by motives more or less chimerical; more or less contrary to reason: their insanity is obvious to everyone.

In the second group, the homicidal monomaniacs have no known motives, either imaginary or real; the unfortunate individuals who enter into this group being hurried on by a blind impulse, which they strive to resist, and so escape their destructive propensities.

In the third group, the impulse is sudden, instantaneous, devoid of anything like reflection, and stronger than the will; the act is committed without any motive whatever, and on some beloved objects.

These individuals now under consideration essentially differ from criminals, with whom they have been confounded, and whose punishment they have been made to suffer.

Monomaniacal homicides are isolated, without accomplices to excite them by advice or example. Criminals, on the contrary, generally have immoral comrades, and accomplices aiding and assisting them.

The doctrine of moral insanity has been as yet unfavorably received by judicial authorities, not certainly for want of sufficient facts to support it, but probably from that common tendency of the mind to resist innovations upon old and generally received views.

'If,' observes Dr. Ray, 'a quarter of a century ago, one of the highest law officers of Great Britain pronounced the manifestation of "systematic correctness" of an action a proof of sanity sufficient to render all others unnecessary, it is not surprising that the idea of moral insanity has been considered by the legal profession as having sprang from the teeming brains of medical theorists. In the fulness of this spirit, Mr. Chitty (Med. Jurisp. 352), declares, that "unless a jury should be satisfied that the mental faculties have been perverted, or, at least, the faculties of reason and judgment, it is believed that the party subject to such a moral insanity, as it is termed, would not be protected from criminal punishment;" and in the trial of Howison, for the murder of the widow Geddes, at King's Cramond, Scotland, some few years since, moral insanity, which was pleaded in his defence, was declared by the court to be a "groundless theory." Such opinions, from quarters where a modest teachableness would have been more becoming than an arrogant contempt for the results of other men's inquiries, involuntarily suggest to the mind a comparison of their authors with the saintly persecutors of Galileo, who resolved by solemn statutes that nature always had operated, and always should operate, in accordance with their views of propriety and truth.'—Med. Jurisp. of Insanity, 45.

(5) Demonomania, a variety of melancholy arising from mistaken ideas on religious subjects.

(6) Nymphomania, or furor uterinus, a raving mania of females, connected with a disorder of the generative organs.

As to feigned and concealed insanity, see SIMULATED INSANITY.

The various diseases included in the general term insanity, or mental derangement, have been thus arranged by Dr. Ray (Med. Jurisp. of Insanity), under two divisions founded on two very different conditions of the brain:—

- INSANITY.
  - Defective development of the faculties
    - Idiocy
      - (1.) Resulting from Congenital defect.
      - (2.) Resulting from an obstacle to the development of the faculties supervening in infancy.
    - Imbecility
      - (1.) Resulting from congenital defect.
      - (2.) Resulting from an obstacle to the development of the faculties supervening in infancy.
  - Lesion of the faculties subsequent to their development.
    - Mania
      - Intellectual
        - (1.) General.
        - (2.) Partial.
      - Affective
        - (1.) General.
        - (2.) Partial.
    - Dementia
      - (1.) Consecutive to mania or injuries of the brain,
      - (2.) Senile, peculiar to old age.

Medical jurists treat of inferior degrees of diseased minds; as the delirium of fever resembling mania; hypochondriasis, like to melancholy; hallucination, i. e. an idea reproduced by the memory, associated and embodied by the imagination; epilepsy, tending to dementia; nostalgia, a form of melancholy originating in despair, from being separated from one's native country; intoxication, producing delirium tremens, and the dementia of old age.

'If a party impeach the validity of a will on account of a supposed incapacity of mind in the testator, it will be incumbent on him to establish such incapacity by the clearest and most satisfactory proofs. The burden of proof rests upon the person attempting to invalidate what, on its face, purports to be a legal act. Sanity must be presumed till the contrary is shown.'—Williams on Executors, pt. 1, bk. 2, c. i., sec. 1. If it can be established that a person habitually affected by a malady of the mind has intermissions, and if there was an intermission of the disorder at the time of the act, that being proved is sufficient, and the general habitual insanity will not affect it; but the effect of it is this, it inverts the order of proof and of presumption; for until proof of an habitual insanity is made, the presumption is that the person, like all human creatures, was rational; but where an habitual insanity in the mind of the person who does the act is established, there the party, who would take advantage of an interval of reason, must prove it.—Sir W. Wynn, in Cartwright v. Cartwright, 1 Phill. 100. A will cannot be set aside on the ground that it is inofficious, i. e. not consonant with the testator's natural affection and moral duties, but where the capacity is doubtful the omission, without sufficient reason, of children or relations, or persons who have a claim upon his bounty, is evidence tending to prove incapacity. It is also strong evidence of incapacity that a will is not consistent or coherent one part with another, or that it is not in accordance with instructions given or declarations made at a previous time, when the testator was unquestionably sound in mind. If the mind of the testator is free from delusion, and if at the time of executing the will he is aware of its contents and is able to remember the different persons who have claims upon his bounty, and to understand the effect of the dispositions contained in the will, he has sufficient capacity to make a good will.

The insane are disqualified from appearing as witnesses in courts of justice, their incompetence being inferred from their mental unsoundness. The fact of incompetence to testify, however, is not necessarily connected with that of insanity, and it would be far more correct to consider the former an independent fact to be established by a distinct order of proofs. The practice of including an act of testifying with that of performing business-contracts, or other civil acts, is certainly not favored by the present state of our knowledge of insanity, nor does it approve itself to the common sense of mankind.

The higher degrees of imbecility must of course disqualify a witness, but its less aggravated forms may not, under all circumstances, have this effect.

'Of an insane person,' says Evans (2 Pothier on Obligations, app. 259), 'it might, for defect of other evidence, merit to be considered whether, in civil cases at least, the testimony of such might not be admissible upon points where his understanding did not appear to be subject to disturbance; it being well known that in many of these melancholy instances, especially when the result of some violent passion, the party affected is entirely cool, clear, and collected in his ideas, and as free as other persons from the delusions of a perverted imagination, in everything not connected with the cause of his insanity; with regard to persons who have only temporary fits of madness (those usually termed lunacy), and at other times are in all respects sound of reason, these are then considered as capable of testimony as of any other legal act.'

On the whole, we may conclude, with Georget, 'that it is necessary to know the patient, the character of his madness, his customary relations to surrounding objects, before we can know what degree of confidence to place in his assertions.'

The competence of old men, in the early stages of dementia, to testify, is a point frequently discussed in courts of justice, and the want is severely felt of some fixed principles that shall serve as a guide to correct decisions. In every stage of this affection the impairment of the memory is more perceptible in regard to recent than remote impressions; and it often happens that a person may have a distinct recollection of things that occurred in his youth, while those of a month's or a year's date are but imperfectly remembered, if at all. To test the strength of his memory respecting certain things, it is only necessary to ascertain if he remember various other transactions of about the same date in which he was known to have been engaged. If he can do this, it is a strong presumption in favor of his competency, if not, it is incumbent on the party offering his testimony to show why his memory should have been more faithful in the one case than the other. This is rendered still more necessary by the fact, that the weakness of mind incident to this condition makes its subjects more easily swayed by the suggestions of others, and leads them to believe that they remember what they are told they ought to remember, or what they are assured they actually did remember till within a recent period. The slightest examination will show how much dependence can be placed on their recollections of recent events. Consult Ray's Med. Jurisp. of Insanity; Beck's Med. Jurisp. tit. 'Mental Alienation;' and Uwins on Mental Disorders.

Merger [fr. mergo, Lat., to destroy], an annihilation, by act of law, of a particular in an expectant estate consequent upon their union in the same person—thus accelerating into possession the expectant which swallows up the particular estate.

It is the drowning of one estate in another, and differs from suspension, which is but a partial extinguishment for a time; while extinguishment, properly so termed, is the destruction of a collateral thing in the subject itself out of which it is derived.

The doctrine of merger probably results from the maxim—nemo potest esse dominus et tenens; or perhaps from the inconsistency, but for it, of one person owning two estates in fact, whilst one of them, in law, includes the time or duration of both.

'Perhaps,' remarks Preston (3 Conv. p. 22), 'the rule that nemo potest esse dominus et tenens does not clearly, and beyond all controversy, furnish a principle to which the learning can be exclusively referred; yet of all other rules none affords principles to which the cases on merger bear a nearer affinity.'

When the same person has the legal estate in the fee, and is also entitled to the trust or beneficial ownership of that estate, the trust will merge in the legal ownership, but, on the other hand, the legal estate can never be extincted in the equitable ownership.

Merger is either absolute or qualified, for as we shall presently see, an estate as against one person may be extinguished, whilst as against another it may still have existence.

In order to effect a merger, the following circumstances must concur:—

(1) There must of necessity be two estates at least in the same property, or in the same part of the same property, which must vest in the same person.

Merger, however, will operate between three or more estates, as well as between two.

(2) The several estates must be immediately expectant upon each other; the more remote estate must be without any intervening vested estate or contingent remainder created in the same instant of time and by the same means, which originated the other estates; and the determination or acquisition of an intermediate estate may be the cause of merger, as between estates kept distinct by means of such intermediate estate.

(3) The estate in reversion or remainder must be larger than the preceding estate, for there cannot be a merger as between equal estates of freehold.

With regard to the merger of terms for years in each other, the following propositions may be advanced:—

A term of years derived by way of underlease from a term of years, will merge on the two terms becoming possessed by one and the same person.

An estate for years may also merge in another estate in reversion of the same denomination, and it does not make any difference, whether the reversion is for a longer or shorter period of time than the former or preceding term; therefore, a term in possession, though for a hundred years, will be annihilated by its union with the term in reversion though for two years only. With a view, then, to the doctrine of merger, every term of years is equally extensive in quality at least.

The merger of a longer term in one of shorter duration may be accounted for on the ground that it is merely a relinquishment of the tenancy or rather possession to the person who has the immediate reversion, or, perhaps, remainder.

It is to be observed that both terms must be vested in interest to operate a merger of one of them. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112.

(4) The several estates must be held in the same legal right; or, when the estates are held in different legal rights, one of them must not be an accession to the other, merely by the operation of law.

The proposition insisted on by some text-writers, that the two estates must come to one and the same person in one and the same right is not tenable, for it is clear that if a husband, possessed in right of his wife, purchase the reversion or remainder, or if an executor have a term in his testator's right, and purchase the reversion, in either instance the term will merge, and yet the husband or executor has the term in one right, and the fee in another. The ground, however, of these cases is that the reversion or remainder was acquired by the party by his own act.

The grand effect of merger is, as between the particular tenant, whose estate is annihilated, and the reversioner or remainder-man, to bring the reversion or remainder into the same place and condition, as if the particular estate had never existed, or had determined by completing the period of its duration; nevertheless the particular estate is, for all the purposes of title, to be treated as still subsisting and continuing; and all charges, by way of rent, annuity, underlease, or judgment, are preserved in like manner and for the same time as if such extinguished particular estate were in fact in existence, so that the accelerated reversion or remainder is subjected as well to its own peculiar incumbrances as to the charges upon the merged estate, quoad its originally destined endurance. And see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 9.

It is to be particularly remarked, that where a tenant-in-tail, whether in possession or not, with remainder or reversion to B. in fee, there being a protector of the settlement, makes an assurance by virtue of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, which, by reason of the non-consent of the protector, is insufficient to bar the remainder or reversion, such assurance bars the issue in tail, and acquires a fee determinable on failure of such issue, but does not divest or displace the remainder or reversion, which, therefore, continues to subsist as an estate, expectant on the determinable fee. If, by any means, the remainder or reversion of B. become afterwards vested in A. the determinable fee does not merge in the remainder or reversion, as upon ordinary principles it would have done, but, by the express provisions of the act, is enlarged, and A. has thenceforth a clear fee-simple, founded, in point of title, upon the estate-tail.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 39.

Owners of both lands and tithes, even tenants for life, are empowered to merge tithes in the lands.—6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 71, ss. 71, 81, &c.

When an engagement has been made by simple contract, and then the same engagement is made by deed, the simple contract is merged and extinguished in the deed.

Merger, in criminal law, is abolished by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 12.

Meritò beneficium legis amittit, qui legem ipsam subvertere intendit.—2 Inst. 53.—(He justly loses the benefit of law who purposes to overturn the law itself.)

Meritorious consideration, one founded upon some moral obligation; a valuable consideration in the second degree.

Merits, Affidavit of. This instrument is necessary when a defendant seeks to set aside proceedings for irregularity, especially if the irregularity be doubtful. In all cases when the facts will warrant it, it is advisable that the affidavit should thus run:—'And this deponent further saith, that he is advised, and verily believes, that he has a good and sufficient defence to this action on the merits;' not merely that he has merits, or that he has a good defence. It must be made either by the defendant himself, or his attorney or agent, or the clerk of the attorney, who has the sole management of the cause, or some person who has had such a connection with the cause as acquaints him with its merits, and this must appear on the face of the affidavit.

The term 'merits,' in an affidavit of this nature, is to be read in a technical sense, and is not to be understood to be confined to a strictly moral and conscientious defence, and therefore a sufficient defence on the merits might be safely sworn to when the defence rests alone on a legal or technical objection, as the statute against frauds, or a statute of limitations.—2 *Chit. Mesnality, a manor held under a superior lord.

Mesnalty, the right of the mesne.

Mesne [fr. medius, Lat.], middle, intermediate.

Mesne Lord, a lord who holds of a superior lord.

Mesne Process, all those writs which intervene in the progress of a suit or action, between its beginning and end, as contradistinguished from primary and final process. Thus, the capias on mesne process is issued after a writ of summons, which is the primary process, and before a capias ad satisfaciendum, which is the final process, or process of execution. See CAPIAS.

Mesne Profits, Action of, an action of trespass brought to recover profits derived from land, whilst the possession of it has been improperly withheld; that is, the yearly value of the premises. It is brought after a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of ejectment by which possession of the land is recovered, the damages being nominal in most cases of ejectment, except that between landlord and tenant, by 1 Geo. IV. c. 87, s. 2

The action should be brought in the name of the plaintiff, who has recovered judgment in the ejectment, and lies against any person found in possession of the premises after a recovery in ejectment. It cannot be maintained against executors or administrators for the profits accruing during the lifetime of the testator or intestate, and received by him, except, indeed, for those received within six calendar months before the death of the testator or intestate, and then only provided the action be brought against the executor or administrator within six months after entering upon the administration of the estate (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2). It may be brought pending error in ejectment, and the plaintiff may proceed to ascertain his damages and sign judgment, but the court will stay execution till the error be determined. The defendant may pay money into court, as in other actions.

The jury are not bound by the amount of the rent, but may give extra damages. But ground-rent paid by the defendant should be deducted from the damages. A plaintiff may recover in this action the costs of the action of ejectment, and also the costs incurred by him in a court of error. If a plaintiff recover less than 40*s.* damages, he shall have no more costs than damages, unless the judge certify.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1067; Woodf. Land. and Ten. 552; and Adams' Eject.

This action precisely answers to the ἐνοικίου δίκη of the Greeks.—Meier. Att. Proc. 749.

Mesne, Writ of, an ancient and abolished writ, which lay when the lord paramount distrained on the tenant paravail; the latter had a writ of mesne against the mesne lord.

Messarius [fr. messis, Lat.], a chief servant in husbandry; a bailiff.

Messenger, one who carries an errand; a forerunner.

Messengers are certain officers employed under the direction of the Secretaries of State, and always ready to be sent with despatches, foreign and domestic. They are employed with the Secretaries' warrants to arrest persons for treason, or other offences against the state, which do not so properly fall under the cognizance of the common law, and, perhaps, are not properly to be divulged in the ordinary course of justice.—2 Hawk. P. C. c. xvi., s. 9.

There are other officers distinguished by this appellation, as the messengers of the Lord Chancellor, Privy Council, and Exchequer, &c. Also, of the commissioners in bankruptcy, who seize a bankrupt's property, &c.

Messe Thane, one who said mass; a priest.—Cowel.

Messina, harvest.

Messis sementem sequitur.—(Harvest follows seed-time.)

Messuage [fr. messuagium, law Lat., formed perhaps fr. mesnage, by mistake of the n, in court hand, for u, they being written alike; or fr. maison, Fr.], a dwelling house with its outbuildings and curtilage and some adjacent land assigned to the use thereof. As to the legal import of the word, see 2 Bing. N. C. 617; Monks v. Dykes, 4 M. and W. 567.

In Scotland, the manor-house, or the principal dwelling-house within a barony.

Metachronism [fr. μετά, Gk., against, and χρόνος, time], an error in computation of time.

Metayer system. Under this, the land is divided in small farms, among single families, the landlord generally supplying the stock which the agricultural system of the country is considered to require, and receiving in lieu of rent and profit, a fixed proportion of the produce. This proportion, which is generally paid in kind, is usually (as is implied in the words métayer, mezzaiuolo, and medietarius,) one-half. 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 296 & 363, and 2 Smi. Weal. of Nat. p. 3, c. ii.

Metecorn, a measure or portion of corn, given by a lord to customary tenants as a reward and encouragement for labor.

Metegavel [meat-tax, Sax.], a tribute or rent paid in victuals.

Meter [fr. mete, Sax.], a measurer, as a coal-meter, a land-meter.

Metewand, or Meteyard, a staff of a certain length wherewith measures are taken.

Methel, speech, discourse; mathlian, to speak, to harangue.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Metteshep, or Mettenschep, an acknowledgment paid in a certain measure of corn; or a fine or penalty imposed on tenants for default in not doing their customary service in cutting the lord's corn.—Old Records.

Meubles meublant [Fr.], household furniture.

Meum est promittere, non dimittere.—2 Rol. Rep. 39.—(It is mine to promise, not to discharge.)

Meya, a mow or heap of corn.

Michaelmas, the feast of the archangel Michael, celebrated on the 29th of September, and one of the usual quarter days.

Michaelmas Head Court, a meeting of the heritors of Scotland, at which the roll of freeholders is revised.—20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Michaelmas Term, a non-issuable term which begins on the 2nd and ends on the 25th of Nov. in every year.

Michel-Gemote, the great meeting or ancient Parliament of the kingdom.

Michel-Synoth, the great council of the Saxons.

Michery, theft; cheating.

Middle-man, an agent between two parties. In Ireland a person who takes land in large tracts from the proprietors, and then leases it out to the peasantry in small portions at a greatly enhanced rent.

Middlesex, Bill of, a writ anciently resorted to by the Court of Queen's Bench, in order to enlarge its jurisdiction in civil causes.

The jurisdiction of this court in civil actions was formerly confined to actions of trespass, or other injury alleged to have been committed vi et armis. But it might always have held pleas of any civil action other than actions real, provided the defendant was an officer of the court, or in the custody of the marshal, that is, the prison-keeper of the court. On this latter privilege was built the fiction of surmising that the defendant had committed a breach of the peace in the county in which the court sits, and in which it was held to possess an extraordinary criminal jurisdiction, and then issuing a bill of Middlesex against him as for this trespass, and supposing him to be afterwards committed by virtue of that writ and as for that trespass, to the custody of the marshal, so as to bring him within the proper jurisdiction of the court. In proceedings against prisoners or officers of the court, the actions were said to be commenced by bill, in all other cases by original. Both are abolished by 2 Wm. IV. c. 39.

Middlesex Quarter Sessions. By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, it is enacted, that there shall be holden for the county of Middlesex two sessions, or adjourned sessions of the peace, in every calendar month, and that the first sessions in January, April, July, and October, respectively, shall be the general quarter sessions of the county; and the second sessions in January, April, July, and October, shall be adjournments of the general quarter sessions.

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 7 Anne, c. 20; and 25 Geo. II. c. 4.

Midsummer-Day, the summer solstice, which is on the 24th day of June; and the feast of St. John the Baptist, a festival first mentioned by Maximus Tauricensis, A.D. 400. It is generally a quarter day for the payment of rents, &c.

Mile, a measure of length or distance, containing eight furlongs, or 1,760 yards, or 5,280 feet.

Mileage, travelling expenses, which are allowed to witnesses, sheriffs, and bailiffs, according to certain scales of fees, settled by the masters of the several courts of law and equity.

Miles [Lat.], generally a soldier, particularly a knight.

Militare, to be knighted.

Military Asylum of Chelsea, for the reception of children of soldiers.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 61.

Military causes, all matters concerning the discipline of the army, and contracts, &c. relating to deeds of arms and war.

Military courts, the court of chivalry and courts martial. See CHIVALRY, COURTS OF, and MARTIAL COURTS.

Military feuds, the genuine or original feuds which were in the hands of military men, who performed military duty for their tenures. See TENURE.

Military forces, the militia or volunteers, and the regular standing army. See ARMY.

Military laws. See MARTIAL LAW.

Military offences, those offences which are cognizable by the courts military, as insubordination, sleeping on guard, desertion, &c.

Military Savings Banks. By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 20 (which repealed former acts), the Queen may establish or continue military or regimental savings banks, for the purpose of receiving sums of money from such of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers employed in her service, either in the United Kingdom or upon foreign stations (India alone excepted), as may be desirous of depositing the same, and for receiving deposits of any moneys or funds whatsoever raised or paid for objects or purposes connected with non-commissioned officers and soldiers, which her Majesty may from time to time think fit to authorize to be deposited in such savings banks. The regulation and the management of such institutions are intrusted to the Secretary at War for the time being, in concurrence with the commander-in-chief, and the commissioners of the treasury.

Military state, the soldiery of the kingdom.

Military tenure, tenure in chivalry or knight-service.

Military testament, a nuncupative will, that is, one made by word of mouth, by which a soldier may dispose of his goods, pay, and other personal chattels, without the forms and solemnities which the law requires in other cases.—1 Vict. c. 26, s. 11.

Militia, the national soldiery, as distinguished from the regular forces or standing army, being the inhabitants, or, as they have been sometimes called, the trained-bands of a town or county, who are armed on a short notice, for their own defence. As to its origin, see 3 Hall. Cons. Hist. p. 262. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 74; 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 116, 133; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 13; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 82; 21 & 22

Vict. cc. 4, 39, 82, 85, 86; 22 & 23 Vict. cc. 15, 38, 54; 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 94, 120, 133; 25 & 26 Vict. cc. 17 & 80; and 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 37 & 53.

Millbank Prison, formerly called the Penitentiary at Millbank. A prison in the neighbourhood of Westminster, for the reception of convicts under sentence or order of transportation, to be there confined until the sentence or order shall be executed, or until the convict shall be entitled to freedom, or be removed to some other place of confinement. The justices of the peace have no authority over this prison, but it is placed under such of the inspectors of prisons as shall be appointed for that purpose by one of the principal Secretaries of State, and who are to be a body corporate, by the name of 'The Inspectors of the Millbank Prison.' These inspectors are to make regulations for the government thereof, subject to the approbation of a principal Secretary of State, and to make yearly reports to such secretary, as to all matters relating to the prison or the convicts, which reports are to be afterwards laid before both houses of Parliament. A principal Secretary of State is also to appoint for the prison a governor, chaplain, medical officer, matron, and such other officers as may be deemed requisite.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 98; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 26; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 104; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 60.

Mill-holms, low meadows and other fields in the vicinity of mills, or watery places about mill dams.—Encyc. Lond.

Milleate, or Mill-leat, a trench to convey water to or from a mill.—7 Jac. I. c. 19.

Milled money, coined money.

Minage, a toll or duty paid for selling corn by the mina.—Cowel.

Minare, to dig mines.

Minator, a miner.—Old Records.

Minator carucæ, a ploughman.—Cowel.

Minatur innocentibus, qui parcit nocentibus.—4 Co. 45.—(He threatens the innocent who spares the guilty.)

Mine [fr. mwyn or mwy, Wel., from maen, a stone], an excavation or cavern in the earth, which yields metals or minerals. Where stones only are produced, the places from which they are dug out are called quarries.

As to royal mines, see LAND. As to mines in Devon and Cornwall, see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 120, and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 58, s. 1.

A man may dig mines in his own lands, but he cannot go under the land of his neighbor, for that would be trespass.—6 Ves. 147. The lord of a manor, as such, has no right, without a custom, to enter upon copyhold lands in his manor, under which there are mines or veins of coal, to bore for or work the same, for the copyholder may maintain trespass for his so doing, and also obtain an injunction against the lord to restrain him.—17 Ves. 281. But a copyholder of inheritance may dig mines in his own land.

A tenant for life may work open mines and sink new shafts or pits to pursue the old veins. And he may also work any mines lawfully opened by a preceding tenant-in-tail, although subsequent to the settlement under which he claims; but if he open a new mine it is waste. 3 P. Wms. 288. But see Leas. and Sales of Sett. Est. As to the regulation and inspection of mines, see 5 & 6 Vict. c. 99; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 151; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 79.

Minerator, a minor.—Old Records.

Minima pœna corporalis est major qualibet pecuniariâ.—2 Inst. 220.—(The smallest bodily punishment is greater than any pecuniary one.)

Minimè mutanda sunt quæ certam habent interpretationem.—Co. Litt. 365.—(Things which have a certain interpretation are to be altered as little as possible.)

Miniment, or Muniment, the evidences or writings whereby a man is enabled to defend the title of his estate. It includes all manner of evidences.—Cowel.

Minimum est nihilo proximum.—(The smallest is next to nothing.)

Mining companies. This designation was formerly applied to the associations formed in London in 1825 for working mines in Mexico and South America; but at present it comprises all mining projects carried on by joint-stock associations.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Minister, an agent; one who acts not by any inherent authority, but under another.

In politics, one to whom a sovereign entrusts the administration of government. In Great Britain, the word ministry is used as a collective noun for the heads of departments in the state. The ministry or executive government consists of the following high officers of state, who are also members of the Cabinet Council:—The First Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretaries of State for the Home Department, for Foreign Affairs, for the Colonial Department, for the War Department, and for India; of the following officers, many of whom are usually but not necessarily members of the Cabinet Council:—Chief Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and of Works and Public Buildings, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, First Lord of the Admiralty, President of the Board of Trade, Paymaster-General of the Forces, Master of the Mint, Judge Advocate-General, Postmaster-General, Master-General of the Ordnance, Chief Secretary for Ireland. It sometimes happens that a statesman who holds no office is a member of the Cabinet. The First Lord of the Treasury is at the head of the government and appoints his colleagues. Besides the officers above-mentioned there are a number of others, including the law officers of the Crown, the Under Secretaries for the different departments, the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the law officers of Ireland and Scotland, and the great officers of Her Majesty's household, who are also members of the Ministry, and who resign their offices whenever the Prime Minister who has appointed them resigns. All the chief offices in a ministry, and most of the inferior offices, are conferred upon peers and members of the House of Commons who agree with the First Lord of the Treasury in general principles of home and foreign policy, and who act together in Parliament for the promotion of measures in accordance with those principles.

A foreign minister is usually called an ambassador.

In religion, a pastor of a church, chapel, or meeting-house, &c.

Ministerial, attendant; acting under superior authority.

Ministri regis (ministers of the king), applied to the judges of the realm, and to all those who hold ministerial offices in the government.—2 Inst. 208.

Ministry [contracted fr. ministery], office; service. Those members of the government who are in the cabinet. See MINISTER.

Minor, a person under age, who is not yet arrived at the power of managing his own affairs. See INFANT.

Minor ante tempus agere non potest in casu proprietatis nec etiam convenire; differetur usque ætatem; sed non cadit breve.—2 Inst. 291.—(A minor before majority cannot act in a case of property, nor even agree; it should be deferred until majority; but a writ does not fail.)

Minor jurare non potest.—Co. Litt. 172 b.—(A minor cannot swear.)

Minor 17 annis, non admittitur fore executorem.—6 Co. 68.—(A minor under seventeen years of age is not admitted to be an executor.)

Minor minorem custodire non debet; alios enim præsumitur male regere qui seipsum regere nescit.—Co. Litt. 88.—(A minor cannot be guardian to a minor, for he is presumed to direct others badly who knows not how to direct himself.)

Minor non tenetur respondere durante minori ætate; nisi in causâ dotis, propter favorem.—3 Bulst. 143.—(A minor is not bound to reply during his minority, except as a matter of favor in a cause of dower.)

Minor, qui infra ætatem 12 annorum fuerit, utlagari non potest, nec extra legem poni, quia ante talem ætatem, non est sub lege aliquâ, nec in decennâ.—Co. Litt. 128.—(A minor who is under twelve years of age cannot be outlawed, nor placed without the law, because, before such age, he is not under any law, nor in a decennary.)

Minora regalia, the lesser prerogatives of the Crown, relating to the revenue.

Minoress, a female under age.

Minority [fr. minor, Lat.], the state of being under age, i. e. twenty-one years; also the smaller number.

Mint [fr. moneta, Lat.; mynet Sax., money, from mynetian, to coin], the place where money is coined. The mint of great Britain is situated near the Tower of London.—57 Geo. III. c. 67; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 10; 2 Wm. IV. c. 34; 1 Hale, 213.

Also, a place of privilege in Southwark, near the Queen's prison, where persons formerly sheltered themselves from justice, under the pretext that it was an ancient palace of the Crown. The privilege is now abolished; and the statutes 8 & 9 Wm. III. c. 27; 9 Geo. I. c. 28; 11 Geo. I. c. 22; and 1 Geo. IV. c. 116, enact, that persons opposing the execution of any process in such pretended privileged places within the bills of mortality, or abusing any officer in his endeavour to execute his duty therein so that he receives bodily hurt; and all persons aiding and abetting such opposition, shall be felons and shall be punished accordingly.

Mint-mark. It has been always usual to oblige the masters and workers of the mint, in the indentures made with them, 'to make a privy mark in all the money that they make, as well of gold as of silver, so that another time they might know, if need were, which monies of gold and silver among others of the same monies, were of their own making and which not.' The masters and workers of the mint, after every trial of the pix at Westminster, having there proved their monies to be lawful and good, are immediately entitled to receive their quietus under the Great Seal, and to be discharged from all suits or actions concerning those monies; it is then usual for the said masters and workers to change the privy mark before used for another, that so the monies from which they are not yet discharged might be distinguished from those for which they had already received their quietus, which new mark they then continue to stamp upon all their monies, until another trial of the pix gives them also their quietus concerning those.—Encyc. Lond.

Mint-master, one who manages the coinage.

Mintage, that which is coined or stamped.

Minute, 60 seconds, or the 60th part of a degree or hour; also a memorandum.

Minute tithes [minores decimæ, Lat.], small tithes, such as usually belong to a vicar, as of wool, lambs, pigs, butter, cheese, herbs, seeds, eggs, honey, wax, &c.

Mirror des Justices. This singular work has raised much doubt and difference of opinion concerning its antiquity. Some have pronounced it older than the Conquest, others have ascribed it to the time of Edward II. Both these opinions may be partly right. There may perhaps have been a work by this name as early as the first date supposed; but whoever judges from the internal evidence of this book will be satisfied that great part of it is of a period much later, and certainly written after Fleta and Britton; for it states many points of law, as it were, in a stage of progression somewhat receding from those writers, and approaching nearer to those of later times. It is probable that Andrew Horne, whose name it bears, might take up an ancient book of that name, and work it into the volume we now see, in the reign of Edward II., or at the end of the former reign; and if so, we should expect that whatever it propounds was actually law in the reign of Edward II.

This book treats of all branches of the law, whether civil or criminal. Besides this, it gives a cursory retrospect of some changes ordained by former kings; enumerates a list of abuses, as the author terms them, of the common law, proposing, at the same time, what he considers to be desirable corrections. He does the same with Magna Charta, the statutes of Merton and Marlbridge, and some principal acts in the reign of Edward I.

This book should be read with great caution, and some previous knowledge of the law as it stood about the same period, for the author certainly writes with very little precision. This, with his assertions about Alfred, and the extravagant punishments inflicted by that king on his judges, have brought his treatise under some suspicions. When read with these hints, The Mirror of Justices is certainly a curious, interesting, and, in some degree, an authentic tract upon our old law; though, considering the anachronisms in legal knowledge (if they may be so called) with which it abounds, that the antiquated law is promiscuously blended with that of the time in which it was revised, and that the date of such revision is very uncertain, it is to be wondered that some great writers have relied so much upon this author, as to pronounce upon the antiquity of many articles of our law merely on his authority.—2 Reeves, c. xii. 358.

Mis, an inseparable particle used in composition, to mark an ill sense or depravation of the meaning, as miscomputation or misaccompted, i. e. false reckoning. Several of the words following are illustrations of the force of this monosyllable.—Todd's Johnson's Dict.

Misa, a compact, a firm peace.—Old Records.

Misadventure, excusable homicide by, also termed homicide per infortunium; it arises where a man, doing a lawful act, without any intention of hurt, unfortunately kills another, as where a person is at work with a hatchet, and the head of it flies off and kills a bystander, or is shooting at a mark and undesignedly kills a man, for the act is lawful, and the effect is merely accidental. So where a parent is moderately correcting a child, a master his apprentice or scholar, or an officer punishing a criminal, and happens to occasion his death, it is only misadventure, for the act of correction was lawful; but if he exceeds the bounds of moderation, either in the manner, the instrument, or the quantity of punishment, and death ensue, it is manslaughter at least, and in some cases, according to the circumstances, murder, for the act of immoderate correction is unlawful.—Fost. 275; 4 Stop. Com. 136.

Misallege, to cite falsely as a proof or argument.

Miscarriage, a wrongful act. See 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 4.

Miscarriage, producing. See ABORTION.

Miscasting, an error in addition.

Miscognisant, ignorant of, unacquainted with.

Miscontinuance, cessation, intermission.

Misdemeanor, a species of crime or offence comprehending all breaches of public law less than felony, as perjury, libels, conspiracies, assaults, &c., which are not so atrocious as murder, burglary, arson, &c., which are felonies.

Misdirection, an error in law or fact made by a judge in charging a jury.

Mise, disbursement, costs; also a tax or tallage, &c.; also, the issue in a writ of right. It is sometimes corruptly used for mease or mees, i. e. a messuage.

Mise-money, money paid by way of contract or composition to purchase any liberty, &c.—Blount.

Misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum aut incertum.—4 Inst. 246.—(Obedience is miserable, where the law is vague or uncertain.)

Miserabile depositum, an involuntary deposit under pressing necessity.—Civ. Law.

Miserere (have mercy). The name and first word of one of the penitential psalms, being that which was commonly used to be given by the ordinary to such condemned malefactors as were allowed the benefit of clergy: whence it is also called the psalm of mercy.

Misericordia, an arbitrary amerciament or punishment imposed on any person for an offence. It is thus called, according to Fitzherbert, because it ought to be but small and less than that required by Magna Charta.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Also, a discharge of all manner of amerciaments, which a person might incur in the forest. See CAPIAS PRO FINE.—See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 525.

Misericordia communis, a fine set on a whole county or hundred.

Misericordia domini regis est, quâ quis per juramentum legalium hominum de vicineto eatenus amerciandus est, ne aliquid de suo honorabili contenemento amittat.—Co. Litt. 126.—(The mercy of our lord the king is that by which everyone is to be amerced by a jury of good men from his immediate neighbourhood, lest he should lose any part of his own honorable tenement.)

Misevenire, to fail or succeed ill.

Misfeazance, a misdeed or trespass; also, the improper performance of some lawful act.

Misfeazant, a trespass.

Misfeazor, a trespasser.

Misfortune. See CHANGE.

Misjoinder, joining parties in a suit or action, who ought not to have been so joined.

In equity, if the misjoinder be of parties as plaintiffs, all the defendants may demur. If the misjoinder be of parties as defendants, those only can demur who are improperly joined. The improperly joining two different causes of suit in one bill is technically called multifariousness, which see. No suit is to be dismissed on the ground of misjoinder or similar objections; but the court can grant relief, modify its decree, or make amendments according to the circumstances of the case.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 49.

As to amendments in case of misjoinder of parties at common law, see C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 35–37; Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 403, 1550.

Where several persons join in the commission of an offence, all or any number of them may be jointly indicted for it, or each of them may be indicted separately. Misjoinder of defendants may be made the subject of demurrer, motion in arrest of judgment, writ of error, or the court may quash the proceedings. As to the misjoinder of causes of action not in the same right, see C. L. P. Act 1862, s. 41; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 225.

Miskenning, a wrongful citation. — Du Cange; Anc. Inst. Eng.

Misnomer, a wrong name.

In real and mixed actions at common law a misnomer is a ground of abatement, but no plea in abatement for a misnomer shall be allowed in any personal action; but in all cases in which a misnomer would, but for the following act, have been pleadable in abatement, the defendant shall be at liberty to cause the declaration to be amended at the plaintiff's costs, by inserting the right name. And this is done by taking out a summons before a judge at chambers, founded on an affidavit of the right name, and in case the summons shall be discharged, the costs of such application shall be paid by the party applying, if the judge shall think fit.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 11. Where a plaintiff has sued a defendant by his wrong Christian name, but has declared against him by his right Christian name, the proceeding is regular under the foregoing Act of Parliament.

Misnomers in proceedings are now frequently amended by the court, provided the other parties have neither been misled nor prejudiced by them. And by 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 19, no indictment or information shall be abated by reason of any dilatory plea or misnomer, or of want of addition, or of wrong addition of the party offering such plea; but if the court shall be satisfied, by affidavit or otherwise, of the truth of such plea, it shall forthwith cause the indictment or information to be amended according to the truth, and call upon the party to plead thereto, and proceed as if no such dilatory plea had been pleaded. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100.

Mispleading. See JEOFAILS.

Misprision [fr. mépris, Fr.], neglect, negligence, or oversight.

All such high offences as are under the degree of capital, but nearly bordering thereon, are misprisions; and it is said that a misprision is contained in every treason and felony whatsoever, and that, if the Crown so please, the offender may be proceeded against for the misprision only. And upon the same principle, while the Court of Star Chamber subsisted, it was held that the sovereign might remit a prosecution for treason, and cause the delinquent to be censured in that court, merely for a high misdemeanor; as happened in the case of Roger, Earl of Rutland, in 43 Eliz., he having been concerned in Essex's rebellion. Every great misdemeanor, according to Coke, which has no certain term appointed by the law, is sometimes called a misprision.

Misprisions are divided in the text-books into two kinds:—

(1) Negative, consisting in the concealment of something which ought to be revealed, such is misprision of treason, which is the bare knowledge and concealment of treason, without any degree of assent thereto; for any assent makes the party a principal traitor; as indeed the concealment, which was construed to be aiding and abetting, did at the common law; but it was enacted by st. 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 10, that a bare concealment of treason shall be only held a misprision. Information will not lie for this offence, but indictment, as for capital crimes. There must be two witnesses at least to support the case.—7 Wm. III. c. 3; 1 Hale P. C. 374; 4 Step. Com. 248.

Besides the last described offence, the mere concealment of a felony is criminal, and is called misprision of felony; but if there be an assent, this makes the person assenting either a principal or accessory. Theftbote, and con- cealing treasure-trove, are each of them species of negative misprision.—4 Step. Com. 248, 313.

(2) Positive, otherwise denominated contempt or high misdemeanors, such as the mal-administration of such high officers as are in public trust and employment, usually punishable by parliamentary impeachment; also, embezzlement of the public money, punishable by fine and imprisonment; also, such contempts of the executive magistrate as demonstrate themselves by some arrogant and undutiful behaviour towards the sovereign and government. And to endeavor to dissuade a witness from giving evidence, to disclose an examination before the Privy Council, or to advise a prisoner to stand mute (all of which are impediments to justice), are high misprisions and contempts of the courts, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Misprisions of clerks are mistakes made by clerks, &c., in writing or keeping records.

Misrecital, a wrong recital. If it be in the beginning of a deed, which goes not to the end of a deed, it shall not hurt, but if it go to the end of a sentence, so that the deed is limited by it, it is vicious.—Carth. 149.

Misrepresentation, i. e. suggestio falsi, in a matter of substance essentially material to the subject, whether by acts or by words, by manœuvres or by positive assertions, whereby a person is actually misled and injured, and a fraud perpetrated. And it is wholly immaterial whether the misrepresentor knew the matter to be false, or asserted it, either innocently, by mistake, or, without knowing if it were true or false; for the affirmance of that which is not known to be true is quite as unjustifiable as the assertion of that which is known to be false, since it is equally a means of deception. But equity would not relieve, if the misrepresentation were of a trifling or immaterial thing, or if the other party did not trust to it, or was not misled by it, or if it were vague and inconclusive in its own nature, or if it were upon a matter of opinion or fact equally open to the inquiries of both parties, and in regard to which neither could be presumed to have confided in the other, for vigilantibus, non dormientibus æquitas subvenit. Equity cannot indemnify a person from the consequences of indolence and folly or of careless indifference and neglect as to easily accessible means of information.

Missa, the mass.

Missæ presbyter, a priest in orders.—Blount.

Missal, the mass-book.

Missaticus, a messenger.—Old Records.

Missing ship, a vessel which has not been heard of for a long period, and is supposed to have foundered.

Missive, a letter sent.

Missura, the ceremonies used in the Romish Church to recommend and dismiss a dying person.

Mistake, misconception, error.

The word 'mistake,' as employed in Chancery, is to be understood as an unintentional act or omission, arising from ignorance or imposture. Mistakes are either (1), in a point of law, or (2), of a matter of fact.

As to the former, Equity regards the well-known and ancient maxim, Ignorantia legis neminem excusat; for 'otherwise,' observed Lord Ellenborough, Bilbie v. Lumley, 2 East, 469 (1802), 'there is no saying to what extent the excuse of ignorance might be carried.'

The following propositions illustrate this maxim: Where an obligee releases one of two joint-obligors, supposing that, in point of law, the other will still be bound, he nevertheless releases both; and equity will not relieve him, provided his release have not been procured by fraud. So, where a person, having a power of appointment, executes it absolutely without a power of revocation, upon a notion that in law a voluntary deed is always revocable, he is not entitled to relief, unless indeed there had been an intention of inserting such a power, and it has been omitted by mistake in the draft. And all agreements entered into with good faith, but under a mistake of law, will be binding on all the parties, especially those agreements which seek to preserve the honor and peace of families, whose establishment is part of the final cause of government; for, as remarked by Lord Eldon, Stockley v. Stockley, 1 Ves. and B. 30 (1812), 'in family arrangements, this court has administered an equity which is not applied to agreements generally.'

It is, however, to be remarked that if a person acting in plain ignorance of a settled principle of law is induced to give up, by way of compromise, a right or a portion of his indisputable property, of which he has no knowledge, Equity will relieve him from the effect of his error, for the misapprehension that he possesses no title at all to property constitutes rather a mistake of fact, i. e. the fact of ownership, arising from a mistake of law, and it can hardly be said that a person actually intended to part with a right or title of the existence of which he was entirely ignorant. And where a man having a right to an estate, purchased it of another person, being ignorant of his own title, the vendor was compelled to repay the purchase-money, with interest from the time of filing the bill, and costs.—Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. 126 (1748). Equity is indeed disinclined to sustain even family settlements, where there is a mixture of mistake of title, gross personal ignorance, liability to imposition, habitual intoxication, or want of professional advice.

Surprise joined to a mistake of law invalidates agreements upon the equitable ground that those who are unable to protect themselves, and of whom undue advantage is taken, ought to be protected.

From the conflicting dicta and obscure authorities on this subject, the question as to the effect of mistakes of law is by no means clear and satisfactory; but it would appear that the above deductions are sustainable.

As to the other kind of mistakes, the fundamental rule is that an act done under a mistake or ignorance of a materal fact, i. e. a fact essential to the character of the act, and an efficient cause of its being done, is relieved against in Equity, provided compensation can be made for the injury occasioned by it; and this although there be no fraud and the parties are entirely innocent. But besides the materiality of the fact, it must also be a fact which the exercise of reasonable diligence could not have ascertained; for if so, equity will not relieve, as that would be to encourage culpable neglect. Where, however, each party is equally innocent, and there is not any concealment by one of facts which the other has a right to know, and there is no surprise or imposition, the mistake or ignorance, whether mutual, or on one side only (or unilateral, as the Scotch law expresses it), is treated as laying no foundation for equitable interference. It is strictly damnum absque injuriâ.—1 Sto. Eq. Jur. c. v., and see Lord St. Leonards' V. and P. 179. A mistake of a fact and an ignorance of a fact differ in meaning; the former supposes some error of opinion as to the real facts; but the latter may be mere want of knowledge without any error of opinion. The two phrases are, however, convertible, and are commonly used synonymously.

Equity is frequently resorted to, in order to amend written agreements, which on account of a plain mistake (clearly and satisfactorily proved), do not set forth the precise intent of the parties. 'No doubt,' said Lord Hardwicke, Henkle v. R. E. Assur. Co. 1 Ves. 317 (1749), 'but this court has jurisdiction to relieve in respect of a plain mistake in contracts in writing as well as against frauds in contracts in writing, so that if reduced into writing contrary to the intent of the parties, on proper proof that would be rectified.' Marriage settlements and conveyances are on the same grounds rectified and made consistent with the purpose intended. Thus where a solicitor, instructed prior to the marriage of a lady to prepare a settlement of her property so as to reserve to her the same absolute power of disposition over it as she then possessed, prepared a settlement containing a clause restricting anticipation; but with the engrossment of the settlement forwarded to the lady an epitome of it which omitted that clause, and a letter to her, in which he said 'that she would observe that the most unlimited control, both over the principal and interest, was proposed to be secured to her,' and the lady and her then intended husband executed the settlement in ignorance of its containing a clause restricting anticipation; upon a bill filed on the lady's behalf by her next friend, to rectify the settlement by striking out the words 'but not by way of anticipation,' it was ruled that these words were inserted by mistake, and contrary to the intention of the parties.—Torre v. Torre, 1 Eq. Rep. 364 (1853); and see Walker v. Armstrong, on app. 4 W. R. 770 (1856).

Parol evidence is admissible to vary, alter, or explain written instruments, on the ground of accident, mistake, or fraud, and although this is certainly an exception to the rule excluding the reception of parol evidence against written agreements, yet it is obvious that both the exception and the rule stand upon the same ground of policy—the suppression of fraud and the promotion of good faith and confidence.

But besides the relief granted, where the fact of the mistake is clearly established, assistance will be extended to those cases in which the mistake is fairly implied from the nature of the transactions; thus, in the instance of a joint loan to two or more obligors, who give a joint bond for its repayment, Equity will make it joint and several, since the debt being joint, the plain inference is that it was the intent of the parties to attach the responsibility to each obligor and to all equally, which is not effected by a joint bond, for in that case on the death of one obligor the survivor only is liable at law to be sued for the debt; Equity therefore acts upon the presumption that the omission arose from a blunder or mistake.

Equity will also supply defects in conveyances occasioned by mistake, as a surrender in copyhold transfers for valuable, but not for merely meritorious consideration; livery of seisin in feoffments; and instruments given up or cancelled by mistake, and in ignorance of the facts, upon the ground that the party in whose favor they were made is conscientiously entitled to the benefit of such instruments. Besides, Equity regards not the outward form but rather the inward substance and essence of the matter.

It is to be remarked, however, that Equity cannot supply the want of statutory formalities in conveyances, for that would be to assume legislative functions, and to defeat the very policy of the statutes themselves. For instance, a bargain and sale of freeholds requires to be enrolled within six (lunar) months, by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16; now should the enrolment not have taken place within this time, through mistake or accident, Equity cannot decree an enrolment, nunc pro tunc, but it will direct another bargain and sale to be executed and enrolled within the proper time.

Defective executions of all kinds of powers, arising from accident or mistake, are relieved against, and the defect supplied by compelling the person seised of the legal estate to convey in the manner pointed out by the defective appointment in favor of the donee's creditors, bonâ fide purchasers for value, mortgagees, lessees, wives, or children, and also in favor of charities, against remainder-men, and heirs-at-law duly provided for, but such relief must not operate any injustice to others, or involve a breach of trust, and there must be an absence of all counter equity; neither must the intention of the author of the power be thereby defeated, nor the enactments of an act of parliament contravened. See West v. Ray, 2 Eq. Rep. 431 (1854). But as a general rule, the non-execution of a power is not aided, unless brought about by fraud. For Equity will not do that for a person which he does not think fit to do for himself. The exception to this general rule is, that where the power is coupled with a trust, to the execution of which the parties looked with confidence, then Equity will relieve against its non-execution, for the benefit of the cestuis que trustent.—Tollet v. Tollet 2 P. Wms. 489 (1728), and 1 White and Tudor's Lead Cas. 155–166.

Obvious mistakes or omissions in a will can be rectified or supplied in Equity, when they are apparent upon its face, or may be made out on a due construction of its terms, for in such cases, intention prevails over language. Parol evidence or evidence out of (dehors) the will is not admissible to vary or control its terms, although it is to remove a latent ambiguity. Equity will correct mistakes in the computation of legacies, in the property intended to be given, or in the names, descriptions or number of the legatees. A blank for the surname of a legatee cannot be filled up, but a Christian name may be supplied (In the matter of Rickit's estate, 1 Eq. Rep. 251, 1853), and a part of a surname where the initial of it appears in the will. A will cancelled by mistake may be restored, and will not let in the heir-at-law.

Where there is an excessive appointment under a power by deed, it is void quoad the excess, the execution being rendered effectual, so far as the appointment is warranted by the power; valeat quantum valere potest.

If a testator's intention be not consistent with the policy of the law so that it cannot be specifically acted upon, yet Equity will give effect to such intention, as nearly as the rules of law will allow, by applying what is technically called the doctrine of cy-près (i. e. as near to), which is simply a practically legal scheme to carry out an intent, which is strictly impracticable and not perfectly consistent with legal principles, as where lands are limited to an unborn person for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail. As such limitations are clearly incapable of taking effect, since the Common Law rule prohibited the limitation of a possibility upon a possibility, and made the remainder to the issue absolutely void, this doctrine, in order to prevent the total frustration of the intention in favor of the issue, gives to the parent the estate-tail, which was designed for the issue; under which estate-tail, unless barred by some act on the part of the parent, the lands will descend to the persons intended to have been made tenants-in-tail by purchase. The intention that the testator's bounty shall flow to the issue is considered as paramount to that which regulates the manner of their taking, and the latter is therefore sacrificed.

This doctrine does not apply to limitations of personalty, except in the case of charities (see CY-PRÈS), or to deeds, or to any attempt made to limit a succession of life estates to the issue of an unborn person, either for a definite or indefinite series of generations; or to a limitation in fee simple to the children of unborn persons. See further as to this doctrine, Fearne's Cont. Rem., and 2 Lord St. Leonards on Powers, 60.

While Equity will redress a mistake as between the original parties, and their privies, it will neither relieve against mere accidents, nor rectify mistakes so as to affect bonâ fide purchasers for value without notice, for the mistakes or ignorances of parties to conveyances as to their claims cannot be allowed to be turned to the prejudice of such unassailable individuals.

In cases of mistake, the time of limitation which by analogy to that prescribed by the 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, is held to bar the remedy in courts of Equity, begins to run from the time of the discovery of the mistake.—2 Chit. Eq. Ind. by Mac. 1422.

In criminal cases a mistake of fact is an excuse, as when a man, intending to do a lawful act, does that which is unlawful. An error, however, in point of law, is no excuse, for ignorantia juris, quod quisque tenetur scire, neminem excusat.—Plowd. 343.

Mistery [fr. métier, Fr.], a trade or calling.

Mistrial, an erroneous trial.

Misuser, abuse of any liberty or benefit which works a forfeiture of it.

Mitigation, abatement of anything penal, harsh or painful.

Mitior sensus (the more favorable acceptation). Mitius imperanti melius paretur.—3 Inst. 24. (He is better obeyed who commands leniently.)

Mittendo manuscriptum pedis finis, an abolished judicial writ addressed to the treasurer and chamberlain of the exchequer to search for and transmit the foot of a fine acknowledged before justices in eyre, into the Common Pleas.—Reg. Orig. 14.

Mitter le droit (to pass a right).—Co. Litt. 273 a. See RELEASE.

Mitter l'estate (to pass an estate). See Ibid.

Mittimus (we send), a writ for removing and transferring records from one court to another. Also, a precept or command in writing, directed to the gaoler or keeper of some prison for the receiving and safe keeping of an offender charged with any crime, until he be delivered by due course of law. As to writs into a county palatine, see C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 122.

Mittre à large (to set or put at liberty).

Mixed actions, suits at common law partaking of the nature of real and personal actions, by which some real property is demanded, and also personal damages for a wrong sustained. They substantially partake, however, of the character of real actions, and are often so called, but they are now abolished, except the action of ejectment.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27. Correctly speaking, however, ejectment is in its form a species of the personal action of trespass.—Step. Plead. app. vii.

Those in Roman law, in which some specific thing was demanded, and where also some personal obligations were claimed to be performed. Hallifax on Roman Law, 85.

Mixed contract, one in which one of the parties confers a benefit on the other, and requires of the latter something of less value than what he has given; as a legacy charged with something of less value than the legacy itself.—Civ. Law.

Mixed government, a form of government, combining monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, like that of the British Empire.

Mixed larceny, otherwise called compound or complicated larceny, that which is combined with circumstances of aggravation or violence to the person, or taking from a house. See LARCENY.

Mixed laws, those which concern both persons and property.

Mixed property, a compound of realty and personalty.

Mixed questions [questions mixtes, Fr.], those which arise from the conflict of foreign and domestic laws.

Mixed questions of law or fact, cases in which a jury are to find the particular facts, and the court is to decide upon the legal quality of those facts by the aid of established rules of law, independently of any general inference or conclusion to be drawn by a jury. All technical expressions, such as asportation, conversion, acceptance, &c., are, in their application, partly matters of law, partly matters of fact.

Yet the term, a mixed question of law and fact, is chargeable with some degree of indistinctness. Questions of law and fact are not in strictness ever mixed. It is always for the jury to decide the one, and the court the other, however complicated the case may be. In some cases the main difficulty may consist in ascertaining the facts, where the application of the law to the ascertained facts admits of no doubt; in another the facts may be clear and simple, and their legal effect doubtful; but still in each case the provinces of the court and jury are perfectly plain and distinct. It is true that, in some instances, the court could not, without the aid of a conclusion of fact drawn by a jury, apply the law; but this consideration does not properly occasion any intermixture or confusion of the respective functions of the court and jury; for the latter, in drawing their conclusion, still confine themselves to mere matters of fact.—6 East, 3; 1 T. R. 167. See Taylor's Evid. 34.

Mixed subjects of property, such as fall within the definition of things real, but which are attended nevertheless with some of the legal qualities of things personal, as emblements, fixtures, and shares in public undertakings, connected with land. Besides these, there are others which, though things personal in point of definition, are, in respect of some of their legal qualities, of the nature of things real; such are animals feræ naturæ, charters and deeds, court rolls and other evidences of the land, together with the chests in which they are contained, ancient family pictures, ornaments, tombstones, coats of armour, with pennons and other ensigns, and especially heirlooms.

Mixed tithes, tithes of wool, milk, pigs, &c. consisting of natural products, but nurtured and preserved in part by the care of man. See Com. Dig. Dismes.

Mixtum, a breakfast, or a certain quantity of bread and wine.—Cowel.

Mizmor [Span.], a dungeon.—Phillips.

Mobles [fr. mobilia, Lat.], moveable goods; furniture. Obsolete word.

Mocurrery, lands to let on a lease.—Indian.

Modal legacy, a bequest with a direction as to the mode in which it is to be applied to the legatee's benefit.

Model, a representation or copy of a thing. The 54 Geo. III. c. 56, gives a copyright in models.

Moderata misericordia, a writ founded on Magna Charta, which lies for him who is amerced in a court not of record, for any transgression beyond the quality or quantity of the offence; it is addressed to the lord of the court, or his bailiff, commanding him to take a moderate amerciament of the parties.—N. N. B. 167; F. N. B. 76.

Moderate castigavit (he moderately corrected).

Moderator, a president or chairman.

Modiatio, a certain duty paid for every tierce of wine.—Mon. Angl. t. ii., p. 194.

Modification, an ascertaining, by a commission of teinds (tithes), the amount of stipend to be paid to a minister of a parish.—Scotch term.

Modius, a measure, usually a bushel.

Modius terræ vel agri, a quantity of ground containing in length and breadth 100 feet.—Mon. Angl. iii. 200.

Modo et formâ (in manner and form), a phrase used in pleading.

It is the nature of a traverse to deny the matter of fact in the adverse pleading in the manner and form in which it is alleged, and, therefore, to put the opposite party to prove it to be true in manner and form as well as in general effect. A traverse, when in the negative, generally denies the last pleading, modo et formâ (in manner and form as alleged). The plea of non est factum, and the replication de injuriâ, are almost the only negative traverses that are not pleaded modo et formâ.

These words, however, though usual, are said to be in no case strictly essential, so as to render their omission cause of demurrer.

It is always enough to prove the substance of an allegation.—Step. Plead. 219.

Modus decimandi, a particular manner of tithing arising from immemorial usage, differing from the payment of one-tenth of the annual increase.

It is sometimes a pecuniary compensation; as twopence per acre for the tithe of land; sometimes it is a compensation in work and labor, as that the parson shall only have the twelfth cock of hay, and not the tenth, in consideration of the owner's making it for him; sometimes in lieu of a large quantity of crude or imperfect tithe, the parson shall have a less quantity when arrived to greater maturity, as a couple of fowls in lieu of tithe eggs, and the like. Any means, in short, whereby the general law of tithing is altered, and a new method of taking tithes is introduced, is called a modus decimandi, or special manner of tithing.

To make a good and sufficient modus, the following rules must be observed:—

(1) It must be certain and invariable.

(2) The substitution must be beneficial to the parson, and not for the emolument of third persons only.

(3) It must be something different from the thing compounded for.

(4) The payment of one species of tithe will not discharge a modus for another.

(5) The substitution must be in its nature as durable as the tithes discharged by it.

(6) The modus must not be too large, for that is a rank modus.

(7) By 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 100, it is provided that when tithe is demanded by any lay person, not being a corporation sole, or by any corporation aggregate, any modus or discharge set up in answer to such claim shall be deemed valid, upon evidence showing an usage in support of it for thirty years, unless it can be met by evidence that such usage has been by virtue of some agreement in writing, or that before the thirty years the usage was different; and a modus or discharge shall in such case be deemed absolutely valid, upon evidence showing an usage for as much as sixty years in support of it, unless it be proved to have been by virtue of some agreement in writing. And, further, that when tithe is demanded by any bishop, parson, or other corporation sole, any claim of modus or discharge shall be valid and indefeasible upon evidence of usage during the whole time that two persons in succession shall have held the benefice, and for three years after the institution of a third incumbent, unless it shall be proved that such usage was by some agreement in writing; provided always, that if the whole time of the holding of such two persons shall be less than sixty years, then it shall be necessary to show such usage, not only during the whole of such time, but also during such further period as shall, with such time, be sufficient to make up the full period of sixty years, and the further period of three years aforesaid.

Modus de non decimando non valet.—(An agreement not to take tithes avails not.)

Modus et conventio vincunt legem.—2 Co. 73.—(Custom and agreement overrule law.)

Modus legem dat donationi.—Co. Litt. 19.—(Custom gives law to the gift.)

Modus levandi fines. The statute 18 Edw. I.

Modus rank, an excessive modus.

Moerda, the secret killing of another; murder.—Teutonic word.—4 Bl. Com. 194.

Mofussil, separated, particularised; the subordinate divisions of a district, in contradistinction to Sadder or Sudder, which implies the chief seat of government.—Indian.

Mofussil-Dewanny adawlut, provincial court of justice.—Ibid.

Mohatra [Fr.], a fraudulent contract to screen usury.

Moiety [fr. moitié, Fr.], one of two equal parts; an undivided half. But see 3 Prest. Abr. 35.

Molendinum, a mill.—Old Records.

Molendum, a grist; a certain quantity of corn sent to a mill to be ground.

Molestation, the name of an action competent to the proprietor of a landed estate against those who disturb his possession. It is chiefly used in questions of commonty or of controverted marches.—Scotch Law.

Molitura, or Molta, the toll or multure paid for grinding corn at a mill.

Molitura libera, a free grinding or liberty of a mill without paying toll.—Paroch. Antiq. 236.

Mollah, a doctor of laws.—Arabic.

Mollis-bœdling. See BŒDLING.

Molliter manus imposuit. An officer may lay hands upon another to turn him out of church (for instance), and prevent his disturbing the congregation; and if sued for this and the like battery, he may set forth the whole case, and plead that he laid hands upon him gently (molliter manus imposuit) for this purpose.—3 Step. Com. 489; 1 Sand. 10.

Molman, a man subject to do service.—Old Records.

Molmutian, or Molmutin laws, the laws of Dunvallo Molmutius, sixteenth king of the Britons, who reigned above four hundred years before the birth of Christ. They obtained in this country until the reign of the Conqueror. These were the first published laws in Britain; and, together with those of Queen Mercia, were translated by Gildas into Latin.—Usher's Primord. 126.

Molneda, Mulneda, a mill-pond or pond.—Paroch. Antiq. 135.

Molta. See MOLITURA.

Monachism, the state of monks.—Milton's Hist. of Eng.; Bingham's Christ. Antiq.

Monarchy [fr. μόναρχος, Gk.], a government in which the supreme power is vested in a single person. Where a monarch is invested with absolute power, the monarchy is termed despotic; where the supreme power is virtually in the laws, though the majesty of government and the administration are vested in a single person, it is a limited monarchy. It is hereditary, where the regal power descends immediately from the possessor to the next heir by blood, as in our country; or elective, as was formerly the case in Poland.

Monasticon, a book giving an account of monasteries, convents, and religious houses.

Monetagium, Monya, or Moneyage, called also focagium, a certain tribute formerly paid by tenants to their lord every third year, that he should not change the money which he had coined, when it was lawful for certain great men to coin money, but not of silver and gold, in their territories. Abrogated by 1 Hen. I. c. 2.—Hale's Hist, 217.

Also a mintage, and the right of coining or minting money.

Moneta dicitur à monendo, quia impressione monet nos cujus sit moneta.—Dav. 18.—(Money is called from monendo, because by the impression it warns us whose money it may be.)

Moneta est justum medium et mensura rerum commutabilium, nam per medium monetæ fit omnium rerum conveniens et justa æstimatio.—Dav. 18.—(Money is the just medium and measure of commutable things, for by the medium of money a convenient and just estimation of all things is made.)

Monetandi jus comprehenditur in regalibus quæ nunquam à regio sceptro abdicantur.—Dav. 18.—(The right of coining money is comprehended amongst those rights of royalty which are never separated from the kingly sceptre.)

Money [fr. moneta, Lat. fr. monendo, because by the impression upon it we are warned whose it is], the wheel of circulation, a convenient form of wealth, the universal instrument of commerce, as it facilitates the distribution of the produce of industry according to the convenience of those amongst whom it is shared; the coining of it belongs, in all states, to the sovereign power. Monetandi jus comprehenditur in regalibus quæ nunquam à regio sceptro abdicantur.—Dav. 18.—(The right of coining money is comprehended amongst those rights of royalty which never depart from the kingly sceptre.) The materials of which it is now usually made are gold, silver or other metal, and paper; its currency and the intrinsic or denominated value put upon it are by virtue of the prerogative of the Crown. It may be said that the substitution of paper for gold or silver replaces a very expensive medium of commerce by one much less costly, and sometimes more convenient, the expediency and operation of which substitution belongs to the political economy of a state. The 6th section of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 98, declares that bank notes shall be a legal tender for all sums above 5*l.*, except at the Bank of England and its branch banks; and the 56 Geo. III. c. 68, makes silver, not exceeding 40*s.*, a legal tender. Copper money not exceeding fivepence three farthings may be tendered. The enactments of 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 34, relating to the current copper coin, are to apply to coins of bronze or mixed metals, which may be issued by royal proclamation. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 30. The word 'sterling,' so often found in deeds, as applied to money, seems to be derived from Easterlings, a company of merchants, who shortly after the Norman Conquest were employed in regulating the coinage, and means 'English coined money.'

For an account of the Saxon and Norman money, consult Anc. Inst. Eng. See 2 Smi. Wealth of Nations, 24, 97, and 2 Mill's Pol. Eco. 8, 30. For a comparative table of the value of English money from the Conquest to Elizabeth, see 3 Hall. M. A. p. 370; and Ruth. Notes, c. xiii.

Moneyage. See MONETAGIUM.

Money-bill, in parliamentary language an act by which money is directed to be raised from the subject, for any purpose or in any shape soever, either for governmental purposes, and collected from the whole kingdom generally, or for the benefit of a particular district, and collected in that district, as parish-rates.

With respect to these bills, the House of Commons are so reasonably jealous of their privilege of imposing new taxes upon the subject, that they will not suffer the House of Lords to exert any other power but that of rejection; they will not pass a money-bill introduced in the House of Lords, nor permit the least alteration or amendment to be made by the House of Lords in the mode of taxing the people by bills of this nature.

Money-broker, a money-changer; a scrivener or jobber; one who lends or raises money to or for others.

Money-land. In equity, land articled or devised to be sold, and turned into money, is reputed as money; and money articled or bequeathed to be invested in land, has, in equity, many of the qualities of real estate, and is descendible and devisable as such according to the rules of inheritance in other cases, and this upon the ground that equity regards substance and not form, and will further the intention of parties. See LAND.

The authorities to show that money directed or agreed to be laid out in land is to be considered as land are very numerous. 'The force of the rule,' observes Fonblanque (1 Eq. B. 1, c. 6, s. 9, n. t), 'is particularly evinced by those cases in which it has been held, that the money agreed or directed to be laid out, so fully becomes land as, 1st, not to be personal assets; 2ndly, to be subject to the courtesy of the husband, and it should now seem to the dower of the wife (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105); 3rdly, to pass as land by will, if subject to the real use at the time the will was made; 4thly, not to pass as money by a general bequest to a legatee, but it will by a particular description, as so much money to be laid out in land, or by a bequest of all the testator's estate in law and equity. But equity will not consider money as land, unless the covenant or direction to lay it out in land be express.'

The 7 Geo. IV. c. 45, which repealed the 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 56 (commonly called Lord Eldon's Act), for barring quasi entails of money directed to be laid out in lands to be settled, was repealed by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, except so far as related to proceedings commenced under it, before the 1st of January, 1834. The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, enacts (s. 71) that lands to be sold of any tenure where the money arising from the sale thereof shall be subject to be invested in the purchase of lands to be settled, so that any person, if the lands were purchased, would have an estate-tail therein, and also money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands to be settled, so that any person, if the lands were purchased, would have an estate tail therein, shall, for the purposes of the act, be treated as the lands to be purchased, and be considered subject to the same estates as the lands to be purchased would have been actually subject to; and all the previous clauses of the act, so far as circumstances will admit, shall, in the case of lands to be sold (except copyhold), apply to such lands in the same manner as if the lands to be purchased with the money to arise from the sale thereof were directed to be freehold, and were actually purchased and settled; and shall, in the case of lands to be sold as aforesaid, being copyhold, apply to such lands, as if the lands to be purchased with the money to arise from the sale thereof were directed to be copyhold, and were actually purchased and settled; and shall, in the case of money subject to be invested in the purchase of land to be so settled as aforesaid, apply to such money in the same manner as if such money were directed to be laid out in the purchase of freehold lands, and such lands were actually purchased and settled; except that where the disposition shall be of leasehold or of money so circumstanced as aforesaid, such leasehold or money shall, as to the person in whose favor or for whose benefit the disposition is to be made, be treated as personal estate; and except as to bankruptcy, the deed of disposition thereof shall be an assignment by deed to be enrolled in Chancery within six calendar months after its execution; and in every case of bankruptcy the disposition of such leasehold or money shall be made by the commissioners, and completed by enrolment, as before directed in regard to lands not held by copy of court roll.

Money-orders, fraudulent issue of, by a post-office officer, punishable by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 88, s. 4.

Monger [fr. mangian, Sax., to trade], a dealer or seller. It is seldom or never used alone, or otherwise than after the name of any commodity, to express a seller of such commodity.

Also, a little fishing-vessel.—13 Eliz. c. 11.

Moniers, or Moneyers, ministers of the Mint; also, bankers.—Cowel.

Moniment, a memorial, superscription, or record.

Monition, a summons or citation.—Civ. Law.

Monitory letters, communications of warning and admonition sent from an ecclesiastical judge, upon information of scandals and abuses within the cognizance of his court.

Monmouth, county of, made one of the counties of the realm of England by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26.

Monocracy, a government by one person.

Monogamy [fr. μόνος, Gk., single, and γάμος, marriage], marriage of one wife.

Monomachy [fr. μόνος, Gk., and μάχη, fight], a duel; a single combat.

It was anciently allowed by law, for the trial or proof of crimes. It was even permitted in pecuniary causes, but it is now forbidden both by the civil law and canon laws.

Monomania, insanity upon a particular subject. See MENTAL ALIENATION.

Monopolia dicitur, cum unus solus aliquod genus mercaturæ universum emit, pretium ad suum libitum statuens.—11 Co. 86.—(It is said to be a monopoly, when one person alone buys up the whole of one kind of commodity, fixing a price at his own pleasure.)

Monopolies, Statute of, 21 Jac. I. c. 3.

Monopoly [fr. μόνος, Gk., single, and πωλέω, to sell], the exclusive privilege of selling any commodity. A license or privilege allowed by the Crown, for the sole buying, selling, making, working, and using of anything whatsoever, whereby the subject is restrained from that liberty of manufacturing or trading which he had before.

Such grants were very common previously to the accession of the house of Stuart, and were carried to a very oppressive and injurious extent during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The grievance became at length so insupportable, that, notwithstanding the opposition of government, which looked upon the power of granting monopolies as a very valuable part of the prerogative, they were abolished by the famous Act of 1624, the 21 Jac. I. c. 3. This act declares that all monopolies, grants, and letters-patent for the sole buying, selling, and making of goods and manufactures, shall be null and void. It excepts patents for fourteen years for the sole working or making of any new manufactures within the realm, to the true and first inventors of such manufactures, provided they be not contrary to law nor mischievous to the state. It also excepts grants by Act of Parliament to any corporation, company, or society, for the enlargement of trade, and letters-patent concerning the making of gunpowder. See LETTERS-PATENT.

A monopoly has three incidents mischievous to the public: 1st, the raising of the price; 2nd, the deterioration of the commodity; 3rd, the impoverishing of poor artificers.—11 Rep. 86. All monopolies are against the ancient and fundamental laws of the realm, and can only be created by a grant from the Crown.—21 Jac. I. c. 3. See LETTERS-PATENT.

Monster, an animal which has not the shape of mankind, but, in any part, evidently bears the resemblance of the brute creation, has no inheritable blood, and cannot be heir to any land, although it be brought forth in marriage; but though it have deformity in any part of its body, yet if it have human shape, it may be an heir.—Co. Litt. 7 b; 2 Bl. Com. 246.

Buffon divides monsters into three classes: 1st, monsters by excess; 2nd, monsters by defect; and 3rd, monsters by alteration or wrong position of parts. Frequent instances occur of an increased number of organs, members, &c. Of monsters by defect, the most remarkable are those which are born without a head, and are hence styled acephalous. These live in the womb, but do not survive after birth, since the function of respiration cannot be performed. To this class also belong those which are destitute of lungs, or one or more organs of sense, &c. The defects of the third class are seldom discovered until after death, as they are commonly internal. Among the most remarkable instances of this nature are those in which the rudiments or parts of a fœtus have been discovered.

As monsters by excess are capable of living, so by the law of France they are capable of inheriting.

The enlarged state of the clitoris, which is very common at birth, should not be mistaken for male organs. Foderé mentions cases where females have, in consequence of this, been inscribed in the baptismal registers as males; and in one case the individual was called out under the conscription law (vol. ii., p. 179).

Extra-uterine fœtuses have seldom been brought forth alive, or have long survived.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. 221.

Monstrans de droit (manifestation or plea of right), one of the common law methods of obtaining possession or restitution from the Crown of either real or personal property. It is preferred or prosecuted either on the common law or ordinary side of the Court of Chancery, or in the Exchequer.

Where the Crown is in possession under a title, the facts of which are already set forth upon record, a party aggrieved may monstrans de droit, i. e. may make, in opposition to such recorded title, a claim of right, grounded upon certain facts relied upon by him, without denying those relied upon by the Crown, and praying the judgment of the court whether, upon those facts, the Crown or the subject has the right (36 Edw. III. c. 13; 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 8). If the right be determined against the Crown, the judgment is that of ouster le main, or amoveas manus, by which judgment the Crown is instantly out of possession, and it therefore needs no actual execution.—Chit. Prerog. of the Crown, 345.

Monstrans de faits ou records (showing of deeds or records).

Upon an action brought upon an obligation after the plaintiff has declared, he ought to show his obligation, and so it is of records. Monstrans de faits differs from oyer de faits in that he who pleads the deed or record, or declares upon it, ought to show it, and the defendant may demand oyer of the same.—Cowel.

Monstraverunt, a writ which lay for tenants in ancient demesne who held lands by free charter; when they were distrained to do unto their lords other services and customs than they or their ancestors used to do. It is, however, abolished.

Monstrum, a box in which relics are kept; also, a muster of soldiers.—Cowel.

Month [fr. monath, Sax., moon, which was formerly written mone, as month was written moneth. The period in which that planet moneth, i. e. completeth its orbit.—Tooke. There are, however, no vestiges of a verb of this form in the Anglo-Saxon or any of the Gothic languages.—Jamieson. The Saxon monath is from mona, the moon; and the Gothic menath, from mena, the same; μήνη, Greek. Wachter deduces the Gothic word for moon from mana, to warn, to admonish, to instruct; and Dr. Jamieson, the Saxon mona, from monian, the same. May we not then refer also to the Greek verb μηνύω, to indicate, to point out, to declare—whence, perhaps, μήνη, the moon, and μήν, a month? If this be admitted, here is the verb to support Tooke's observation, though in other words, viz. a month meaneth the period in which that planet warns, instructs, and points out.—Todd], a space of time either measured by the sun or moon. It is either—

(1) Lunar, the time between the change and change, or the time in which the moon returns to the same point, being twenty-eight days.

(2) Solar, that period in which the sun passes through one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

(3) Calendar, by which we reckon time, consisting unequally of thirty or thirty-one days, except February, which consists of twenty-eight, and in leap year of twenty-nine days. The calendar month is also called usual, natural, civil, political.

The month of nature, or lunar revolution, is strictly 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, 3 seconds; and there are, of course, twelve such periods, and rather less than 11 days over, in a year. From an early period there were efforts among some of the civilized nations to arrange the year in a division accordant with the revolutions of the moon; but they were all strangely irregular till Julius Cæsar reformed the Calendar, by establishing the system of three years of 365 followed by one (bissextile) of 366 days, and decreed that the latter should be divided as follows:—

Januarius	31	days.
Februarius	30	„
Martius	31	„
Aprilis	30	„
Maius	31	„
Junius	30	„
Quintilis (altered to Julius)	31	„
Sextilis	30	„
September	31	„
October	30	„
November	31	„
December	30	„

The general idea of Cæsar was, that the months should consist of 31 and 30 days alternately; and this was effected in the bissextile or leap-year, consisting, as it did, of twelve times thirty with six over. In ordinary years, consisting of one day less, his arrangement gave 29 days to Februarius. Afterwards, his successor Augustus had the eighth of the series called after himself, and from vanity broke up the regularity of Cæsar's arrangement by taking another day from February to add to his own month, that it might not be shorter than July; a change which led to a shift of October and December for September and November as months of 31 days. In this arrangement, the year has since stood in all Christian countries.

The Roman names of the months, as settled by Augustus, have also been used in all Christian countries excepting Holland, where the following set of names prevails:

January	Lauwmaand	chilly month
February	Sprokelmaand	vegetation month
March	Lentmaand	spring month
April	Grasmaand	grass month
May	Blowmaand	flower month
June	Zomermaand	summer month
July	Hooymaand	hay month
August	Oostmaand	harvest month
September	Herstmaand	autumn month
October	Wynmaand	wine month
November	Slagtmaand	slaughter month
December	Wintermaand	winter month

'These characteristic names of the months are the remains of the ancient Gaulish titles, which were also used by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors.' Brady, Analysis of the Calendar.

Amidst the heats of the Revolution, the French Convention, in October 1793, adopted a set of names for the months, somewhat like that kept up in Holland, their year standing thus:

	French Months.	Signification.	English Months.
Autumn	1. Vindémiaire	Vintage	Sept. 22
	2. Brumaire	Foggy	Oct. 22
	3. Frimaire	Frosty or Sleety	Nov. 21
Winter	4. Nivose	Snowy	Dec. 21
	5. Pluviose	Rainy	Jan. 20
	6. Ventose	Windy	Feb. 19
Spring	7. Germinal	Springing or Budding	Mar. 21
	8. Floréal	Flowery	Apr. 20
	9. Prairial	Hay Harv.	May 20
Summer	10. Messidor	Corn Harv.	June 19
	11. Thermidor	Hot	July 19
	12. Fructidor	Fruit	Aug. 18

Five days at the end, corresponding to our

17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st of September, were supplementary, and named sans-culottides, in honor of the half-naked populace who took so prominent a part in the affairs of the Revolution. At the same time, to extinguish all traces of religion in the calendar, each month was divided into three decades, or periods of ten days, whereof the last was to be a holiday, the names of the days being merely expressive of numbers—Primidi, Duodi, Tredi, &c. And this arrangement was actually maintained for several years, with only this peculiarity, that many of the people preferred holding the Christian Sunday as a weekly holiday. The plan was ridiculed by an English wit in the following professed translation of the new French Calendar:—

'Autumn—wheezy, sneezy, freezy.
Winter—slippy, drippy, nippy.
Spring—showery, flowery, bowery.
Summer—hoppy, croppy, poppy.'

'Thirty days hath September,
April, June, and November;
All the rest have thirty-one,
But February twenty-eight alone,
Except in leap-year, once in four,
When February has one day more.'

Sir Walter Scott, in conversation with a friend, adverted jocularly to 'that ancient and respectable, but unknown poet who had given us the invaluable formula, Thirty days hath September, &c.' It is truly a composition of considerable age, for it appears in a play entitled The Return from Parnassus, published in 1606, as well as in Winter's Cambridge Almanack for 1635.—Chambers' Book of Days.

Our months bear the appellations first assigned to them by the Romans. But for what reason we abandoned the Saxon titles of the months, but retained the Saxon names of the days, it is difficult to conjecture. As the former were expressive of the period of the year in which they were respectively placed, and the latter merely of the names of the idols worshipped on those particular days, there does not appear to have been much judgment exercised in the rejection of the one or the retention of the other.—Brady's Clav. Calend.

Formerly, when the word month occurred in a statute, it was taken to mean a lunar month, unless calendar month was specified.—Cro. Eliz. 133. By 13 Vict. c. 21, the word 'month' shall in future Acts mean calendar months; unless words be added showing lunar months to be intended. The month, by the common law and in equity, is but twenty-eight days. In ecclesiastical matters it means a calendar month. A twelve-month, in the singular number, includes the whole year, according to the calendar; but twelve months, six months, &c. in the plural number shall be computed after the rate of twenty-eight days to every month, except in cases of presentations to benefices to avoid lapse, &c. which shall be calendar months. The word month may, indeed, mean lunar or calendar, according to the intention of the contracting parties.—1 M. and S. 111; 1 Saund. Rep. 251, n. d.

By the universal rule of the commercial world, a month is deemed, in all cases of negotiable instruments, and indeed in all commercial contracts, to be a calendar month.—Story on Bills, 379. In contracts for stock it means lunar.—Jocelyn v. Hawkins; 1 Stra. 446.

Moofly, Mufflee, the Mahomedan law-officer who declares the sentence of the court.—Indian.

Mooktear, an agent or attorney.—Ibid.

Mooktearnamar, a written authority constituting an agent or vakeel; a power of attorney.—Ibid.

Moolavy, Moulavee, a learned and religious man; an interpreter of the Mahommedan law.—Ibid.

Moor, an officer in the Isle of Man, who summons the courts for the several sheadings. The office is similar to our bailiff of a hundred.

Moot [fr. mot, gemot, Sax., meeting together], to plead a mock cause; to state a point of law by way of exercise, as was commonly done in the inns of court at appointed times.—4 Reeves, 433, 574.

Moot-case or Moot-point, a point or case unsettled and disputable, such as properly affords a topic of disputation. A case fit for exercising young students and barristers at law.

Moot-hall or Moot-house, council-chamber, hall of judgment, town-hall.

Moot-hills, hills of meeting, on which our British ancestors held their great courts. Many of these still exist not only in the British dominions but also in the Netherlands. They commonly consist of a central eminence, on which sat the judge and his assistants; beneath was an elevated platform for the parties, their friends, and 'compurgators,' who sometimes amounted to 100 or more; and this platform was surrounded with a bench to secure it from the access of the spectators.—Encyc. Lond.

Moot-man, one of those who used to argue the reader's cases in the inns of court. See MOOT-CASE.

Moota canum, a pack of dogs.—Cowel.

Mooter, a disputer of moot points.

Mooting, the chief exercise formerly performed by students in the inns of court.

Mora, a moor, marsh land, a heath, fen land, barren and unprofitable ground.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Mora mussa, a watery or boggy moor; a morass.—Mon. Ang., tom. i., p. 306.

Mora reprobatur in lege.—Jenk. Cent. 51.—(Delay is reproved in law.)

Moral actions, those only in which men have knowledge to guide them and a will to choose for themselves.—Rutherf. Nat. Law, lib. 1, c. i.

Moral evidence, testimony which is obtained neither from intuition nor demonstration, as contradistinguished from mathematical evidence.

Moratur in lege, he demurs; because the party does not proceed in pleading, but rests or abides upon the judgment of the court on a certain point, as to the legal sufficiency of his opponent's pleading. The court deliberate and determine thereupon. See DEMURRER.

Moravian, otherwise called Herrnhutters or United Brethren. A sect of Christians whose social polity is particular and conspicuous. It sprung up in Moravia and Bohemia, on the opening of that Reformation which stripped the chair of St. Peter of so many votaries, and gave birth to so many denominations of Christians. They give evidence on their solemn affirmation.—Step. Com. ii., 353, 643; iii., 59 n., 636 n.; iv., 322 n., 415 n., 439 n. See QUAKERS.

More or less (sive plus sive minus). These words in a contract, which rests in fieri, will only excuse a very small deficiency in the quantity of an estate; for if there be a considerable deficiency, the purchaser will be entitled to an abatement.—Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. 394; and see Cross v. Eglin, 2 B. & Ad. 106; Powell on Powers, 397.

Morganatic Marriage. The name denotes its Germanic origin, and it is even yet not quite out of use in that country, under the appellation of a left-handed marriage; but the earliest and clearest description of it is to be found in the Book of Feuds, though it is there wrongly attributed to the Salic law, in which no trace of it appears, by a mistake, not unusual, of referring all the customs of the Franks to that code. It is defined to be the lawful and inseparable conjunction of a single man, of noble or illustrious birth only, with a single woman of an inferior or plebeian station, upon these conditions, that neither the wife nor her children shall partake of the titles, arms, or dignity of the husband, or succeed to his inheritance, but shall be contented with a certain allowance, assigned to them by the Morganatic contract. But since these restrictions relate only to the rank of the parties, and the succession to property, without affecting the real nature of a matrimonial engagement, it must be considered in the light of a just marriage, of which it has every essential character. The marriage ceremony was in general regularly performed; the union was for life and indissoluble, and the children in other respects legitimate. This connection was very usual in most countries of Europe; but there cannot be found sufficient proof that the concubines of Charlemagne and some of the early kings of France were wives of this description, nor is there occasion to resort to that supposition in defence of their conduct, since the state of concubinage itself was little inferior to this in the public estimation. See Croke's Introd. to Horner v. Liddiard, 115—117, A.D. 1800.

Morgangina, or Morgangiva [fr. morgen, Sax., the morning, and gifan, gift], a gift on the morning after the wedding; dowry; the husband's gift to his wife on the day after the wedding.

'The day after the wedding the husband presented the morgangina or gift of the morning to his wife; it consisted of a pair of oxen yoked together, a saddled horse, a buckler, a spear and a sword, symbolical gifts which were intended to prove to her that she was associated with him in his labors and his dangers, his inseparable companion in success and in misfortune.'—Histoire de France, par Roche and Ph. Chasles.

Morosus, marshy. See MORA.

Mors dicitur ultimum supplicium.—3 Inst. 212.—(Death is denominated the extreme penalty.)

Mors omnia solvit.—Jenk. Cent. 160.—(Death dissolves all things.)

Morsellum, or Morsellus terræ, a small parcel or bit of land.—Mon. Ang. 282.

Mort d'Ancestor. See ASSISE OF MORT D'ANCESTOR.

Mortality. See BILLS OF MORTALITY.

Mortgage [fr. mort, Fr., dead, and gage, pledge], a dead pledge; a thing put into the hands of a creditor.

A mortgage is the creation of an interest in property, defeasible, i. e. annullable, upon performing the condition of paying a given sum of money, with interest thereon, at a certain time. Mortgages are either legal, which are enforceable at the Common Law, or equitable, which can be enforced only in Chancery. See EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

This conditional assurance is resorted to when a debt has been incurred or a loan of money or credit effected, in order to secure either the repayment of the one or the liquidation of the other. The debtor or borrower is then the mortgagor, who has charged or transferred his property in favor of or to the creditor or lender, who thus becomes the mortgagee. If the mortgagor pay the debt or loan and interest within the time mentioned in a clause technically called the proviso for redemption, he will be entitled to have his property again free from the mortgagee's claim; but should he not comply with such proviso, the legal estate becomes perfected in the mortgagee, i. e. indefeasible, and so lost at the Common Law to the mortgagor. It is redeemable, however, in a Court of Equity upon the payment of the debt or loan, with interest and expenses, at any period within twenty years after the last recognition of the mortgage security by the mortgagee; and this because Equity deems the non-compliance with the proviso for redemption a penalty, against which it always relieves when practicable.

Seeing that in by far the greater number of loan transactions the mortgagor never performs the condition in the proviso for redemption, they have been denominated mortgages, as the pledge is then dead or lost (mortuum vadium) to the mortgagor at law. A mortgage differs from a vifgage (vivum vadium), so called because neither loan nor property is lost, for the creditor enters into possession of the estate, and receives its proceeds in satisfaction of his debt with interest, upon which the debtor becomes entitled to his own again. A Welsh mortgage is one in which the creditor receives the proceeds of his security in satisfaction of the interest of his debt, the principal remaining due and the estate never becoming forfeited, but redeemable at any time; and the creditor not being entitled to sue at law in the absence of a covenant or bond, or to foreclose in equity. When property is conveyed to a mortgagee and his heirs, until out of its rents the loan and interest shall have been received, this is in the nature of a Welsh mortgage, and has been compared to a tenancy by elegit.

In order to protect a necessitous mortgagor from the exacting grasp of an inexorable mortgagee, Equity will not suffer any compact whatever to infringe the right of redeeming a mortgage in its courts. The right or equity of redemption then is the chief and inseparable incident to a mortgage—an incident unextinguishable save by a foreclosure decree, a legislative provision, or unreasonable delay.

In applying this inflexible principle practically, it is especially needful to distinguish between a mortgage and a conditional or defeasible settlement or purchase, which is sometimes a matter of great nicety, seeing that neither particular language nor any set form of assurance is necessary to constitute a mortgage. For while Equity will not countenance any scheme for converting a mortgage into a purchase; yet if the transaction is manifestly a settlement or purchase, with a reservation in the settlor or grantor to defeat it on the payment of a given sum within a stipulated time, it will be strictly enforced.

In determining the real character of the contract, the fact of the instrument not having a covenant for the repayment of the consideration-money, or containing uses or a declaration to bar dower, or the expressed consideration being an equivalent for the property, or possession of the property having been taken by the grantee at the time of the execution of the instrument, or the expense of the instrument having been defrayed by the grantee, materially favors the conclusion of a purchase rather than a mortgage.

The following maxims as to mortgage are universally true:—That a mortgage cannot be one-sided, but mutual, i. e. if it be a mortgage as to one party, it must be so as to all; that a creditor shall never obtain any advantage by reason of his debtor's difficulties beyond the liquidation of his debt, interest, and expenses; that once a mortgage always a mortgage; that a mortgage can no more be made irredeemable than a distress irrepleviable; that a mortgage cannot assume another shape by one and the same deed; and that a mortgagee cannot contract with the mortgagor, at the time of the loan, for the purchase of the security at a given price, should default be made in paying off the debt at the appointed day; but this does not render invalid an agreement that the mortgagor, in case he think fit to sell, shall give the mortgagee a preference of pre-emption or refusal, since the mortgagor retains the option of sale; he may redeem or sell, and is not bound to price; and read Hawkins v. Gathercole, 3 Eq. Rep. 348.

Whoever can lawfully sell and purchase property may become mortgagors and mortgagees of it. Equity will direct a mortgage of an infant's estate for payment of his ancestor's debts, by virtue of 1 Wm. IV. c. 47, s. 11; and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 60. By 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 65, the Lord Chancellor may order the estate of a lunatic to be mortgaged.

Every kind of property may be mortgaged except pensions for future services (but pensions for wounds, until the further order of the Crown can be mortgaged, Knight v. Bulkeley, 27 L. T. Ch. 592); the salaries and emoluments of public functionaries; full pay and half pay of naval and military men; retiring allowance of a person liable to serve again, or of a servant of the East India Company; commissions in the army; church livings with cure of souls, pursuant to 13

Eliz. c. 20, revived by 57 Geo. III. c. 99, which was not repealed by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106 so far as it repealed any former acts; and canonries or other ecclesiastical offices.

While an increase in the rate of interest upon default of regular payment is a penalty, and is not admissible, the reservation of a higher rate, with an abatement for punctual payment, may be made.

The modes by which the different kinds of property may be legally mortgaged are these—

(1) Freeholds. They are mortgaged either in fee or for the interest in them, of which the mortgagor is seised, or by demise for a long term of years, with a proviso that if the loan and interest be paid at a given day, the legal estate shall be re-conveyed to the mortgagor, or the mortgage-deed shall become void, or the term determine. In a mortgage of a freehold by demise, the mortgagor sometimes covenants that upon default he or his heirs will, at his or their own costs, do all lawful acts for confirming the term, or, if required, for conveying the reversion in fee to such person as the mortgagee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall direct.

When an owner in fee in possession mortgages, the grant of the title-deeds should always be inserted in the mortgage-deed, and their custody handed over to the mortgagee, who would be postponed to a subsequent mortgagee, if his neglect to take them were so gross as to amount to evidence of a fraudulent intention. Perry Herrick v. Attwood (L. C.), 27 L. J. Ch. 121. A first mortgagee can maintain an action of detinue against a second mortgagee, with whom the mortgagor had deposited the genuine conveyance to himself, having delivered a forged one to the first mortgagee. See Newton v. Beck, 3 H. and N. 220.

(2) Entails. The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 21, provides that the disposition by tenant-in-tail, by way of mortgage, or for any other limited purpose, shall, to the extent of the estate created, be an absolute bar in equity as well as at law, to all persons as against whom such disposition is by the act authorized to be made, notwithstanding any intention to the contrary, expressed or implied in the deed by which the disposition may be effected, provided, that if the estate created by such disposition shall be only an estate pur autre vie, or for years absolute or determinable, or if an interest, charge, lien, or incumbrance, should be created, without a term of years absolute or determinable, or any greater estate for securing or raising the same, such disposition should, in equity, be a bar only so far as may be necessary to give full effect to the mortgage, or to such interest, lien, charge, or incumbrance, notwithstanding any intention to the contrary expressed or implied in the deed by which the disposition may be effected. The 38th section enacts, that a voidable estate created in favor of a purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration shall (so far as a subsequent assurance by the tenant-in-tail can operate under the provisions of the act) be confirmed by such assurance, excepting as against a purchaser not having express notice of the first assurance.

(3) Copyholds. They are for the most part mortgaged by conditional surrender in the manor court by the mortgagor to the mortgagee and his heirs, to be void on payment of the loan with interest on a given day, pursuant to a covenant to surrender contained in a deed, in which the mortgagor covenants for title, payment of loan and interest, &c. The condition should be entered on the rolls, and immediately followed by the surrender, that the true state of the title may appear on the manor-records. On performance of the condition, the mortgagor-surrenderor is in possession as of his old estate, without readmission or fine, upon the conditional mortgagee-surrenderee giving a warrant to the steward to vacate the surrender. In the absence of a special custom, the lord cannot compel a conditional surrenderee to be admitted, even after condition broken. If, however, he be admitted, and the condition is broken, his estate is absolute; and upon paying the mortgage debt, a readmission of the mortgagor will be necessary, and he then acquires a new estate.

Whilst a mortgage transaction rests in covenant, if the mortgagee assign his equitable interest, and the mortgagor surrender to such assignee, the lord may be compelled by mandamus to admit him on payment of a single fine.

(4) Leaseholds. They are usually mortgaged by underlease at a nominal rent, reserving the last day of the original term in the mortgagor, who covenants to pay the rent and perform the covenants contained in the lease. In this way the mortgagee avoids liability to the lessee's covenants which run with the land. When a renewable lease is mortgaged, the mortgagor should be required to covenant that he will concur, at his own expense, in all lawful acts for obtaining its renewal, and that if he refuse, the mortgagee may renew and charge the estate with the expenses and interest.

A mortgagee of a leasehold should see that the rent is paid, and the covenants of the lease are performed, otherwise he risks the loss of his security by the lessor entering upon the property, and determining the lease.

A provision for fire-assurance is expedient in the mortgage of buildings, which may be effected either by the mortgagor in his own name, and then assigning it to the mortgagee, or by the mortgagor in the mortgagee's name, which dispenses with an assignment.

(5) To raise portions under trust terms. In providing for the raising of portions, it should be expressed when the portion shall vest, when it shall be payable, and the rate of interest it shall carry after it becomes payable, and until it is raised. Provisoes should be inserted, that the trustees may, after the deaths of the life-tenants, or in their lifetime, if they shall direct, raise any part of the portion for advancement of a child, and shall after the deaths of the life-tenants, and until the portion is payable raise a stated sum for maintenance, not exceeding the amount of interest on the principal of the portion, and that the trustees shall not mortgage or sell until the portion becomes payable. The usual mode of raising the portion by mortgage is for the portionist to assign to the mortgagee his share of the sum to be raised, giving the mortgagee a power of attorney to receive it. If the term be reversionary, the life-tenant demises a proportionate part of the estate to the mortgagee for 99 years, provided such tenant so long live, upon trust for him to receive the rents until default shall be made in payment of the interest, and then for the mortgagee to receive the rents and retain his interest. The trustees of the term assign a proportional part of the premises comprised in the term to the mortgagee, with a proviso of redemption either by the tenant for life, or the expectant, on payment of the loan for the portion and costs. The life-tenant, or, if the term be in possession, the remainder-man covenants for payment of the loan and interest, and for title.

(6) To pay debts by executors, by trustees for sale, and under powers of charging. An executor may raise money required for the general purposes of the will by a mortgage of the assets, provided the will do not direct a peremptory sale. The mortgage-deed need not state that the loan is wanted for the purposes of the will, for in order to vitiate the security it must be proved that the money was not for such purpose. The mortgagee is not bound to see to the application of his advance. If, however, the will name a particular fund for the payment of debts, a mortgagee should then inquire if such fund have been exhausted.

(7) Advowsons. They should be mortgaged in fee with a power of sale, not, however, exercisable during a vacancy, for they cannot produce any profit by presentment, nor can any value be put upon them in an account upon a redemption, so as to lessen the debt, since on a vacancy, the mortgagor, as actual owner, has the right of nomination, and can compel the mortgagee, as having the legal estate, to present his nominee, although there may be an express agreement to the contrary.

(8) Rectories impropriate and tithes in lay hands. These may be mortgaged as any other species of realty.

If a warrant of attorney be given by an incumbent, and nothing appears therein necessarily leading to the conclusion that it was intended indirectly to create a charge on his living, it is valid, and the profits of the living may be taken under a judgment and sequestration. The grant of an annuity with a warrant of attorney is the expedient resorted to for raising money. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, provides a form of mortgage of the glebe, tithes, rents, and profits of a benefice for building a fit residence for the parson.

(9) Turnpike-tolls. See 3 Geo. IV. c. 126.

(10) Acts of Parliament frequently confer powers to charge property for manifold purposes, and the form of security is usually provided. It is obvious then that the statute must not only be consulted, but followed in all its special provisions. As specimens, see 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 71, ss. 77 & 78; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 73, s. 11 (Tithe Commutation); 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 101; 11 Vict. c. 22 (Drainage); and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 133 (Inclosure of Commons).

It is usual for the act to indemnify a mortgagee against the misapplication of his loan, but if it do not, he will be bound to see that his money is applied to the purposes of the given act, although it be paid to the person appointed by the act to receive it.

(11) Wife's Property. When husband and wife mortgage the wife's estate for his purposes, there is a resulting trust for her benefit, since her estate is considered as surety only for the debt. The wife or her heir is, therefore, entitled to redeem after the husband's death, notwithstanding that the equity of redemption may be reserved to the husband and his heirs, or to the husband and wife, and their heirs, unless a contrary intention be clearly expressed.—Heather v. O'Neill; 2 De Gex. and J. 399. A similar rule obtains in a mortgage of a wife's chattels-real, her personal representative in case of her death being then entitled. The husband's assets are liable to exonerate the wife's estate from such charge.

(12) Public Stock. This may be either the security for a debt or loan, or itself the subject of loan.

The mortgagee of stock in possession may sell immediately after forfeiture, but where the stock is in reversion, he cannot dispose of it, until he has made it his own by foreclosure.

A stock mortgage is made on the terms of securing a retransfer of the same amount of stock sold out, irrespective of the state of the funds at the time named for such retransfer.

(13) Fund in Court. When this is assigned, the assignee should obtain a stop-order, by which he gains a priority over an assignee who has neglected to obtain one, and prevents the fund from being transferred to the assignor.

(14) Chattels Personal. These are mortgaged by assignment, and if the property be in the possession of others, notice should be forthwith given to them, in order to preserve the priority of the charge. If it be a policy of assurance, notice should be given to the assurance-office.

(15) Ships. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

(16) Freight. The reward for carrying goods over the sea if in a charter-party may be assigned independently of the ship, and is not within the Registry Acts.

(17) Building Societies. See Stone on Benefit Building Societies.

(18) Factors may pledge goods consigned to them pursuant to 4 Geo. IV. c. 83; amended by 6 Geo. IV. c. 94.

(19) Policies of Life Assurance. These are not safe securities, as the mortgagee will have to pay the annual premium if not paid by the mortgagor, unless he can resort to a fund for this purpose. A life-policy is frequently given by way of collateral security. Notice of an assignment of a policy should be given to the insurance office as a protection against bankruptcy, but where a policy is effected in the mortgagee's name, notice is unnecessary, as there is no assignment of it, but only a covenant by the mortgagor to pay the premiums.

(20) Debts. A person lending money on the assignment of a debt should be careful to ascertain from the debtor whether he owes such a debt, so as to avoid any after-dispute; to protect himself by an express provision in the mortgage-assignment from being obliged to sue for the debt, since in its absence he would be liable for any loss occasioned by his delay to enforce the payment of the debt; to take, when the debt is recoverable at law, a power of attorney to sue in the assignor-mortgagor's name; and to give to the debtor prompt notice of such assignment, in order that he may be estopped from paying the debt to any other person, and also protecting his security from the consequences of the mortgagor's bankruptcy.—Consult Powell or Coote on Mortgages.

Mortgagee, he that takes or receives a mortgage.

Mortgagor, or Mortgager, he that gives a mortgage.

Morth [Sax.], open murder, answering exactly to the French assassinat or muerte de guet-apens.

Morthlaga, a murderer.

Morthlage, murder.

Mortification, a sort of mortmain.—Scotch term.

Mortis causâ donatio. See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSÂ.

Mortmain [fr. mort, Fr., dead, and main, hand], such a state of possession of land as makes it inalienable; whence it is said to be in a dead hand—in a hand that cannot shift away the property. Lands in mortmain are a dead weight upon commerce.

By several old statutes, alienation of lands and tenements in mortmain, i. e. to religious and other corporations, which were supposed to hold them in a dead or unserviceable hand, were prohibited under pain of forfeiture to the lord, the fruits of whose feudal seignory (the great hinge of government in those days) were thus impaired. But by the concurrent consent of the immediate and all other subordinate lords, with that of the lord paramount, i. e. the king, this forfeiture might be dispensed with. And the 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 37, made a license from the Crown a sufficient dispensation in all such cases. See Step. Com. i. 362, 459, 465; iii. 135, 193; iv. 588, 604; and CHARITABLE USES.

Mortmain, Statute of, or de religiosis, 7 Edw. I. Its object was to aid in enforcing the provisions of the Great Charter on the subject of alienation to religious societies, and to carry that restriction somewhat further.—2 Reeves, 154.

Mortpay, dead pay; payment not made.

Mortuary, a burial place; a gift left by a man at his death to his parish church, for the recompense of his personal tithes and offerings not duly paid in his lifetime. Also, a kind of ecclesiastical heriot, being a customary gift claimed by and due to the minister in very many parishes, on the death of his parishioners. Like lay heriots, they were originally only voluntary bequests to the church. It was usual in ancient times to bring the mortuary to church along with the corpse when it was brought to be buried, and thence it is sometimes called a corpse-present. In the laws of Canute it was called soul-scot, or saule-sceat, which signifies pecunia sepulchralis, or symbolum animæ. The lord must have the best good left him as a heriot; and the church the second best as a mortuary.

The variety of customs with regard to mortuaries, giving frequently a handle to exactions on the one side, and frauds or expensive litigations on the other, it was thought proper, by statute 21 Hen. VIII. c. 6, to reduce them to some kind of certainty. For this purpose it is enacted that all mortuaries or corse-presents to parsons of any parish shall be taken in the following manner, unless where, by custom, less or none at all is due, viz.: for every person who does not leave goods to the value of ten marks, nothing; for every person who leaves goods to the value of ten marks and under 30*l.*, 3*s.* 4*d.*; if above 30*l.* and under 40*l.*, 6*s.* 8*d.*; if above 40*l.*, of what value soever they may be, 10*s.* and no more. And no mortuary shall, throughout the kingdom, be paid for the death of any feme covert, or child, or any one of full age, that is not a housekeeper, nor for any wayfaring man, whose mortuary shall be paid in the parish to which he belongs.—2 Bl. Com. 427; 4 Reeves, 207.

It has been sometimes used in a civil as well as in an ecclesiastical sense, and applied to a payment to the lord of the fee.—Paroch. Antiq. 470.

Mortuum vadium, a dead pledge or mortgage. See MORTGAGE.

Mortuus est [Lat.] (he is dead).

Mos retinendus est fidelissimæ vetustatis.—4 Co. 78.—(A custom of the truest antiquity is to be retained.)

Mote, a meeting, an assembly, used in composition as burgmote, folkmote, &c. See GEMOT.

Mote-bell, the bell which was used by the Saxons to summon people to the court.

Moteer, a customary service or payment at the mote or court of the lord, from which some were exempted by charter or privilege.

Mother-church [primaria ecclesia, Lat.], the parish church.

Mothering, a custom of visiting parents on Midlent Sunday.

Mother-in-law, the mother of one's wife or husband.

Motibilis, one that may be moved or displaced; also, a vagrant.—Fleta, l. 5, c. vi.

Motion, an occasional application to a court of law or equity, by the parties or their counsel, in order to obtain some rule or order, which becomes necessary either in the progress of a cause, or summarily and wholly unconnected with plenary proceedings. As to motions in Chancery, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 140; and as to motions at Common Law, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1564.

There are three kinds of motions in Chancery: (1) As of course, which seek an order grantable without hearing both sides; (2) Special, for an order grantable only upon discretion, subdivided into (a) ex parte and (b) upon notice duly served upon the other litigants; and (3) Appeal, which is made to the Court of Appeal when a dissatisfied party seeks to discharge or vary an order pronounced upon motion by the Master of the Rolls, or one of the three Vice-Chancellors.

In Parliament and other public assemblies, the proposing of any matter for consideration.

Movables [some write this word moveable, but there is no necessity for retaining the e any more than in immovable, where Dr. Johnson himself omits it], goods, furniture, personalty.

Moult, a mow of corn or hay.

Mulatto, a person born of one white and one black parent.

Mulct, a fine of money or a penalty.

Mulier (1) a woman; (2) a virgin; (3) a wife.—1 Inst. 243.

Mulier puisné, when a man has a bastard son, and afterwards marries the mother, and by her has also a legitimate son, the elder son is bastard eigné, and the younger son is mulier puisné.

Mulieratus, a legitimate son.—Glanv.

Mulieres ad probationem statûs hominis admitti non debent.—Co. Litt. 6.—(Women ought not to be admitted to proof of the state of a man.)

Mulierty, lawful issue, because begotten e muliere (of a wife) and not ex concubinâ.

Mullones fœni, cocks or ricks of hay.

Mulmutin laws. See MOLMUTIAN LAWS.

Mulneda, a place to build a water-mill.—Mon. ii. 284.

Multa, or Multura, Episcopi, a fine or final satisfaction, anciently given to the king by the bishops; that they might have power to make their wills; and that they might have the probate of other men's wills, and the granting of administrations.—2 Inst. 291.

Multa conceduntur per obliquum, quæ non conceduntur de directo.—6 Co. 47.—(Many things are obliquely conceded which are not conceded directly.)

Multa ignoramus quæ nobis non laterent si veterum lectio nobis fuit familiaris.—10 Co. 73. (We are ignorant of many things which would not be hidden from us if the reading of old authors was familiar to us.)

Multa in jure communi contra rationem disputandi, pro communi utilitate, introducta sunt. Co. Litt. 70.—(Many things contrary to the rule of argument are introduced into the common law for common utility.)

Multa multo exercitatione facilius quam regulis percipies.—4 Inst. 50.—(You will perceive many things more easily by practice than by rules.)

Multa non vetat lex, quæ tamen tacitè damnavit.—(The law forbids not many things which yet it has silently condemned.)

Multa transeunt cum universitate quæ non per se transeunt.—Co. Litt. 12.—(Many things pass in the whole, which do not pass by themselves.)

Multifarious, having different respects or great diversity in itself.

Multifariousness in a bill in equity, is improperly joining in one bill distinct and independent matters, and thereby confounding them; as, for example, the uniting in one bill of several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected, against one defendant, or the demand of several matters of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants in the same bill. In strictness of language, it would be more correct to call it a misjoinder where different and distinct claims are mixed in the same bill against the same defendant. Multifariousness as to one defendant constitutes no necessary ground of objection by the other defendants; for a bill may be multifarious as to one defendant, and not as to the rest. What is more familiarly understood by the term multifariousness, as applied to a bill, is where a party is able to say he is made a defendant upon a record, with a large portion of which, and of the case made by which, he has no connection whatever. But to lay down any rule, applicable universally, or to say what constitutes multifariousness as an abstract proposition, is, upon the authorities, utterly impossible.

Although a bill is ordinarily open to objection for multifariousness which contains two distinct subjects, wholly disconnected with each other; yet, if one of them be clearly without the jurisdiction of a court of equity for redress, it seems that the court will treat the bill as if it were single, and proceed with the other matter, over which it has jurisdiction, as if it constituted the whole and sole object of the bill. And a bill is not to be treated as multifarious because it joins two good causes of complaint, growing out of the same transaction, where all the defendants are interested in the same claim of right, and where the relief asked for, in relation to each, is of the same general character.

The objection to multifariousness is usually taken by demurrer, and if not so taken, and the cause goes on to hearing, the objection will not then always be fatal to the suit. But should the bill be artfully framed, so that from that, or from some other cause, the objection does not appear on the face of the bill, the defendant may take advantage thereof by setting forth the special matter by a plea.—Story's Eq. Plead. 224.

At common law, it has been laid down in numerous modern cases, that a replication cannot be objected to as multifarious, if the facts stated in the plea, though they are several, constitute one ground of defence; for that the rule of pleading is not that the issue must be joined on a single fact, but on a single point of defence. But it is a matter of no little difficulty to ascertain whether several facts which go towards the constituting of a defence are so connected as to form one complete point of defence, so as to admit of the application of this rule. See the cases collected in 2 Saund. Rep. by Williams, 295 c.

Multi multa, nemo omnia novit.—4 Inst. 348. (Many men have known many things; no one has known everything.)

Multipartite [fr. multus, Lat., many, and pars, a part], divided into several parts.

Multiple poinding, a double distress, in Scotch law, which gives name to an action that may be brought by a person possessed of money or effects liable to claims from different claimants. Thus, where the rents of an estate are claimed by different persons, the tenant may raise an action of multiple poinding, calling the different parties to dispute their preferences, and to have it proved that the tenant is liable once, and in a single payment only.—Scotch term.

Multiplex et indistinctum parit confusionem; et quæstiones quo simpliciores, eo lucidiores.—Hob. 335.—(Multiplicity and indistinctness produce confusion; and questions, the more simple they are, the more lucid.)

Multiplicatâ transgressione crescat pœnæ inflictio.—2 Inst. 479.—(Let infliction of punishment increase with multiplied crime.)

Multiplicity, more than one of the same kind.

A bill in equity may be objectionable for an undue divisibility or splitting up of a single cause of suit, and thus multiplying subjects of litigation. Equity discourages unreasonable litigation; it will not, therefore, permit a bill to be brought for a part of a matter only, where the whole is the proper subject of one suit. Upon a somewhat analogous ground, if an ancestor have made two mortgages, the heir will not be allowed to redeem one without the other; for in such a case, the equity of the heir, like that of the ancestor, is to redeem the whole or neither. The objection may be taken by way of plea; for it is against the whole policy of courts of equity to encourage multiplicity of suits.—Story's Eq. Plead. 234.

It is a rule of pleading, at common law, that where a subject comprehends multiplicity of matter, there, in order to avoid prolixity, general pleading is allowable.—2 Saund. Rep. 410.

Multitude, an assembly of ten or more persons.

Multitudinem decem faciunt.—Co. Litt. 247. (Ten make a multitude.)

Multitudo errantium non parit errori patrocinium.—11 Co. 75.—(The multitude of those who err gives no excuse to error.)

Multitudo imperitorum perdit curiam.—2 Inst. 219.—(A multitude of ignorant persons destroys a court.)

Multo, a wether sheep.—Old Records.

Multo fortiori. See A FORTIORI.

Multo utilius est pauca idonea effundere, quam multis inutilibus homines gravari.—4 Co. 20.—(It is more useful to pour forth a few useful things than to oppress men with many useless things.)

Multure [fr. moulture, Fr.; fr. molo, Lat., to grind], a grist or grinding; the corn ground; also the toll or fee due for grinding.

In Scotch law, a certain stipulated quantity of meal given as payment to the proprietor or tackman of a mill for grinding the corn.—Encyc. Lond.

Mund, peace, whence mundbryc, a breach of the peace.

Mundbyrd, a receiving into favor and protection.

Munera, portions of lands distributed to tenants, and revocable at the lord's will under our early feudal system.

Municipal [fr. municipalis, Lat. of munus, office, and capio, I take, or hold], belonging to a corporation.

Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, by which the corporate towns or boroughs enumerated in the schedules A and B annexed thereto (comprising, with the exception of London, and a few other places, the whole of those in England and Wales), are placed under one uniform plan of constitution thereby newly devised.

The definition of a burgess in the boroughs comprised in the act (that is, a burgess entitled to such new rights as the act for the first time confers upon these boroughs) is a male person of full age, not an alien, nor having received, within the last twelvemonths, parochial relief, or alms or pension, or charitable allowance from the charitable trustees of the borough, who, on the last day of August in any year, shall have occupied any house, warehouse, counting-house, or shop, within the borough during that year, and the whole of the two preceding years; and during such occupation shall also have been an inhabitant householder within the borough, or within seven miles thereof, and shall, during such time, have been rated in respect of such premises to all rates for relief of the poor, and have paid all such rates, and all borough rates, in respect of the same premises, except those payable for the last six calendar months; and shall be duly enrolled in that year as a burgess on the burgess-roll. But when the premises come to the party by descent, marriage, marriage settlement, devise, or promotion to any benefice or office, he is entitled to reckon the occupancy and rating of the person from whom they were so derived.

It is further provided, that in every borough there shall be elected, annually, a mayor, and periodically, a certain number of aldermen, and of councillors, who, together, shall constitute the council of the borough; that they shall be respectively chosen from among persons on, or entitled to be on, the burgess list, and otherwise qualified as in the act described; that the councillors shall be elected by the burgesses, and the mayor and aldermen by the council; that the council shall meet once a quarter (and oftener, if due notice be given) for transaction of the general business of the borough, and make their decisions according to the majority of the members present (if those present amount to one-third of the whole), and that the mayor or other member presiding in his absence, shall have a casting vote; that at any meeting at which two-thirds at least of the whole shall attend, the council may make bye-laws for the good rule and government of the borough, for the prevention and suppression of nuisances, and for the imposition of fines on persons in that behalf offending; that the burgesses shall annually elect from among those qualified to be councillors, two auditors and two assessors; the former to audit the accounts of the borough, the latter to assist in revising the burgess list; and that the council also may appoint a town clerk and a treasurer (neither of whom is to be a member of the council), and such other officers as have been usual, or shall be necessary, and shall be empowered to fix their salaries; and if the borough have a separate court of quarter sessions, shall also appoint a coroner and a clerk of the peace.

The council of any borough which is desirous that a separate court of quarter sessions should be holden there, may petition the Crown for that purpose, and if the application be granted, the Crown shall appoint a recorder, who shall be sole judge of such court of quarter sessions, as also of the court of record for civil actions, if there be any, and if it be not regulated by any local Act of Parliament, and no barrister of five years' standing sat therein when the act passed.

To certain boroughs, and to such others as may petition for it, the Crown may also grant a commission of the peace, and nominate such persons to be justices as it shall think proper; and the mayor and recorder are respectively justices of the peace, ex officio.

It is provided, subject however to certain exceptions, that the council shall not sell or mortgage the land or public stock of the borough, or demise them for more than a certain term; and that the rents, profits, and interest of all corporate property shall be paid to the treasurer, and carried to the account of the borough fund, which, after discharging debts, shall be applied to the payment of salaries, the expenses connected with the corporate elections, prosecutions, gaols, and maintenance of offenders, and other public purposes; that the surplus (if any) shall be expended for the public benefit of the inhabitants, and the deficiency (if any) made up by a rate; and that the accounts shall be at all times open to inspection and regularly audited and printed for the use of the rate-payers, and submitted to the Secretary of State, and laid before both Houses of Parliament.

This act distinguishes between the rights newly conferred by it and the former rights of the corporators, with regard to the corporate property, and as to voting at parliamentary elections; both which former rights are expressly reserved; it being provided that every inhabitant, and every person admitted a freeman or burgess, and the wife, or widow, or son, or daughter of any freeman or burgess; and every apprentice, shall enjoy the same share and benefit of the lands and public stock of the borough as he might have enjoyed in case the act had not been passed; subject to the limitation, however, that the total amount to be divided among such persons shall not exceed the surplus which shall remain after payment of the expenses, by the act charged upon the borough fund. And that every person who, if the act had not been passed, would have enjoyed as a burgess or freeman, or might thereafter have acquired in respect of birth or servitude, the right of voting in the election of members of Parliament, shall be entitled to enjoy or acquire such right of voting as fully as he might in that case have done. And the town clerk of every borough is to make out a list (to be called the freeman's list) of all persons admitted burgesses or freemen, for the purpose of such reserved rights as aforesaid, as distinguished from the burgesses newly created by the act, and entitled to the rights which it newly confers.

No person shall in future be a burgess or freeman by gift or purchase; the effect of which is to leave no other title in force, as regards the right to be placed on the freeman's roll, but those of birth, marriage, and servitude as an apprentice. It abolishes (though with a reservation of the rights of the then existing claimants) the exemptions that had been ordinarily claimed by burgesses, inhabitants, or the like, for such tolls or dues as are levied to the use of the body corporate.

In divers boroughs a custom had prevailed, and bye-laws had been made, that no person not being free of the borough or of certain guilds, mysteries, or trading companies therein, should keep a shop for merchandise, or use certain trades or occupations for gain within the same, and the act provides that every person may in future keep any shop, and use any lawful trade and occupation therein, any such custom or bye-laws notwithstanding. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50; 22 Vict. c. 35; and 23 Vict. c. 16.

Municipal law, that which pertains solely to the citizens and inhabitants of a state, and is thus distinguished from political law, commercial law, and the law of nations.

It is now, however, more usually applied to the customary laws that obtain in any particular city or province, and which have no authority in neighboring places.

Muniment [fr. munio, Lat., to fortify], support, defence, record; writing upon which claims and rights are founded and depend; evidences, charters.

Muniment-house, or Muniment-room, a house or room of strength, in cathedrals, collegiate churches, castles, colleges, public buildings, &c., purposely made for keeping deeds, charters, writings, &c.

Munitions of war. As to patents for their inventions to be kept secret, see 22 Vict. c. 13.

Murage [fr. murus, Lat., a wall], money paid to keep walls in repair.

Muratio, a town or borough surrounded with walls.

Murder [fr. morthor, morthen, Sax.; murdrum, law Lat. The etymology requires that it should be written, as it anciently often was, murther; but of late the word itself has commonly, and its derivatives have universally, been written with d.—Dr. Johnson. The etymology of the Saxon morth, whence morthor, and of the M. Gothic maurthr, require murther; but murder has the authority of the Su. Gothic mord, the Teutonic moord, and the old French murdre.—Todd], the act of killing a man unlawfully or criminally.

The legal definition of murder is when a person of sound memory and discretion unlawfully kills any reasonable creature with malice aforethought, either express or implied.

(1) The person committing the offence must be of sound memory and discretion, for infants and insane people are incapable of committing any crime, unless they evince a consciousness of doing wrong, and a discernment between good and evil. See MENTAL ALIENATION.

(2) It must be an unlawful killing by any means which superinduces death within a year and a day after the cause of death administered.

(3) The person killed must be a reasonable creature in being, and under the Queen's peace.

(4) The killing must be with malice aforethought.

Every person convicted of murder shall suffer death as a felon.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 1.

Murderment, murder. Obsolete.

Murdre, any kind of concealment, or stifling.

Murdrum, the secret killing of another, also the amerciament to which the vill wherein it was committed, or, if that were too poor, the whole hundred was liable.

As to the rates of compensation for murder amongst the Anglo-Saxons, see 2 Hall. M. A. p. 275.

Murorum operatio, the service of work and labor done by inhabitants and adjoining tenants in building or repairing the walls of a city or castle; their personal service was commuted into murage.

Murthlach. See MORTLAGE.

Mussa, a moss or marsh ground; or a place where sedges grow; a place overrun with moss. Cowel.

Muster-book, a book in which the forces are registered.

Muster-master, one who superintends the muster to prevent frauds.

Muster-roll, a register of forces.

Muta-canum, a kennel of hounds, one of the mortuaries to which the Crown was entitled at a bishop's or abbot's decease.—2 Bl. Com. 426.

Mutilation, deprivation of a limb or any essential part. See MAYHEM.

Mutiny Act, a statute annually passed 'to punish mutiny and desertion, and for the better payment of the army and their quarters.' It regulates the manner in which they are to be dispersed among the several innkeepers and victuallers through the kingdom, and establishes a law martial for their government. By it, besides other things comprised in the articles of war, enumerated and enforced in this act, it is enacted that if any officer or soldier shall excite or form any mutiny, or, knowing of it, shall not give notice to the commanding officer, or shall desert or enlist in any other regiment, or sleep upon his post, or leave it before he is relieved, or hold correspondence with a rebel or an enemy, or strike or use violence to his superior officer, or shall disobey his lawful commands, such offender shall suffer such punishment as a court-martial shall inflict, though it extend to death itself.

The first of these acts was passed on the 12th April, 1689. See 26 & 27 Vict. c. 8.

Mutseddey, Mutseddee, intent upon; also writer, accountant, or secretary.—Indian.

Mutual, reciprocal, each acting in return, or in correspondence to the other.

Mutual debts, money due on both sides between two persons.

Mutual promises, concurrent considerations, which will support each other, unless one or the other be void; in which case, there being no consideration on the one side, no contract can arise. But if the promise on one side be only voidable, as in consideration of money given, or of a promise by an infant, it is sufficient.

Mutual promises, however, to be obligatory, must be made simultaneously. If they be made at different times on the same day, they will not be a good consideration for each other, because of the want of reciprocity of obligation at the moment the contract is made.—Story on Contracts, 81.

Mutual testament, wills made by two persons who leave their effects reciprocally to the survivor.

Mutuality, reciprocation; an acting in return.

Mutuation, the act of borrowing.

Mutuatus, having borrowed.

Mutuo, to borrow or lend.

Mutus, silent, not having anything to say.

Standing mute is when a person, being arraigned, either cannot speak, or refuses to answer or plead. Regularly, a prisoner is said to stand mute when, being arraigned, he either (1) makes no answer at all, or (2) answers foreign to the purpose, or with such matter as is not allowable, and will not answer otherwise, or (3) having pleaded not guilty, refuses to put himself upon the country.—2 Hale, P. C. 316. By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 1, he shall by the plea of not guilty, without any farther form, be deemed to have put himself upon the country for trial, and the court shall order a jury for the trial of such person accordingly.

By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 2, it is enacted, that if any person, being arraigned upon or charged with any indictment or information for treason, felony, piracy, or misdemeanor, shall stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to the indictment or information, in every such case it shall be lawful for the court, if it shall so think fit, to order the proper officer to enter a plea of 'not guilty' on behalf of such person; and the plea so entered shall have the same force and effect as if such person had actually pleaded the same. When there is reason to doubt whether the prisoner is sane, a jury should be charged to inquire whether he be sane or not; which jury may consist of any twelve persons who may happen to be present, and upon this issue the question will be whether he has intellect enough to plead, and to comprehend the course of the proceedings. If they find the affirmative, the plea of 'not guilty' may be entered, and the trial will proceed; but if the negative, the 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, s. 2, provides that insane persons indicted for any offence, and on their arraignment found to be insane by a jury lawfully impanelled for that purpose, so that they cannot be tried upon the indictment, shall be ordered by the court to be kept in strict custody till the royal pleasure be known.

To advise a prisoner to stand mute is a high misprision, a contempt of the court, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Mutus et surdus (dumb and deaf).

Mutuum, a loan, whereby the absolute property in the thing lent passes to the borrower, it being for consumption, and he being bound to restore, not the same thing, but other things of the same kind. Thus, if corn, wine, money, or any other thing which is not intended to be returned, but only an equivalent in kind, is lost or destroyed by accident, it is the loss of the borrower; for it is his property, and he must restore the equivalent in kind; the maxim —ejus est periculum, cujus est dominium— applying to such cases.

In a mutuum the property passes immediately from the mutuant or lender to the mutuary or borrower, and the identical thing lent cannot be recovered or redemanded.—Jones on Bailm. 64.

Mynster-ham [ecclesiæ mansio, Lat.], monastic habitation; perhaps the part of a monastery set apart for purposes of hospitality, or as a sanctuary for criminals.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Mystery, an art, trade, or occupation.

Mytacism [fr. μυτακισμός, Gk.], in rhetoric, the too frequent use of the letter M.—Encyc. Lond.

N.

Naam [fr. nam, Sax., to take], the attaching or taking of one's movable goods.—Termes de la Ley.

Nab [fr. nappa, Swed.], to catch unexpectedly; to seize without warning.—Encyc. Lond.

Nabob, Nawab, very great deputy, vicegerent, the governor of a province under the Mogul government.—Indian.

Naib, a deputy.—Ibid.

Naib, Nazum, deputy of the governor.

Nail, a measure of two inches and a quarter.

Nam, distress; seizure.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Namation, the act of distraining or taking a distress. In Scotland it is particularly used for impounding.

Name [fr. namo, Goth.; nama, Sax.; naem, Dut.], the discriminative appellation of an individual.

Proper names are either christian-names, as being given at baptism, or surnames, from the sire or father.—4 Rep. 170.

Namium, a distress.

Namium vetitum, an unjust taking of the cattle of another and driving them to an unlawful place, pretending damage done by them.

Nantes, Edict of, made by Hen. IV. of France, and revoked by Louis XIV., Oct. 2, 1685.

Narr [abbrev. of narratio, Lat.], a declaration in an action.

Narratio, a count.

Narrator, a pleader or reporter.

Narrow seas, those running between two coasts not far apart. The term is usually applied to the English Channel.

Natale, the state and condition of a man.

Nathwyte. See LAIRWITE.

Nation, a people distinguished from another people, generally by their language, origin, or government; an assembly of men of free condition, as distinguished from a family of slaves.

National Church, the Protestant church of England, of which the sovereign is the head and supreme governor.—26 Hen. VIII. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 1.

National Debt, the money owing by government to some of the public, the interest of which is paid out of the taxes raised by the whole of the public. See FUNDS.

Nations, Law of. See INTERNATIONAL LAW. The principal offences against the law of nations are: (1) Violations of safe conducts. (2) Infringement of the rights of ambassadors; and (3) Piracy.

Nativi conventionarii, villeins or bondmen by contract or agreement.

Nativi de stipite, villeins or bondmen by birth or stock.

Nativitas [fr. neifty], the servitude, bondage, or villeinage of women.—Leg. Wm. 1.

Nativo habendo, a writ that lay to a sheriff from a lord who claimed inheritance in any villein, when his villein had absconded, for the apprehending and restoring him to such lord. It was in the nature of a writ of right to recover inheritance in a villein; upon which the lord pursued his plaint, and declared thereupon, and the villein made his defence, so that the question of freedom was tried and determined.—F. N. B. 77.

Nativus, a servant born.—Spelm.

Natura appetit perfectum; ita et lex.—Hob. 144.—(Nature desires perfection; so also law.)

Natura non facit saltum; ita, nec lex.—Co. Litt. 238.—(Nature takes no leap; so neither does law.)

Natura non facit vacuum, nec lex supervacuum.—Co. Litt. 79.—(Nature makes no vacuum; law no supervacuum.)

Naturæ vis maxima; natura bis maxima.—2 Inst. 564.—(The force of nature is greatest; nature is doubly greatest.)

Natural affection, that love which one has for his kindred. It is held to be a good consideration. See CONSIDERATION; COVENANT TO STAND SEISED.

Natural allegiance, that perpetual attachment which is due from all natural-born subjects to their sovereign; it differs from local allegiance, which is temporary only, being due from an alien or stranger born for so long a time as he continues within the sovereign's dominions and protection.—Fost. 184.

Natural-born subjects, those that are born within the dominions of the Crown of England, i. e. within the allegiance of the sovereign.

Natural children. A natural or illegitimate child is one who comes under any of the five following categories: (1) A child born of a woman, not actually married at the time of its birth; or (2) of a wife under such circumstances that her husband cannot be its father; or (3) of a husband and wife, whose marriage has been judicially declared null and void, which illegitimatises their previously lawful issue (Co. Litt. 335); or (4) of a widow so long after her husband's decease, as to render it absolutely impossible for it to be a child begotten by him; or (5) of a man and woman who have gone through the ceremony of marriage, although one or both of them is incapable of contracting it, whose pretended marriage is utterly void.

The only natural obligation which the law imposes upon the parents of natural children is their maintenance. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, and 8 Vict. c. 10.

Natural equity. See EQUITY.

Natural infancy, a period of non-responsible life, which ends with the seventh year of a person's age.

Natural liberty. See LIBERTY.

Natural obligations, duties which have a definite object, but are not subject to any legal necessity.

Natural persons, such as we are formed by the Deity, as distinguished from artificial persons or corporations, formed by human laws, for purposes of society and government.

Natural rights, those relating to life and liberty.

Naturale est quidlibet dissolvi eo modo quo ligatur.—Jenk. Cent. 66.—(It is natural for a thing to be unbound in the same way in which it was bound.)

Naturalization, the act of investing aliens with the privileges of native subjects, which can only be effected either (1) by Act of Parliament, or (2) by certificate of a Secretary of State, by virtue of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. The act of naturalization has a retrospective effect, in which it differs from mere denization. Thus, if a man be naturalized by Act of Parliament, his son born previously may inherit. No naturalization bill can be received in either house of Parliament without a clause disabling the person from obtaining any immunity in trade thereby in any foreign country, unless he shall have resided in Britain for seven years next after the commencement of the session in which he is naturalized. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, s. 2. These provisions, however, have been usually dispensed with by special Acts of Parliament previous to bills of naturalization of foreign princes and persons distinguished for their rank or services.

As for naturalization by certificate of the Secretary of State, it may be obtained by any alien coming to reside in any part of Great Britain or Ireland, with intent to settle therein. He is to present a memorial for the purpose to one of the Secretaries of State, who may, after receiving the necessary evidence of the truth of the allegations contained in the memorial, issue, if he shall so think fit, a certificate granting to the memorialist, upon his taking the oath of allegiance and abjuration in the act set forth, within sixty days from the day of the date of such certificate, all the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject, except the capacity of being a member of the Privy Council, or a member of either House of Parliament; and except the rights and capacities (if any) specially excepted in and by such certificate.

As to naturalization in a British colony or possession, see 10 & 11 Vict. c. 83.

Nature, guardianship by. See GUARDIAN.

Nature, law of, certain rules of conduct supposed to be so just that they are binding upon all mankind.

Naufrage, shipwreck.

Naulage [fr. naulum, Lat.], the freight of passengers in a ship.

Nautæ [Lat.], sailors, carriers by water.

Navagium, a duty on certain tenants to carry their lord's goods in a ship.

Naval and Mercantile Savings Banks, established for sailors and mariners by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 41.

Naval Coast Volunteers. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 73.

Naval Discipline Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 115, and 26 Vict. c. 5.

Naval Forces, the royal navy.

Naval Medical Supplemental Fund Society, for regulating the, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 58, continued by 22 Vict. c. 28, and amended by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 111.

Naval and Victualling Stores Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 64.

Navicularis [Lat.], a sea captain.

Navigation Acts, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120.

Navy [fr. navis, Lat., a ship], an assemblage of ships, commonly ships of war; a fleet.

The discipline of the navy was formerly regulated by certain express rules, articles, and orders, first enacted by the authority of Parliament soon after the Restoration, but is now regulated by 'The Naval Discipline Act, 1861,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 115. As to the enlistment of seamen, see 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 24; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 9.

Navy bills, bills drawn by officers of the royal navy for their pay, &c. It is a felony to forge them.—11 Geo. IV. & 1 W. IV. c. 20, s. 83.

Navy Prize Agents Acts, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 116.

Nazeranna, a sum paid to government as an acknowledgment for a grant of lands, or any public office.—Encyc. Lond.

Nazim, composer, arranger, adjuster. The first officer of a province, and minister of the department of criminal justice.—Indian.

Ne admittas (that you admit not), a prohibitory writ directed to the bishop at the request of the plaintiff or defendant, where a quare impedit is depending, when either party fears that the bishop will admit the other's clerk during the suit between them; it ought to be issued within six calendar months after the avoidance, before the bishop may present by lapse; for it is in vain to sue out this writ when the title to present has devolved upon the bishop.—F. N. B. 37.

Neat, or Net, the weight of a pure commodity alone, without the cask, bag, dross, &c. Comm. term.

Neat-land, land let out to the yeomanry.

Ne baila pas (he did not deliver).

Necation [fr. neco, Lat.], the act of killing.

Necessaries, a relative term, not strictly limited to such things as are absolutely requisite for support and subsistence, but to be construed liberally, and varying with the state and decree, the rank, fortune, and age of the infant to whom they are supplied. It has always been held that an infant is bound to pay a reasonable price for such necessary things as relate to his maintenance and education—as for food, lodging, apparel, medical attendance, and schooling—unless credit be given solely to the parent, which is presumed to be the fact, if it appear that the infant was placed at school, or is supported by him.—Story on Contracts, 39.

While a husband and wife live together, and the goods supplied to the wife are necessaries, both in quality and quantity, the law raises an uncontrollable presumption of assent on the part of the husband to the contract, and renders him liable therefor. If he omit to furnish her with necessaries, he makes her impliedly his agent to purchase them. A general prohibition, therefore, to all persons not to supply the wife with necessaries is void.—Ibid. 46. See Chitty or Addison on Contracts.

Necessarium est quod non potest aliter se habere.—Bacon.—(That is necessary which cannot otherwise be dispensed with.)

Necessary intromission, when a husband or wife continues in possession of the other's goods, after the decease of the other, for their preservation.—Scotch phrase.

Necessitas culpabilis (a blameable necessity).

Necessitas est lex temporis et loci.—H.H.P.C. 54.—(Necessity is the law of time and place.)

Necessitas excusat aut extenuat delictum in capitalibus, quod non operatur idem in civilibus. Bacon.—(Necessity excuses or extenuates delinquency in capital, which has not the same operation in civil cases.)

Necessitas facit licitum quod alias non est licitum.—10 Co. 61.—(Necessity makes that lawful which otherwise is not lawful.)

Necessitas inducit privilegium quoad jura privata.—Bac. Max. 25.—(Necessity gives a privilege with reference to private rights.)

The necessity involved in this maxim has been considered under three different heads, viz:—1st, Necessity of self-preservation; 2nd, of obedience; and 3rd, necessity resulting from the act of God, or of a stranger.—Noy's Max. 32.

Necessitas non habet legem.—Plow. 18.—(Necessity has not any law.)

Necessitas publica major est quam privata.—Bacon.—(Public necessity is greater than private.)

Death, it has been observed, is the last and furthest point of particular necessity, and the law imposes it upon every subject, that he prefer the urgent service of his king and country to the safety of his life.—Noy's Max. 34.

Necessitas, quod cogit, defendit.—H.H.P.C. 54.—(Necessity defends what it compels.)

Necessitas sub lege non continetur, quia quod alias non est licitum necessitas facit licitum.—2 Inst. 326.—(Necessity is not restrained by law; since what otherwise is not lawful, necessity makes lawful.)

Necessitas vincit legem; legum vincula irridet. Hob. 144.—(Necessity overcomes law; it derides the fetters of laws.)

Necessity, a constraint upon the will, whereby a person is urged to do that which his judgment disapproves, and which it is to be presumed, his will (if left to itself) would reject. A man, therefore, is excused for those acts which are done through unavoidable force and compulsion.

Compulsion or necessity may arise:—

(1) From civil subjection;

(2) From duress per minas;

(3) From the choice of the less pernicious of two evils, one of which is unavoidable; or,

(4) From want or hunger, which is, however, no legitimate excuse.—4 Blackstone's Com. 27.

Necessity, homicide by, a species of justifiable homicide, because it arises from some unavoidable necessity, without any will, intention, or desire, and without any inadvertence, or negligence in the party killing, and therefore without any shadow of blame. As, for instance, by virtue of such an office as obliges one, in the execution of public justice, to put a malefactor to death, who has forfeited his life to the laws of his country. But the law must require it, otherwise it is not justifiable.—4 Bl. Com. 178.

Neck-verse, the Latin sentence miserere mei Deus, Ps. li. 1, because the reading of it was made a test by which to distinguish those who, in presumption of law, were qualified, in point of learning, and admissible to benefit of clergy.

If a monk had been taken
For stealing of bacon,
For burglary, murder, or rape;
If he could but rehearse
(Well prompt) his neck-verse,
He never could fail to escape.
Brit. Apollo, 1710.

Nec curia deficerit in justitiâ exhibendâ.—4 Inst. 63.—(Lest the court should be deficient in showing justice.)

Nec tempus nec locus occurrit regi.—Jenk. Cent. 190.—(Neither time nor place affects the king.)

Nec veniam, effuso sanguine, casus habet.—3 Inst. 57.—(Where blood is spilled the case is unpardonable.)

Nec veniam, læso Numine, casus habet.—Jenk. Cent.—167.—(Where the Divinity is insulted, the case is unpardonable.)

Ne disturba pas, the general issue in quare impedit. It simply denies that the defendant obstructed the presentation, and is adapted to no other ground of defence.—Step. Plead. 173.

Ne dona pas, or non dedit, the general issue in a formedon, now abolished. It denied the gift in tail to have been made in manner and form as alleged; and was therefore the proper plea, if the tenant meant to dispute the fact of the gift, but did not apply to any other case.—5 East. 289.

Ne exeat regno, sometimes ungrammatically termed ne exeat regnum, when a person who owes an actually due equitable debt, or fails to pay alimony decreed to a wife by the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, meditates a departure from the realm, the creditor or wife may file a bill, and pray for a writ of ne exeat regno in order to prevent his flight; the object of the writ being, to use the sonorous phrase of Bentham, 'the stopping of expatriation for the avoidance of justiciability.'

This writ was framed originally for purposes of state, and was used to deter the clergy from leaving the country without the royal license, on account of the national jealousy of any intercourse between the English ecclesiastics and the Papal See; but it has now been applied for a long time to private complaints, as being admirably adapted to prohibitory purposes. It will not be granted at the instance of a plaintiff resident abroad.

This writ must generally be prayed for by bill, but it frequently happens that a defendant's intention to go abroad arises, or is first discovered in the course of a suit, and then there is no doubt that the writ would be granted, though not so prayed. A defendant may also obtain the writ without filing a bill, against a plaintiff ordered to pay a certain sum of money to deter him from going abroad before its liquidation. It is obtained upon a motion ex parte, supported by an affidavit, which must be positive as to the debt, except in the case of an account, when the plaintiff may swear that, to the best of his belief, such a sum will be due to him on the balance. The affidavit must also be positive as to the defendant's intention to go abroad, or as to his threats or declarations to that effect, or as to facts evincing it; and it must state expressly that the debt or property would be endangered by the defendant's quitting the kingdom.

An affidavit will be dispensed with where the demand has been established by a chief clerk's certificate duly confirmed, and perhaps where all the facts are admitted by a defendant's answer. See the cases 3 Mac. Chit. Dig. 2141.

This affidavit should not be sworn before the plaintiff's solicitor in the cause, as it would be a ground to move to discharge the writ with costs, and the defendant would not be put under terms, not to bring an action. It is doubtful whether in this case a second writ would be granted.—Hopkin v. Hopkin, 1 Eq. Rep. 20 (1853).

If the court grant an order, it must be passed and entered, and then delivered to the clerk of records and writs, who will seal the writ, which must be endorsed with the amount of the sum for which the defendant is to give security in words at length.

The writ is delivered to the sheriff in whose county the defendant is sojourning; and he causes the party to be arrested, in effecting which outer doors shall not be broken open.

Upon the party being arrested, he may obtain his enlargement out of custody, either by depositing the amount indorsed upon the writ with the sheriff, or by executing a bond with two sufficient sureties, to the sheriff, in double the sum marked on the writ, conditioned not to go or to attempt to go into parts beyond the seas, or into Scotland, without the leave of the court.

The sheriff, after he has executed the writ, returns it either by saying that he has taken a deposit of the amount indorsed on the writ, or that he has caused the defendant personally to come before him, and that he has found bail in the penalty of £—, according to the exigency of the writ.

An application to discharge the writ for irregularity, or that it was improperly granted, may be made before answer, but must be supported by affidavit; after answer, it is usually on the merits therein disclosed, unless the writ was granted upon matter subsequent to answer, when the application may be supported by affidavit. The court will discharge the writ upon the defendant paying into court the amount indorsed upon the writ, and the writ will be discharged upon the merits, should the plaintiff have no case, or the defendant be not going abroad, either absolutely or conditionally, i. e. by giving security to submit to the decree of the court. A subsequent amendment of the bill will not be a ground to discharge the writ, unless it materially varies the case, as originally framed. After a defendant has been taken in contempt for disobeying the decree of the court, his sureties may apply that they may be discharged and that the bond as to them may be cancelled. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 6; Consol. Ord. 1860, i., r. 38; xxxvi., r. 9; Beames' Brief View of the Writ; and 3 Mac. Chit. Dig. 2555–2559.

Negatio conclusionis est error in lege.—Wing. 268.—(The negative of a conclusion is error in law.)

Negatio destruit negationem, et ambæ faciunt affirmativum.—Co. Litt. 146.—(A negative destroys a negative, and both make an affirmative.)

Negatio duplex est affirmatio.—(A double negative is an affirmative.)

Negative, a particle of denial.

A negative cannot be proved or testified by witnesses, only an affirmative.—2 Inst. 662. But this rule does not apply where one party charges another with a culpable omission or breach of duty; in such a case, the person who makes the charge is bound to prove it, though it may involve a negative, for it is one of the first principles of justice, not to presume that a person has acted illegally till the contrary is proved. Where the presumption of law is in favor of a defendant's plea, then the plaintiff must disprove the plea, though he may have to prove a negative.—1 Phil. Evid. c. vii., s. 4.

It is a pleading rule that two negatives do not make a good issue.—Step. Plead. 481.

It was formerly a question of no inconsiderable difficulty, and from the apparent contrariety of the authorities, subject to much discussion and vexatious controversy in courts of equity, whether a purely negative plea to a bill was a legitimate mode of defence, as it unquestionably is at law. It was a question whether a defendant could allege in opposition to the claims of the plaintiff as heir-at-law, that the plaintiff was not heir-at-law. But that doubt has been dissipated, and it is now firmly established that such a plea is good.—Story's Eq. Plead. 507.

Negative pregnant, a form of denial which implies or carries with it an affirmative.

This is considered as a fault in pleading, because the meaning of such a form of expression is ambiguous. The rule against a negative pregnant has been very much relaxed, for many cases have occurred in which, upon various grounds of distinction from the general rule, such form of expression has been held free from objection.—Step. Plead. 419.

Neggildare, to claim kindred.

Negligence, acting carelessly. There are three degrees of negligence: (1) ordinary, which is the want of ordinary diligence; (2) slight, the want of great diligence; and (3) gross, the want of slight diligence.

So in the civil law there are three degrees of negligence: (1) lata culpa, gross neglect; (2) levis culpa, ordinary neglect; and (3) levissima culpa, slight neglect.—Hallifax, C. L. 61.

The question of negligence is usually one of fact for a jury. The question may be either one of law, where the case falls within any general and settled rule or principle; or of fact, where no such rule or principle is applicable to the particular circumstances, and where, therefore, the conclusion of negligence must be found or excluded by the jury. See DILIGENCE. By 14 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 84, a servant who, through negligence, sets fire to a house or building, upon conviction before two justices shall pay to the churchwardens or overseers of the parish where the fire happens 100*l.* to be distributed among the sufferers by such fire, in such proportions as to the said churchwardens shall seem just; and in default of payment shall be imprisoned for eighteen months with hard labour. By the common law if a servant keeps his master's fire negligently, so that his neighbour's house is burnt down, an action lies against the master. The statement in 1 Bl. Com. 431, that the right of action is taken away by statute is incorrect. See Filliter v. Phippard, 11 Q. B. 347.

Negligence, homicide by. See MISADVENTURE.

Negligent escape, where a person gets out of the custody of the sheriff or other officer, without consent.

Negligentia semper habet infortuniam comitem. Co. Litt. 246.—(Negligence always has misfortune for a companion.)

Negoce [fr. negotium, Lat.], business, trade, management of affairs.

Negotiable instruments, those, the right of action upon which is, by exception from the common rule, freely assignable from one to another, such as bills of exchange and promissory notes.

It is not essential, however, to the character of a bill of exchange or promissory note that it should be negotiable, but it is essential to the negotiability of a bill between all persons, except the government, that it should be payable to order or to bearer, or that some other equivalent words should be used, authorizing the payee to assign or transfer the same to third persons, such, for example, as payable 'to A. or his agent.' Still, however, although not transferable by endorsement, without such words, so as to give an action to the indorsee against other parties to the bill; yet, the indorsement will give an action against the payee himself; because, in legal effect, it amounts to the drawing of a bill in favor of the indorsee against the drawer.

The mode of transfer depends upon the manner in which the bill is originally made negotiable. If it is payable to the bearer, then it may be transferred by mere delivery, the person delivering it ceasing to be deemed a party thereto. But if the bill be originally payable to a person, or his order, there it is properly transferable by indorsement, because, in no other way will the transfer convey the legal title to the holder, so that he can, at law, hold the other parties liable to him, ex directo, whatever may be his remedy in equity. If there be an assignment thereof, without indorsement, the holder will thereby acquire the same rights only as he would acquire upon an assignment of a bill not negotiable. But there is a period when bills cease altogether to be negotiable, in whose hands soever they may then be, so far as respects the antecedent parties thereto, who would be discharged therefrom by the payment thereof. As if a bill be once paid by the acceptor, after it has become due, it loses all its vitality, and can no longer be negotiable. So if it be dishonored by the acceptor. But bills remain negotiable even after payment, so far as respects the parties, who shall knowingly negotiate the same afterwards; for, in such a case, the negotiation cannot prejudice any other persons, and can only prejudice themselves.—Story on Bills, 220.

Promissory notes were made negotiable by 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9, and 7 Anne, c. 25, and placed in all respects upon the same footing with inland bills of exchange.

By the common law, though the indorsement of a bill of lading transferred the property in the goods to which it related, the indorsee could not sue upon it in his own name; but by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, 'every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods mentioned in it passes upon or by reason of the consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities, as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself.'

By 26 & 27 Vict. c. 105, the restrictions on the negotiation of bills of exchange and promissory notes for the payment of 20*s*. and less than 5*l*.; or upon which 20*s*. and less than 5*l*. is undischarged, are repealed.

Negotiation, treaty of business, whether public or private.

Negotiorum gestor, a person who, spontaneously, and without the knowledge or consent of the owner, intermeddles with his property, as to do work on it, or to carry it to another place, &c.

In cases of this sort, as he acts wholly without authority, there can, strictly speaking, be no contract. But the Roman law raises a quasi mandate, by implication, for the benefit of the owner in many of such cases. Nor is an implication of this sort wholly unknown to the common law, where there has been a subsequent ratification of the acts by the owner; and sometimes where unauthorised acts are done, positive presumptions are made by law for the benefit of particular parties. Thus, if a stranger enter upon a minor's lands, and take the profits, the law will, in many cases, oblige him to account to the minor for the profits as his bailiff; for it will be presumed that he entered to take them in trust for the infant.

As the negotiorum gestor interferes without any actual mandate, there is good reason for requiring him to exert the requisite skill and knowledge to accomplish the object or business which he undertakes; to do everything which is incident to or dependent upon that object or business, and to finish whatever he has begun. Without such an obligation, every person in the community would be at the mercy of ignorant and officious friends.—Story's Bailment, 204.

Neife, a woman born in villenage.

Neifty. See NATIVITAS.

Ne injuste vexes, a writ founded on Magna Charta that lay for a tenant distrained by his lord, for more services than he ought to perform; and it was a prohibition to the lord not unjustly to distrain or vex his tenant; in a special use it was where the tenant had prejudiced himself by doing greater services or paying more rent without constraint, than he needed; for, in that case, by reason of the lord's seisin, the tenant could not avoid it by avowry, but was driven to his writ for remedy.—F. N. B. 10. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 35.

Ne luminibus officiatur, a servitude restraining the owner of a house from obstructing the light of his neighbor.

Nembda [Teut.], a jury.

Nemine contradicente, abbrev. nem. con. [Lat.], the phrase to signify the unanimous consent of the members of the House of Commons to a vote or resolution; it is analogous to the term nemine dissentiente (nem. dis.) in the House of Peers.

Neminem oportet esse sapientiorem legibus.—Co. Litt. 97.—(Nobody need be wiser than the laws.)

Nemo admittendus est inhabilitare seipsum.—Jenk. Cent. 40.—(Nobody is to be admitted to incapacitate himself.)

Nemo agit in seipsum.—Jenk. Cent. 40.—(No one acts against himself.)

Nemo aliquam partem recte intelligere potest, antequam totum iterum atque iterum perlegit.—3 Co. 59.—(No one can properly understand any part of a thing till he has read through the whole again and again.)

Nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus.—Civil Law Maxim.—(No one alleging his own baseness is to be heard.)

The courts of law have properly rejected it as a rule of evidence.—7 T. R. 601.

Nemo cogi potest præcise ad factum, sed in id tantum quod interesse.—(No person can be compelled precisely to the act, but to that only which interests him.)

Nemo cogitur rem suam vendere, etiam justo pretio.—4 Inst. 275.—(No person is obliged to sell his own property, even for the full value.)

Nemo contra factum suum venire potest.—2 Inst. 66.—(No one can come against his own deed.)

Nemo dat qui non habet.—Jenk. Cent. 250. (No one gives who possesses not.)

Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto: et Deus non agit bis in ipsum.—4 Co. 43.—(No one should be punished twice for one offence; and God punishes not twice for an offence against himself.)

Nemo debet bis vexari, si constat curiæ quod sit pro unâ et eâdem causâ.—5 Co. 61.—(No man ought to be twice put to trouble, if it appear to the court that it is for one and the same cause.)

Nemo debet ex alienâ jacturâ lucrari.—(No one ought to gain by another's loss.)

Nemo debet esse judex in propriâ causâ.—12 Co. 113—(No one should be judge in his own cause.)

In civil actions, the general rule is, that the judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction, directly upon the point is, as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court. The exception to this rule is in the action of ejectment.—2 Selw. N. P. 763.

It is also well established in the criminal law, that when a man is indicted for an offence, and acquitted, he cannot afterwards be indicted for the same offence, provided the first indictment were such that he could have been lawfully convicted upon it by proof of the facts contained in the second indictment.—Arch. Cr. Plead. 88.

Nemo debet immiscere se rei alienæ—ad se nihil pertinenti.—Jenk. Cent. 18.—(Nobody should interfere in another's business—in what does not relate to himself.)

Nemo debet rem suam sine facto aut defectu suo amittere.—Co. Litt. 263.—(No one should lose his property without his own act or negligence.)

Nemo duobus utatur officiis.—4 Inst. 109.—(Let no one fill two offices.)

Nemo est hæres viventis.—Co. Litt. 8.—(No one is the heir of a living man.)

Nemo ex alterius detrimento fieri debet locupletari.—Jenk. Cent. 4.—(No man ought to be made rich out of another's injury.)

Nemo ex dolo suo proprio relevetur, aut auxilium capiat.—Jur. Civ.—(Let no one be relieved or gain an advantage by his own fraud.)

Nemo inauditus nec summonitus condemnari debet, si non sit contumax.—Jenk. Cent. 8.—(No man should be condemned unheard and unsummoned, unless for contumacy.)

Nemo militans Deo implicetur secularibus negotiis.—Co. Litt. 70.—(No man warring for God should be troubled by secular business.)

Nemo nascitur artifex.—Co. Litt. 97.—(No one is born an artificer.)

Nemo patriam in quâ natus est exuere nec ligeantiæ debitum ejurare possit.—Co. Litt. 129. (No man can disclaim the country in which he was born, nor abjure the bond of allegiance.)

Nemo potest contra recordum verificare per patriam.—2 Inst. 380.—(No one can verify by jury against a record.)

Nemo potest esse tenens et dominus.—Gilb. Ten. 142.—(No man can be tenant and lord.)

Nemo potest facere per alium, quod per se non potest.—Jenk. 237.—(No one can do through another what he cannot do through himself.)

Nemo potest habere duas militias nec duas dignitates, quia difficile est ut unus homo vices duorum sustineat.—4 Co. 118.—(No one can fill two offices, or two dignities, because it is difficult for one man to fill the places of two.)

Nemo potest plus juris ad alium transferre quam ipse habet.—Co. Litt. 309; Wing. 56.—(No one can transfer a greater right to another than he himself has.)

Nemo præsumitur alienam posteritatem suæ prætulisse.—Wing. 285.—(No one is presumed to have preferred another's prosperity to his own.)

Nemo præsumitur donare.—(No one is presumed to give.)

Nemo præsumitur esse immemor suæ æternæ salutis, et maxime in articulo mortis.—6 Co. 76. (No one is presumed to be forgetful of his own eternal welfare; and particularly in the act of death.)

Nemo præsumitur malus.—(No one is presumed bad.)

Nemo præsumitur ludere in extremis.—(No one is presumed to trifle at the point of death.)

Nemo prohibetur plures negotiationes sive artes exercere.—11 Co. 54.—(No one is restrained from exercising several businesses or arts.)

Nemo prohibetur pluribus defensionibus uti. Co. Litt. 304.—(No one is restrained from using several defences.)

Nemo prudens punit ut præterita revocentur, sed ut futura præveniantur.—3 Buls. 179.—

(No wise man punishes, that things done may be revoked, but that future wrongs may be prevented.)

Nemo punitur pro alieno delicto.—Wing. 336. (No one is punished for the crime of another.)

Nemo punitur sine injuriâ, facto, seu defalto. 2 Inst. 287.—(No one is punished unless for some injury, deed, or default.)

Nemo redditum invito domino percipere, et possidere potest.—Co. Litt. 323.—(No one can take and enjoy the rent, against the will of the lord.)

Nemo tenetur ad impossibile.—Jenk. Cent. 7. (No one is bound to an impossibility.)

Nemo tenetur armare adversarium contra se. Wing. 665.—(No one is bound to arm his adversary against himself.)

Nemo tenetur divinare.—3 Co. 28.—(No one is bound to foretell.)

Nemo tenetur informare qui nescit, sed quisquis scire quod informat.—Lane, 110.—(No one who is ignorant is bound to inform, but every one ought to know what he states.)

Nemo tenetur jurare in suam turpitudinem.—(No one is bound to testify to his own baseness.)

Nemo tenetur seipsum infortuniis et periculis exponere.—Co. Litt. 253.—(No one is bound to expose himself to misfortunes and dangers.)

Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare.—Wing. 486. (No one is bound to accuse himself.)

Nemo unquam vir magnus fuit, sine aliquo divino afflatu.—Cic.—(No one was ever a great man without some divine inspiration.)

Nephew [fr. nepos, Lat.], the son of a brother or sister.

A nephew, according to the civil law, is in the third degree of consanguinity; but, according to the canon law, in the second.

Nepos, a grandson.

Neptis, a granddaughter.

Ne recipiatur, a caveat entered by a defendant to prevent a plaintiff from trying his cause at a certain sittings, where the cause is not entered in due time.—R. 43, H. T. 1853.

Ne relessa par (he did not release).

Net profits, clear profits beyond all deductions.

Nether House of Parliament. The House of Commons was so called in the time of Henry VIII.—Div. of Purl. 221.

Ne unques accouple in loyal matrimonie, a plea whereby a tenant in the real action of dower unde nihil, controverts the validity of the demandant's marriage with the person out of whose estate she claims dower. To this plea, the demandant must reply that she was accoupled in lawful matrimony at A. in such a diocese, upon which a writ issues to the bishop of such diocese, requiring him to certify the fact to the court.—Co. Ent. 180.

Ne unques Executor or Administrator, a plea whereby a defendant denies that he is executor or administrator. It does not deny the cause of action, but only that the defendant is the personal representative of the testator or intestate.—1 Saund. 207 a.

Ne unques seisie que dower, a plea in dower, which is often called the general issue, but it does not seem to fall strictly within the definition of that term. It does not, properly speaking, contain any denial or traverse of the count, and must therefore be considered as an anomaly or exception in the system of pleading. The reason is perhaps to be found in the great antiquity of the action of dower, which was in full use, at least as early as the time of Glanville, a period considerably anterior to the complete establishment of the doctrine of issue, and of the rules by which it is produced.—Step. Plead. 54.

Never indebted, plea of, a species of traverse which occurs in actions of debt on simple contract, and is resorted to when the defendant means to deny in point of fact the existence of any express contract to the effect alleged in the declaration, or to deny the matters of fact from which such contract would by law be implied.

New Assignment, a form of pleading which sometimes arises from the generality of the declaration, when the complaint not having been set out with sufficient precision, it becomes necessary, from the evasiveness of the plea, to re-assign the cause of action with fresh particulars. It is used when a defendant has pleaded to a different matter from that which constitutes the real subject of complaint; and should be framed so as to distinguish the true ground of action from that which is covered by the plea. It most frequently occurs in an action of trespass, as where two assaults have been committed, one of which is justifiable and the other indefensible; or in trespass quare clausum fregit, when the defendant claims a right of way. The obligation occasionally imposed upon a defendant, to plead payment in discharge of the whole or a part of the plaintiff's demand, sometimes renders a new assignment necessary, when a defendant supposes, or affects to suppose, that a debt which has been partially satisfied by payment, is that for which the action is brought; but it seems the judges have come to a resolution of not allowing new assignments to a general plea of payment.

As the object of a new assignment is to correct a mistake occasioned by the generality of a declaration, it always occurs in answer to a plea, and is, therefore, in the nature of a replication.

The new assignment is delivered to the defendant's attorney or agent, after which the defendant may be compelled within four days to plead to it, in the same manner as upon the original declaration. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 73), enacts that one new assignment only shall be pleaded to any number of pleas to the same cause of action; and such new assignment shall be consistent with and confirmed by the particulars delivered in the action, if any, and shall state that the plaintiff proceeds for causes of action different from all those which the pleas profess to justify, or for an excess over and above what all the defences set up in such pleas justify, or both (s. 87). No plea which has already been pleaded to the declaration shall be pleaded to such new assignment, except a plea in denial, unless by leave of the court or a judge, and such leave shall only be granted upon satisfactory proof that the repetition of such plea is essential to a trial on the merits (s. 88).—1 Saund. 229; *Step. New Trial. If any defect of judgment happen from causes wholly extrinsic, i. e. arising from matters foreign to or dehors the record, the only remedy the party injured by it has (except error coram nobis or vobis in some few cases), is by applying to the court for a new trial, which is in substitution of a bill of exceptions. But the court must be satisfied that there are strong probable grounds to suppose that the merits have not been fairly and fully discussed, and that the decision is not agreeable to the justice and truth of the case, before they will grant a new trial.

The following is a summary of the cases in which a new trial will or will not be granted:

(1) Mistake, &c., of the judge. If a judge misdirect a jury, even in a penal action, it is, generally, a good ground for a new trial. So if a judge improperly nonsuit a plaintiff. So if a judge admit improper evidence, or reject evidence which ought to be admitted, by which means the result of the trial or inquiry has been different from what it otherwise would have been. An objection to the admissibility of evidence should be made when the evidence is tendered. Where a bill of exceptions has been tendered, the court will never grant a new trial upon the same point of law, unless the party consent to waive his bill of exceptions.

(2) Default or misconduct of the officer of the court. As where a cause is, by mistake, entered in a wrong list, and the cause is tried as undefended in the defendant's absence.

(3) Default or misconduct of the jury. If a juror has been sworn by a wrong surname, and it has been productive of some injustice. If a jury find a verdict contrary to evidence. For excessive damages, but not for the smallness of the damages, unless it has arisen from some mistake or unfair practice. For the misconduct of the jury, as if they had eaten or drunk at the expense of the party for whom they had afterwards found a verdict; or if they determined their verdict by lots, or if any of them had declared that the plaintiff should never have a verdict. But if the information of such misconduct come from any of the jurors, or from the unsuccessful party, the court will not receive it, although in some degree confirmed by evidence aliunde.

(4) Absence, &c. of counsel or attorney. The instances are very rare in which the court has granted a new trial where a verdict has been obtained against a party on account of the absence of his counsel, &c.

(5) Default or misconduct of the opposite party. If a party for whom a verdict is afterwards given, deliver to the jury, after they have left the bar, evidence which had not been adduced in court, a new trial will be granted. So if he have labored the jury, or used improper influence with them. So misleading or taking by surprise the opposite party. So where no notice of trial had been given; but if the defendant appear to defend, this irregularity is waived.

(6) Default or misconduct of witnesses. The general rule is, that a new trial will not be granted on the ground that evidence has not been given that might have been given at the trial, for the plaintiff ought, if unprepared with his evidence, either to make application to postpone the trial before the jury are sworn, or should withdraw his record and not take the chance of a verdict. The court has granted a new trial where it appeared clearly that the plaintiff's case was a mere fiction supported by perjury, which the defendant could not at the time of the trial be prepared to answer.

(7) Discovery of new evidence after the trial. A new trial will seldom be granted where a verdict has been given against a party, or a plaintiff has been nonsuited for want of evidence which might have been produced at the trial, because it would tend to introduce perjury. But if new evidence have been discovered after the trial, the court will grant a new trial upon payment of costs, if it be necessary, in order to do justice between the parties, but the discovery of witnesses who can contradict those produced on the former trial, seems to be no ground for a new trial, nor will the court grant a new trial to let a party into a defence of which he was apprised at the first trial.

(8) Error in pleadings, variance, &c. This will form no ground for a new trial, for a judge might amend, as a general rule, at the trial.

(9) Where one of several issues, &c. has been wrongly decided. If the court grant a new trial upon this ground, it must extend to all the issues.

(10) Where the action or defence is trifling or vexatious. The value or amount must be 20*l.* at least, to induce the court to interfere; unless on trials before the sheriff in which the limited sum is 5*l.* or the verdict involve some particular right independent of the damages.

(11) Where there has been a previous new trial. If the jury on the second trial find for the party against whom the former verdict was given, the court, if the case be doubtful, or the second verdict do not accord with the justice of the case, may be induced to grant a third trial, but this is entirely in the discretion of the court, even after two concurring verdicts.

(12) Where leave has been reserved to enter a nonsuit or verdict. The court may, instead of allowing a verdict or nonsuit to be entered, send down the cause for a new trial, if it be more in accordance with the justice of the case.

(13) Where a party has been taken by surprise.

A new trial may be awarded for the same causes, after writ of trial and inquiry before the sheriff, as after a verdict. And so in penal actions. Also, in actions of ejectment, if verdict found for the plaintiff; but where the verdict is for the defendant, the court will seldom grant a new trial, because the plaintiff may, if he will, bring a new action. In replevin, where the verdict is for the plaintiff, the court will be more cautious in granting a new trial than in other actions, and will not grant it unless upon very clear grounds; for the landlord has other remedies for his rent, and a new trial will renew the liability of the sureties.

The motion for a rule to show cause why a verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial granted, is made in the court in which the action is pending, unless in the case of an issue out of Chancery, when it is made to the court directing it. The motion is made by the party aggrieved by the first trial. One or more of several defendants may move. The motion for the rule nisi must be made within four days from the day of trial, if the cause be tried in term; but if the cause be tried in vacation, then within the four first days of the term next after the trial, unless entered in a list of postponed motions by leave of the court.

A new trial cannot, in general, be moved for after a motion in arrest of judgment, nor after error brought.

When the case is called on for argument, and it is necessary to do so, the judge who tried the cause, or, if it were tried by a judge of another court, the junior puisnè judge, will read his report of the trial; after which the counsel on the opposite side show cause against the rule; the counsel for the party who moved for the rule nisi speak in support of it, and the court then state their opinion, either discharging or making absolute the rule.

If the court make the rule absolute, they may do so upon terms, if necessary; such as that witnesses infirm or going beyond sea may be examined upon interrogatories, or that their evidence may be read from the judge's notes of the first trial; that certain deeds, books, papers, &c. may be produced at the trial, that certain facts, not intended to be litigated, may be admitted, or that the party may make discovery of certain facts upon oath, in order to prevent the necessity of having recourse to a bill of discovery in equity for it.

The party obtaining the rule is not bound to proceed to the new trial in any limited time, but if the plaintiff do not proceed to the second trial, the defendant may carry down the record by proviso, after the next term or assizes from that in which the new trial was granted.

It is entirely in the discretion of the court whether they will oblige the party applying for a new trial to pay costs as a condition precedent to his proceeding to a second trial. If a new trial be granted upon a ground not opened upon the first trial, it will be upon payment of costs. If a new trial be granted without any mention of costs in the rule, the costs of the first trial shall not be allowed to the successful party, though he succeed on the second. Where the costs are ordered to abide the event of the second trial, if the same party succeed on both trials, he shall have the costs of the first as well as the second. By 'the event of the second trial,' is meant the ultimate event of the cause; and, therefore, if the verdict at the second trial be set aside, and on the third trial the ultimate event be the same as on the first trial, the party will be entitled to the costs of the first trial. In all cases of motion for a new trial upon the ground that the judge has not ruled according to law, if the rule to show cause be refused, or if granted be then discharged or made absolute, the party decided against may appeal, provided any one of the judges dissent from the rule being refused, or when granted, being discharged or made absolute, as the case may be, or provided the court in its discretion think fit that an appeal should be allowed; provided, that where the application for a new trial is upon matter of discretion only, as on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or otherwise, no such appeal should be allowed.—C. L. P. A. 1854, s. 35; and see s. 44; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1505, et seq.

Applications for new trials of causes tried before juries in the Court of Probate must be made to the court within fourteen days from the day on which the cause was tried, or on the first motion day on which the court shall sit after the expiration of the fourteen days (Rule 59 of 1862). The same time is limited for applications for the rehearing of causes heard before the judge without a jury, in which the evidence has been given vivâ voce (Rule 60 of 1863).

In divorce causes the judge ordinary has power to grant or refuse applications for new trials. If either party is dissatisfied with his decision an appeal lies within fourteen days of the pronouncing of the decision to the full court, whose decision is final.—23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, s. 2.

New Year's Day, the first of January, and the day on which is commemorated the circumcision of the Saviour, as being the eighth from the 25th of December, his supposed day of nativity. The 25th of March was the civil and legal New Year's Day, till the alteration of the style in 1752, when it was permanently fixed to the 1st January.

In Scotland the year was, by a proclamation, which bears date 27th November, 1599, ordered thenceforth to commence in that kingdom on the 1st January instead of the 25th March.—Encyc. Lond.

News, something not heard before.

Spreading false news to make discord between the sovereign and nobility, or concerning any great man of the realm, is a misdemeanor punishable at common law with fine and imprisonment; which is confirmed by stat. West. I. 3 Edw. I. c. 34; 2 Ric. II. st. 1, c. 5; and 12 Ric. II. c. 11.

Newspapers, periodicals in numbers, consisting commonly of single sheets, and published at short and stated intervals, and conveying intelligence of passing events. The Acts regulating them are 60 Geo. III. and 1 Geo. IV. c. 9; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 73; and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 76. By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 27, it is not compulsory to print newspapers on paper stamped with the duty imposed by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, except for the purpose of their transmission by post, free of charge.

New Zealand, Bishopric of, constituted by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 88.

New Zealand Islands. See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 62; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 103; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 112; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 5; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 79; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 70; 14 & 15 Vict. cc. 84, 86; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 72; 20 & 21 Vict. cc. 51, 52, 53; 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 30, 52; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 48. By 26 Vict. c. 23, the boundaries of New Zealand are altered.

Nexi, among the Romans, persons free-born, who, for debt, were delivered bound to their creditors, and obliged to serve them until they could pay their debts.

Next friend. At law, an infant having a guardian, may sue by his guardian, as such, or by his next friend, though he must always defend by his guardian. In equity, he sues by next friend, and not by guardian, and defends by guardian ad litem.

A feme covert, if her husband is banished, or has abjured the realm, or has been transported for felony, may, both at law and in equity, maintain a suit in her own name, as a feme sole, but generally she cannot sue, either at law or in equity, unless her husband be joined. But in equity, if her husband's interest be adverse to her, or where the suit relates exclusively to her separate estate, then she sues by her next friend. But in this respect she is differently placed from an infant; for no person can exhibit a bill as her next friend without her consent; whereas an infant's consent to a bill filed in his name is not necessary. The next friend of an infant is primâ facie liable to the costs, which are however reimbursed to him out of the infant's estate, provided he have acted properly, but the next friend of a feme covert does not incur the like responsibility.

Idiots and lunatics, found such by inquisition, sue by the committee of their estate.

Next of kin. See KINDRED.

Nexum, the transfer of ownership of a thing or the mortgage of it.—Civ. Law.

Nicole, an ancient name for Lincoln.—Cowel.

Niderling, Nidering, or Nithing, a vile, base person, or sluggard; chicken-hearted.—Spelm.

Nief. See NEIFE.

Nient comprise (not contained), an exception taken to a petition, because the thing desired is not contained in the deed or proceeding upon which the petition is founded.

Nient culpable (not guilty), a plea in criminal prosecutions.

Nient dedire (to disown nothing), to suffer judgment by not denying or opposing it, i. e. by default.

Nient le fait (not his deed).

Niger Liber, the black book or register in the Exchequer; chartularies of abbeys, cathedrals, &c.

Night, the time of darkness between sunrise and sunset.

Housebreaking by night is burglary, which see.

Under the Act against poaching by night, 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, s. 12, the night is to be considered to commence at the expiration of the first hour after sunset, and to conclude at the beginning of the last hour before sunrise.

An arrest may be made on a capias on mesne process in the night; and also on a ca. sa.; and a writ of summons may be served during the night.

Night magistrate, a constable of the night; the head of a watch-house.—Scott.

Night-walkers, vagrants, pilferers, disturbers of the peace. They may be arrested by the police, and committed to custody till the morning.—2 Hale, P. C. 90.

Nihil [Lat.] (nothing), a return made by a sheriff, &c., when the circumstances warrant it.

Nihil aliud potest rex in terris, cum sit Dei minister et vicarius, quam quod de jure potest. Itaque potestas juris sua est non injuriæ; cum sit auctor juris, non debet inde injuriarum nasci occasio unde jura nascuntur.—11 Co. 74.—(The king being the minister and Vicar of God, can do nothing else on earth but what is founded in justice. His own power, therefore, partakes of justice, not of wrong; since he is the author of justice, it beseems not that an opportunity of doing injury should arise from the source of rights.)

Nihil capiat per breve (that he take nothing by his writ), where an issue, arising upon a declaration or peremptory plea, is decided for the defendant, the judgment is, generally, that the plaintiff take nothing, &c., and that the defendant go thereof without day, &c., which is a judgment of nihil capiat, &c.

Nihil dat qui non habet.—Jur. Civ.—(He gives nothing who has nothing.)

Nihil de re accrescit ei qui nihil in re quando jus accresceret habet.—Co. Litt. 188.—(Nothing of a matter accrues to him who, when the right accrues, has nothing in that matter.)

Nihil est ad conciliandum gratius verecundiâ. (There is nothing more favourable to conciliation than modesty.)

Nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat.—11 Co. 21.—(An error as to a name is nothing when there is certainty as to the person.)

Nihil habet forum ex scenâ.—Bacon.—(The court has nothing to do with what is not before it.)

Nihil infra regnum subditos magis conservat in tranquillitate et concordiâ quam debita legum administratio.—2 Inst. 158.—(Nothing more preserves in tranquillity and concord those subjected to the government than a due administration of the laws.)

Nihil in lege intolerabilius est eandem rem diverso jure censeri.—4 Co. 93.—(Nothing in law is more intolerable than to rule a similar case by a diverse law.)

Nihil magis justum est quam quod necessarium est.—Dav. 12.—(Nothing is more just than what is necessary.)

Nihil perfectum est dum aliquid restat agendum.—9 Co. 9.—(Nothing is perfect while something remains to be done.)

Nihil possumus contra veritatem.—Doct. and Stud. D. 2, c. vi.—(We can prevail nought against truth.)

Nihil quod est contra rationem est licitum.—Co. Litt. 97.—(Nothing is permitted which is contrary to reason.)

Nihil quod inconveniens est licitum est.—Ibid. (Nothing is permitted which is inconvenient.)

Nihil simul inventum est et perfectum.—Co. Litt. 230.—(Nothing is invented and perfected at the same moment.)

Nihil tam conveniens est naturali æquitati quam unumquodque dissolvi eo ligamine quo ligatum est.—2 Inst. 359.—(Nothing is so consonant to natural equity as that a thing should be dissolved by the same means by which it was bound.)

Nihil tam conveniens est naturali æquitati quam voluntatem domini rem suam in alium transferre ratam habere.—1 Co. 100.—(Nothing is so consonant to natural equity as to regard the intention of the owner in transferring his own property to another.)

Nihil tam proprium est imperii quam legibus vivere.—2 Inst. 63.—(Nothing is so much the property of sovereignty as to live according to the laws.)

Nihil temere novandum.—Jenk. Cent. 163.—(Let nothing be rashly changed.)

Nihils, or Nichils, issues which a sheriff, apposed in the Exchequer, said were nothing worth and illeviable, for the insufficiency of the parties from whom due. Sheriffs' accounts are now passed by the commissioners for auditing the public accounts.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99.

Nil debet (he owes nothing), the form of the general issue, not only in debt or simple contract, but in all other actions of debt not founded on a specialty. It is not now allowed in any action.—H. T. 1853, r. 11. But this does not do away with the plea in penal actions under 21 Jac. I. c. 4.—1 Saund. 38 a, note o.

Nil dicit, Judgment by. See JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

Nil habuit in tenementis, a plea to be pleaded in an action of debt only, brought by a lessor against lessee for years, or at will, without deed.

If both lessee and lessor execute a lease, the former is estopped from pleading this plea to an action of debt for rent by the lessor. It has, however, been held to be a good plea on a demise by deed poll, because, as to the lessee, it is no estoppel. It cannot be pleaded by a lessee in any case where occupation is enjoyed, for the court will not permit a tenant to impeach his landlord's title. In debt on bond, conditioned for the payment of rent reserved upon a demise according to certain articles, the defendant is estopped from saying that he had not anything in the land demised by the articles. In debt for rent by husband and wife, upon a lease by her and her first husband, it is a good plea that her husband was solely seised, and that she had nothing in the land. In assumpsit, for use and occupation, this is a bad plea. It is also no plea in bar of an avowry under 11 Geo. II. c. 19.—Woodf. Land. and Ten. 593; 1 Selw. Nisi Prius, 557, 629.

Nil sine prudenti fecit ratione vetustas.—Co. Litt. 65.—(Antiquity did nothing without a good reason.)

Nimia subtilitas in jure reprobatur.—Wing. 26.—(Too much subtlety in law is blamed.)

Nimium altercando veritas amittitur.—Hob. 344.—(By too much altercation truth is lost.)

Nimmer, a thief; a pilferer.

Nisan. See ABIB.

Nisi prius, a common law phrase, which originated thus:—

An action was formerly triable only in the court where it was brought. But it was provided by Magna Charta, in ease of the subject, that assizes of novel disseisin and mort-ancestor (which were the most common remedies of that day) should thenceforward, instead of being tried at Westminster, in the superior court, be taken in their proper counties, and for this purpose justices were to be sent into every county once a year to take these assizes there.—1 Reeves, 246. These local trials being found convenient, were soon applied not only to assizes, but to other actions; for, by the statute of Nisi Prius, 13 Edw. I. st. 1, c. 30, it is provided, as the general course of proceeding, that writs of venire for summoning juries to the superior courts shall be in the following form: Præcipimus tibi quod venire facias coram justiciariis nostris apud Westm. in Octavis Sancti Michaelis NISI talis et talis, tali die et loco, ad partes illas venerint, duodecim, &c. Thus the trial was to be had at Westminster only in the event of its not previously taking place in the county before the justices appointed to take the assizes. This clause of nisi or nisi prius is not now retained in the venire, but it occurs in the record and the judgment roll. And it is enforced by a subsequent statute of 14 Edw. III. c. 16, which authorizes, at the present day, a trial before the justices of assize, in lieu of the superior court, and gives it the name of a trial at nisi prius.—2 Inst. 424. As to sittings at nisi prius, see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 171 & 379, et seq.

Nisi prius record, an instrument in the nature of a commission to the judges at nisi prius for the trial of a cause. It is written on parchment and delivered to the proper officer of the court in which the cause is to be tried, and by him duly entered. Any variance between the record and the issue should be objected to at the time of trial, but the judges have power to amend variances.—9 Geo. IV. c. 15; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 23; C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 222; and 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 361.

Nobiles magis plectuntur pecuniâ; plebes vero in corpore.—3 Inst. 220.—(The higher classes are more punished in money; but the lower in person.)

Nobiles sunt qui arma gentilitia antecessorum suorum proferre possunt.—2 Inst. 595.—(The gentry are those who are able to produce armorial bearings derived by descent from their own ancestors.)

Nobiliores et benigniores præsumptiones in dubiis sunt præferendæ.—Reg. Jur. Civ.—(In cases of doubt, the more generous and more benign presumptions are to be preferred.)

Nobilitas est duplex, superior et inferior.—2 Inst. 583.—(There are two sorts of nobility, the higher and the lower.)

Nobility, a division of the lay people in our civil state, comprehending dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons. These had anciently duties annexed to their respective honors; they are created either by writ, i. e. by royal summons to attend the house of peers, or by letters-patent, i. e. by royal grant of any dignity and degree of peerage; and they enjoy many privileges, exclusive of their senatorial capacity.—1 Bl. Com. 396.

Nocent, guilty; criminal.

Noctanter (by night), an abolished writ which issued out of Chancery, and returned to the Queen's Bench, for the prostration of enclosures, &c.—7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

Noctes and Noctem de Firmâ, entertainment of meat and drink for so many nights.—Domesday.

Nodfyrs, or Nedfri [fr. neb, Sax., necessary], necessary fire.

Noes. When a question is put from the Chair in the House of Commons, those members who give their voices and votes in the negative are called the Noes, as distinguished from the Ayes, those who give their voices and votes in the affirmative.

Nolle prosequi (to be unwilling to prosecute), a proceeding in the nature of an acknowledgment or undertaking by the plaintiff when he has misconceived the nature of the action, or mistaken the proper party to be sued, to forbear to proceed any further either in a suit altogether, or as to some part of it, or as to some of the defendants; but if it is entered as to part of a suit only, or as to some of the defendants, he is at liberty to proceed as to the rest. It differs from a non pros, which puts a plaintiff out of court with respect to all the defendants. If it be entered before judgment, the plaintiff may bring another action for the same cause, but if after judgment, it operates as a retraxit, and bars any future action for the same cause.

In actions upon contracts against several defendants, whether they join or sever in their pleas, the plaintiff cannot enter a nolle prosequi as to any one of them without releasing the others; but this is not the case in actions upon tort.

Where a nolle prosequi is entered as to the whole declaration, the defendant is entitled to his costs. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 32, it is enacted, that where several persons shall be made defendants in any personal action, and any one or more of them shall have a nolle prosequi entered as to him or them, every such person shall have judgment for and recover his reasonable costs. And where any nolle prosequi shall have been entered upon any count, or as to part of any declaration, the defendant shall be entitled to and have judgment for and recover his reasonable costs in that behalf (s. 33).

Nomen collectivum, a singular noun of multitude.

Nomen generalissimum, a most universal term, as land.

Nomen dicitur à noscendo, quia notitiam facit.—6 Co. 65.—(A name is called from the word to know, because it makes recognition.)

Nomen ducis mergitur nomine regis.—Jenk. Cent. 225.—(The name of the duke is merged in the name of king.)

Nomen est quasi rei notamen.—11 Co. 20.—(A name is, as it were, the note of a thing.)

Nomen non sufficit si res non sit de jure aut de facto.—4 Co. 107.—(The name is not sufficient if the thing be not by law or by fact.)

Nomenclator, one who calls things or persons by their proper names; one who opens the etymologies of names, interpreted.—Thesaurarius; Spelm.

Nomina Villarum, an account of the names of all the villages and the possessors thereof, in each county, drawn up by several sheriffs, 9 Edward II., and returned by them into the Exchequer, where it is still preserved.

Nomina si nescis perit cognitio rerum. Et nomina si perdas, certè distinctio rerum perditur. Co. Litt. 86.—(If you know not the names of things, the knowledge of things themselves perishes. And if you lose the names, the distinction of the things is certainly lost).

Nomina sunt notæ rerum.—11 Co. 20.—(Names are the notes of things).

Nomina sunt mutabilia, res autem immobiles. 6 Co. 66.—(Names are mutable, but things immutable).

Nomina sunt symbola rerum. — Godb. — (Names are the symbols of things).

Nominal partner, one who has not any actual interest in the trade or business, or its profits; but, by allowing his name to be used, holds himself out to the world as apparently having an interest.

'If a person will lend his name as a partner,' said Lord Chief Justice Eyre (Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bl. 235), 'he becomes, as against all the rest of the world, a partner, not upon the grounds of the real transaction between them, but upon principles of general policy, to prevent the frauds to which others would be liable, if they were to suppose they lent their money upon the apparent credit of three or four persons, when in fact they lent it only to two of them, to whom, without the others, they would have lent nothing.'

However, to render a person responsible as a nominal partner, positive consent, or at least a knowledge by him of the assumption of his name, from which his acquiescence will be inferred, must be shown.—Gow on Partnership, 12, 24, 25, 80, 129; Story on Partnership, 96, 112, 351.

Nominate contracts, those distinguished by particular names.

Nomination, the act of mentioning by name; especially the power of appointing, by virtue of some manor or otherwise, a clerk to a patron of a benefice, by him to be presented to the ordinary. A nominator must appoint his clerk within six months after avoidance; if he do not, and the patron presents his clerk before the bishop has taken any benefit of the lapse, he is obliged to admit such clerk.—Plowd. 529.

Nomine pœnæ, a penalty incurred for not paying rent, &c. at the day appointed in the lease or agreement for payment thereof.

Strictly speaking, no forfeiture can be called nomine pœnæ, unless it be for the non-payment of rent; but it is not unusual to mention stipulated penalties for other things, as for the non-payment of a collateral sum, for ploughing up ancient meadow, or above a certain number of acres in one year, for changing the character of particular premises, or the like, by the general name of nomine pœnæ.

Where a penalty is annexed to the non-payment of rent, and distress given for it, a demand must be made, and the penalty is waived by an acceptance of the rent.—Cowp. 247; Woodf. Land. and Ten. 327.

Nominee, a person nominated or appointed to any place or office; a surrenderee.

Nomocanon [fr. νόμος, Gk., law, and κανών, a rule], a collection of canons and imperial laws relative or conformable thereto.

The first nomocanon was made by Johannes Scholasticus in 554. Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, in 883, compiled another nomocanon, or collation of the civil laws with the canons; this is the most celebrated. Balsamon wrote a commentary upon it in 1180.

Also, a collection of the ancient canons of the apostles, councils, and fathers, without any regard to imperial constitutions. Such is the nomocanon by M. Cotelier.—Encyc. Lond.

Nomographer [fr. νόμος, Gk., law, and γράφω, to write], one who writes on the subject of laws.

Nomography, a treatise or description of laws.

Nomothesy [fr. νόμος, Gk., law, and τίθημι, to put], the institution of laws; the publication of laws.

Nomotheta [Gk.], a lawgiver, or law-commissioner.

Nomothetical, legislative.

Non, not. It is never used separately, but sometimes prefixed to words with a negative power.

Non-ability, inability; an exception against a person.

Non accipi debent verba in demonstrationem falsam quæ competunt in limitationem veram.—Bacon.—(Words which agree in a true meaning, ought not to be received in a false sense).

Non alio modo puniatur aliquis quam secundum quod se habet condemnatio.—3 Inst. 217. (A person may not be punished differently than according to what the sentence enjoins).

Nonæ et decimæ, payments made to the church, by those who were tenants of church-farms. The first was a rent or duty for things belonging to husbandry, the second was claimed in right of the church.

Non-acceptance, the refusal of acceptance.

Non acceptavit [Lat.] (he did not accept). This plea puts in issue the fact of the bill being due at the time of action brought, being a denial of a defendant having accepted such a bill as was described in the declaration.—Hinton v. Duff, 10 W. & M. 295.

Non-access, when a husband could not, in the course of nature, by reason of his absence, have been the father of his wife's child, the child is by law a bastard.

Access, or sexual intercourse, is certainly to be presumed during lawful wedlock; but this presumption may be encountered by proof of any circumstances which satisfactorily show that this sexual intercourse did not take place within such a time that the husband could, according to the laws of nature, be the fatheer and the proof of these circumstances must be regulated by the same principles as are applicable to the establishment of any other fact. The mother of the child whose legitimacy is questioned will not be allowed to prove the non-access of her husband, not even after her husband's death.—2 Phil. on Evid. 248.

Non-act, a forbearance from action; the contrary to act.

Non-admission, the refusal of admission.

Non-age, minority.

Nonagium, or Non-age, a ninth part of movables which was paid to the clergy on the death of persons in their parish, and claimed on pretence of being distributed to pious uses. Blount.

Non-appearance, the omission of timely and proper appearance; a failure of appearance.

Non assumpsit (he has not promised), a plea by way of traverse, which occurs in the action of assumpsit or promises.

The plea of non assumpsit operates as a denial in point of fact of the existence of any express promise to the effect alleged in the declaration, or of the matters of fact from which the promise alleged would be implied by law. But under this plea the defendant cannot insist that, though a contract was made as alleged, it is invalid in point of law, for this must form the subject of a special allegation, showing the circumstances out of which the illegality is supposed to arise.—Step. Plead. 183.

In assumpsit, the rules of Hilary Term, 1853, order that, 'In all actions of simple contract (except as thereinafter excepted) the plea of non assumpsit (which by the way is no longer properly called the general issue) or a plea traversing the contract or agreement alleged in the declaration, shall operate only as a denial in fact of the express contract, promise, or agreement alleged, or of the matters of fact from which the contract, promise, or agreement alleged may be implied by law, e. g. in an action on a warranty, such pleas will operate as a denial of the fact of the sale and warranty having been given, and not of the breach; and in an action on a policy of insurance, of the subscription to the alleged policy by the defendant, but not of the interest, of the commencement of the risk, of the loss, or of the alleged compliance with warranties. In actions against carriers and other bailees for not delivering or not keeping goods safe, or not returning them on request, and in actions against agents for not accounting, such pleas will operate as a denial of any express or implied contract to the effect alleged in the declaration, but not of the breach. To causes of action to which the plea of "never was indebted" is applicable as provided in Schedule B (36) of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and to those of a like nature, the plea of non assumpsit shall be inadmissible, and the plea of "never was indebted" will operate as a denial of those matters of fact from which the liability of the defendant arises; e. g. in actions for goods bargained and sold, or sold and delivered, the plea will operate as a denial of the bargain and sale, or sale and delivery in point of fact; in the like action for money had and received, it will operate as a denial both of the receipt of the money and the existence of those facts which makes such receipt by the defendant a receipt for the use of the plaintiff' (r. 6).

'In all actions upon bills of exchange and promissory notes, the plea of non assumpsit and never indebted shall be inadmissible. In such actions, therefore, a plea in denial must traverse some matter of fact, e. g. the drawing, or making, or indorsing, or accepting, or presenting a notice of the dishonor of the bill or note' (r. 7).

'In every species of action on contracts, all matters in confession and avoidance, including not only those by way of discharge, but those which show the transaction to be either void or voidable in point of law, on the ground of fraud or otherwise, shall be specially pleaded, e. g. infancy, coverture, release, payment, performance, illegality of consideration, either by statute or common law, drawing, indorsing, accepting, &c. bills or notes by way of accommodation, set-off, mutual credit, unseaworthiness, misrepresentation, concealment, deviation, and various other defences must be pleaded' (r. 8).

Non assumpsit infra sex annos (he has not promised within six years). The form of pleading the Statute of Limitations.

Non-attendance, the not giving personal attendance.

Non-attention, the want of proper and timely attention.

Non bis in idem (not twice tried for the same offence).

Non cepit (he took not), a plea by way of traverse, which occurs in the action of replevin.

This plea applies to the case where the defendant has not, in fact, taken the cattle or goods, or where he did not take them or have them, in the place mentioned in the declaration; the place being a material point in this action.

Non-claim, the omission or neglect of him that ought to challenge his right within a time limited, as within a year and day, but now no continual or other claim shall preserve any right of making an entry or distress, or of bringing an action.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 11.

Non compos mentis, said of a person who is not of sound memory and understanding. See IDIOTS and MENTAL ALIENATION.

Non con, an abbreviation of nonconformist, which see; or of non-content.

Non concedantur citationes priusquam exprimatur super quâ re fieri debet citatio.—12 Co. 47.—(Summonses should not be granted before it is expressed on what matter the summons ought to be made).

Non concessit (he did not grant), a plea resorted to by a stranger to a deed, because estoppels do not hold with respect to strangers.

This plea brings into issue the title of the grantor as well as the operation of the deed.

Nonconformist, one who refuses to comply with others; one who refuses to join in the established worship.

Nonconformists are of two sorts: (1) such as absent themselves from divine worship in the established church through total irreligion, and attend the service of no other persuasion; (2) such as attend the religious service of another persuasion. See DISSENTER.

Nonconformity, refusal of compliance.

Non constat (it is not plain).

Non culpabilis, sometimes abbreviated Non cul. (not guilty.)

Non damnificatus (not injured), a plea in an action of debt on an indemnity bond, or bond conditioned 'to keep the plaintiff harmless and indemnified, &c.'

This is in the nature of a plea of performance; being used where the defendant means to allege that the plaintiff has been kept harmless and indemnified, according to the tenor of the condition; and it is pleaded in general terms without showing the particular manner of the indemnification.—Step. Plead. 378.

Non debent mulieribus assignari castra in dotem quæ fuerunt virorum suorum et quæ de guerra existunt, vel etiam homagia et servicia aliquorum de guerra existentia.—Co. Litt. 31. (Castles which belonged to their husbands, and which are for war, ought not to be assigned to widows as dower, or even homage or services of things belonging to war.)

Non debet adduci exceptio ejus rei cujus petitur dissolutio.—Jenk. Cent. 37.—(An exception of the thing, whose abolition is sought, ought not to be adduced.)

Non debet dici tendere in præjudicium ecclesi-asticæ libertatis quod pro rege et republicâ necessarium videtur.—2 Inst. 625.—(That which seems necessary for the king and the state ought not to be said to tend to the prejudice of spiritual liberty.)

Non decimando, a custom or prescription to be discharged of all tithes, &c.

Non decipitur qui scit se decipi.—5 Co. 60. (He is not deceived who knows himself to be deceived.)

Non definitur in jure quid sit conatus.—6 Co. 41.—(What an attempt is, is not defined in law.)

Non detinet, a plea by way of traverse, which occurs in the action of detinue.

This plea alleges that the defendant does not detain 'the said goods in the said declaration specified, &c.' It operates accordingly as a denial of the detention of the goods in question by the defendant. But, under this form of plea, the defendant cannot deny that the goods were the plaintiff's property.—Step. Plead. 177.

Non differunt quæ concordant re, tametsi non in verbis iisdem.—Jenk. Cent. 70.—(Those things that agree in substance, though not in the same words, do not differ.)

Non dimisit (he demised not), a plea resorted to where a plaintiff declares upon a demise without stating the indenture in an action of debt for rent.

Also, a plea in bar, in replevin to an avowry for arrears of rent, that the avowant did not demise.

Non distringendo, a writ not to distrain.—Obsolete.

Non effecit affectus nisi sequatur. Sed in atrocioribus delictis punitur affectus, licet non sequatur effectus.—2 Rol. Rep. 89.—(The intention fulfils nothing unless an effect follow. But in the deeper delinquencies, the intention is punished, although an effect follow not.)

Nones, days so called because they reckoned nine days from them to the Ides.

The seventh day of March, May, July, and October, and the fifth day of all other months. Kenn. Antiq. 92.

Non est arctius vinculum inter homines quam jusjurandum.—Jenk. Cent. 126.—(There is no tighter link among mankind than an oath.)

Non est consonum rationi, quod cognitio accessorii in curiâ christianitatis impediatur, ubi cognitio causæ principalis ad forum ecclesiasticum noscitur pertinere.—12 Co. 65.—(It is unreasonable that the cognizance of an accessory matter should be impeded in an ecclesiastical court, when the cognizance of the principal cause is admitted to appertain to an ecclesiastical court.)

Non est disputandum contra principia negantem.—Co. Litt. 343.—(We cannot dispute against a man denying principles.)

Non est factum, a plea by way of traverse, which occurs in debt on bond or other specialty, and also in covenant.

This plea denies that the deed mentioned in the declaration is the defendant's deed; under this the defendant may contend at the trial that the deed was never executed in point of fact. But he cannot, under this plea, deny its validity in point of law, for this should form the subject of a special allegation, showing the circumstance out of which the illegality is supposed to arise. None but the party, his heirs, executors, &c. can plead non est factum, for a stranger to a deed cannot; he must say nothing passed by the deed.

By the rules of Hilary Term, 1853, 'In actions on specialties or covenants, the plea of non est factum shall operate as a denial of the execution of the deed in point of fact only, and all other defences shall be specially pleaded, including matters which make the deed absolutely void, as well as those which make it voidable' (r. 10).

Non est inventus, a sheriff's return to a writ when the defendant is not to be found in his bailiwick.

Non est juri consonum quod quis super iis quorum cognitio ad nos pertinet, curiâ christianitatis trahatur in placitum.—12. Co. 44.—(It is unreasonable that any one should be drawn to plead in an ecclesiastical court to those things the cognizance of which belongs to us.)

Non est justum aliquem antenatum post mortem facere bastardum, qui toto tempore vitæ suæ pro legitimo habebatur.—Co. Litt. 244.—(It is not just to make an elder born a bastard after his death, who, during his lifetime, was accounted legitimate.)

Non est recedendum a communi observantiâ. 2 Co. 74.—(There is no departing from common observance.)

Non est regula quin fallat.—Office of Executor, 212.—(There is no rule which may not fail.)

Non facias malum, ut inde veniat bonum.—11 Co. 74.—(You are not to do evil that thence good may arise.)

Non-feasance, an offence of omission of what ought to be done.

Non impedit clausula derogatoria quo minus ab eâdem potestate res dissolvantur a quâ constituuntur.—Bacon.—(A derogatory clause does not impede things from being dissolved by the same power by which they are created.)

Non in legendo sed in intelligendo leges consistunt.—8 Co. 167.—(The laws consist not in being read, but in being understood.)

Non jus sed seisina facit stipitem.—Fleta, l. vi.—(Not right, but seisin, makes a stock.)

Non licet quod dispendio licet.—Co. Litt. 127.—(That which is permitted at a loss is not permitted.)

Non implacitando aliquem de libero tenemento sine brevi, a writ to prohibit bailiffs, &c. from distraining or impleading any man touching his freehold without the king's writ.—Reg. Orig. 171. Obsolete.

Non infregit conventionem, a plea which raises a substantial issue in an action for non-repair according to covenant, whether there was a want of repairs or not.—1 Selw. Nisi Prius, 561.

Non intromittant clause, a clause exempting a smaller jurisdiction from being included in a larger.

Non intromittendo, quando breve præcipe in capite subdole impetratur, a writ addressed to the justices of the bench, or in eyre, commanding them not to give one who under color of entitling the king to land, &c. as holding of him, in capite, had deceitfully obtained the writ called præcipe in capite, any benefit thereof, but to put him to his writ of right.—Reg. Orig. 4. Obsolete.

Non-issuable pleas, those upon which a decision would not determine the action upon the merits, as a plea in abatement.

Non-joinder, a plea in abatement for the non joinder of a person as co-defendant; it must state that the person who is the subject of the plea resides within the jurisdiction, and his residence must be stated with convenient certainty in an affidavit verifying the plea.

No action or suit commenced to recover damages for loss or injury to any parcel, package, or person, shall abate, for the want of joining any co-proprietor, in any mail, stage coach, or other public conveyance, by land, for hire.—1 Wm. IV. c. 68, s. 5. See 7 Geo. IV. c. 46.

Non-joinder of plaintiffs and defendants is amendable by C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 34–46. See Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 403, 897, 1550.

Non-juring [fr. non and juro, Lat., to swear], applied to those who would not swear allegiance to the Hanoverian family.—Encyc. Lond.

Non-juror, one who, conceiving the Stuart family unjustly deposed, refused to swear allegiance to those who succeeded them.

Non liquet (it does not appear clear), a verdict given by a jury, when a matter was to be deferred to another day of trial.

The same phrase was used by the Romans; after hearing a cause, such of the judges as thought it not sufficiently clear to pronounce upon, cast a ballot into the urn with the two letters N. L. for non liquet.

Non merchandizando victualia, an ancient writ addressed to justices of assize, to inquire whether the magistrates of a town sold victuals in gross or by retail, during the time of their being in office, which was contrary to an obsolete statute; and to punish them if they did. Reg. Orig. 184. Obsolete.

Non molestando, a writ that lay for a person who was molested contrary to the king's protection granted to him.—Reg. Orig. 184.

Non observatâ formâ infertur adnullatio actûs.—5 Co. Ecc. L. 98.—(When form is not observed, a failure of the action ensues.)

Non obstante (notwithstanding), a license from the Crown to do that which could not be lawfully done without it. Also, a clause frequent in statutes and letters-patent, importing a license from the Crown to do a thing, which by common law might be done, but being restrained by Act of Parliament could not be done without such license.—Plowd. 501; 2 Reeves, c. viii., p. 83.

But the doctrine of non obstantes, which sets the prerogative above the laws, was effectually demolished by the Bill of Rights at the Revolution; for it is enacted by 1 W. & M. 2, c. 2, that no dispensation, by non obstante of or to any statute, or any part thereof, shall be allowed, but that the same shall be held void and of none effect, except a dispensation be allowed in such statute.

Non obstante veredicto, judgment. See JUDGMENT NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

Non officit conatus nisi sequatur effectus.—11 Co. 98.—(An attempt does not hinder unless a consequence follow.)

Non omittas, the clause 'that you omit not by reason of any liberty in your bailiwick,' which is usually inserted in all processes addressed to sheriffs, which makes the liberty pro hâc vice, parcel of the sheriff's bailiwick, and the sheriff must enter and execute the writ within the liberty.

If a writ do not contain a non omittas clause, the sheriff directs his mandate either to the lord or the bailiff of the liberty, by whom the writ is executed and returned.

Non omnium quæ a majoribus nostris constituta sunt ratio reddi potest.—4 Co. 78.—(The reason of all the things which were instituted by our ancestors cannot be given.)

Non pertinet ad judicem secularem cognoscere de iis quæ sunt merè spiritualia annexa.—2 Inst. 488.—(It belongs not to the secular judge to take cognizance of things which are merely spiritual.)

Non-plevin, default in not replevying land in due time.

Non ponendis in assisis et juratis, a writ formerly granted for freeing and discharging persons from serving on assizes and juries.—F. N. B. 165.

Non potest adduci exceptio ejus rei cujus petitur dissolutio.—Bac. Max. 22.—(An exception of the same thing whose avoidance is sought, cannot be made.)

Where the legality of some proceeding is the subject in dispute between two parties, he who maintains its legality, and seeks to take advantage of it, cannot rely upon the proceeding itself as a bar to the adverse party; for otherwise the person aggrieved would be clearly without redress.

Non potest rex gratiam facere cum injuriâ et damno aliorum; quod autem alienum est dare non potest per suam gratiam.—3 Inst. 236.—(The king cannot confer a favor at the expense or to the injury of others; for what is the property of another, he cannot give as his own favor.)

Non potest rex subditum renitentem onerare impositionibus.—2 Inst. 61.—(The king cannot load a subject with impositions against his consent.)

Non præstat impedimentum quod de jure non sortitur effectum.— Jenk. Cent. 162.—(An impediment which does not by law produce a consequence, avails not.)

Non procedendo ad assisam rege inconsulto, a writ to stop the trial of a cause appertaining to one who is in the royal service, &c. until the sovereign's pleasure be further known.—Reg. Orig. 220.

Non pros, abbrev. for non prosequitur. See JUDGMENT OF NON PROS.

Non quod dictum est, sed quod factum est inspicitur.—Co. Litt. 36.—(Not what is said but what is done is to be regarded.)

Non refert an quis assensum suum præfert verbis, an rebus ipsis et factis.—10 Co. 52.—(It matters not whether a man gives his assent by his words, or by his acts and deeds.)

Non refert quid ex æquipollentibus fiat.—5 Co. 122.—(It matters not which of [two] equivalents happen.)

Non refert quid notum sit judici, si notum non sit in formâ judicii.—3 Buls. 115.—(It matters not what is known to the judge, if it be not known in a judicial form.)

Non refert verbis an factis fit revocatio.—Cro. Car. 49.—(It matters not whether a revocation is made by words or deeds.)

Non-residence, failure of residence.

Non-residentia pro clerico regis, a writ addressed to the bishop, charging him not to molest a clerk employed in the royal service, by reason of his non-residence; in which case he is to be discharged.—Reg. Orig. 58.

Non respondebit minor; nisi in causâ dotis, et hoc pro favore doti.—4 Co. 71.—(A minor shall not answer unless in a case of dower, and this in favor of dower.)

Non-sane memory, a person laboring under mental alienation, which see.

Nonsense. Where a matter set forth is grammatically right, but absurd in the sense and unintelligible, some words cannot be rejected to make sense of the rest, but they must be taken as they are; for there is nothing so absurd but what, by rejecting, may be made sense; but where a matter is nonsense, by being contradictory and repugnant to somewhat precedent, there the precedent matter which is sense shall not be defeated by the repugnancy which follows; but that which is contradictory shall be rejected.

Non sequitur (it does not follow).

Non solum quid licet, sed quid est conveniens considerandum; quia nihil quod inconveniens est licitum.—Co. Litt. 66.—(Not only what is permitted, but what is proper, is to be considered; because nothing which is improper is legal.)

Non solvency, inability to pay.

Non solvendo pecuniam ad quam clericus mulctatur pro non-residentia, a writ prohibiting an ordinary to take a pecuniary mulct imposed on a clerk of the sovereign for non-residence.—Reg. Writ, 59.

Nonsuit [non est prosecutus, Lat.] See JUDGMENT AS IN CASE OF A NONSUIT.

Non sum informatus, a formal answer made of course by an attorney, that he is not informed to say anything material in defence of his client; by which he is deemed to leave it undefended, and so judgment passes against his client. See JUDGMENT IN DEFAULT.

Non-summons, wager of law of, the mode in which a tenant or defendant in a real action pleaded, when the summons which followed the original was not served within the proper time.—31 Eliz. c. 3, s. 2; 2 Saund. 45 c.

Non sunt longa ubi nihil est quod demere possit.—Vaugh. 138.—(There is no prolixity where there is nothing which can be taken away.)

Non temerè credere, est nervus sapientiæ:—5 Co. 114.—(Not to believe rashly is the nerve of wisdom.)

Non tenuit, a plea in bar, in replevin, to avowry for arrears of rent, that the plaintiff did not hold in manner and form, as the avowry alleges.

Non-tenure, a plea in bar to a real action, by saying that he (the defendant) held not the land mentioned in the plaintiff's count or declaration, or at least some part thereof. It is either general, where one denied ever to have been tenant of the land in question, or special, where it is alleged he was not tenant on the day whereon the writ was purchased.—1 Mod. 181.

The form of pleading a special non-tenure is to be found in Co. Eccl. 620 a.

Non-terminus, the vacation between term and term, formerly called the time or days of the king's peace.

Non-user, neglect of official duty.

Non valebit felonis generatio, nec ad hæreditatem paternam vel maternam; si autem ante feloniam generationem fecerit, talis generatio succedit in hæreditate patris vel matris à quo non fuerit felonia perpetrata.—3 Co. 41.—

(The offspring of a felon cannot succeed either to a maternal or paternal inheritance; but if he had offspring before the felony, such offspring may succeed to the inheritance of the father or mother by whom the felony was not committed.)

This is not now the rule, for descendants can trace through a felon-ancestor.

Non valet confirmatio, nisi ille, qui confirmat, sit in possessione rei vel juris unde fieri debet confirmatio; et eodem modo, nisi ille cui confirmatio fit, sit in possessione.—Co. Litt. 295.—(Confirmation is not valid unless he who confirms is either in possession of the thing itself, or of the right of which confirmation is to be made, and, in like manner, unless he to whom confirmation is made is in possession.)

Non valet impedimentum quod de jure non sortitur effectum.—4 Co. 31.—(An impediment is of no avail which by law has no effect.)

Non videtur consensum retinuisse si quis ex præscripto minantis aliquid immutavit.—Bacon. (He does not appear to have retained consent, who has changed anything through menaces.)

Nook of land [nocata terræ, Lat.], twelve acres and a half, sed qu.

Norfolk Island. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 35.

Norroy [fr. nord and roy, Fr.], the title of the third of the three Kings at arms, or provincial heralds. See HERALD.

Noscitur ex socio, qui non cognoscitur ex se. Moor. 817.—(He who cannot be known from himself may be known from his associate.)

Nosocomi, managers of pauper-hospitals.—Civ. Law.

Notarial, taken by a notary.

Notary, or Notary public [fr. notaire, Fr.; fr. notarius, Lat.], an officer whose business it is to take notes of anything which may concern the public; he publicly attests deeds or writings to make them authentic in another country; but principally in mercantile affairs, as to make protests of bills of exchange, &c. He must serve an apprenticeship of seven years, and be admitted in the civil law courts. He cannot permit another to act in his name, and in London he must be free of the Scriveners' Company. See 41 Geo. III. c. 79; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 70; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 90; 2 Chit. Gen. Prac. 36.

Note a bill. When a bill has been dishonored, it is usual for a notary public to present it again on the same day, and if it be not then paid, to make a minute consisting of his initials, the day, month, and year, and reason, if assigned, of non-payment. The making of this minute is called noting the bill. See Smith's Merc. Law. See NOTING.

Note of a fine, a brief of a fine made by the chirographer before it was engrossed. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Note of allowance. Either party alleging error in law may deliver to one of the masters of the court a memorandum in writing in the form contained in the Schedule (A) to the C. L. P. A. 1852, annexed, marked No. 10, or to the like effect, entitled in the court and cause, and signed by the party or his attorney, alleging that there is error in law in the record and proceedings; whereupon the master shall file such memorandum, and deliver to the party lodging the same a note of the receipt thereof; and a copy of such note, together with a statement of the grounds of error intended to be argued, may be served on the opposite party or his attorney.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 149.

Proceedings in error in law shall be deemed a supersedeas of execution from the time of the service of the copy of such note, together with the statement of the grounds of error intended to be argued, until default in putting in bail, or an affirmance of the judgment or discontinuance of the proceedings in error, or until the proceedings in error shall be otherwise disposed of without a reversal of the judgment; provided always, that if the grounds of error shall appear to be frivolous, the court or a judge upon summons may order execution to issue (s. 150).

Note of hand, a promissory note.

Note promissory. See PROMISSORY NOTE.

Notes, memoranda made by a judge on a trial, as to the evidence adduced, and the points reserved, &c. A copy of the judge's notes, to be used on the motion for a new trial, is obtained from his clerk.

Not found, no true bill. See IGNORAMUS.

Not guilty, a plea by way of traverse which occurs in actions ex delicto, and amounts to a denial only of the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant.—H. T. 1853, r. 16.

The plea of not guilty, in criminal proceedings, is the proper form wherever a prisoner means either to deny or justify the charge in the indictment, in which case a special plea is generally improper.

Thus on an indictment for murder, a man cannot plead that it was his own defence against a robber on the highway, or a burglar, but he must plead the general issue, not guilty, and give this special matter in evidence. For, besides that these pleas do in effect amount to the general issue, since, if true, the prisoner is most clearly not guilty, as the facts in treason are laid to be done proditorie et contra ligeantiæ suæ delictum, and in felony, that the killing was done felonice, these charges of a traitorous or felonious intent are the points and very gist of the indictment, and must be answered directly by the general negative, not guilty; the effect of which is, that on the one hand it puts the prosecutor to the proof of every material fact alleged in the indictment or information, and on the other it entitles the defendant to avail himself of any defensive circumstances as amply as if he had pleaded them in a specific form. So that this is, upon all accounts, the most advantageous plea for a prisoner.

By the plea of not guilty, the prisoner puts himself upon the trial by jury; and when the record is afterwards made up (for the proceedings ought regularly to be recorded, according to the analogy of the practice in civil cases), the prosecutor on the part of the Crown adds the similiter (as it is called), by the words that he 'doth the like.' But even before this formal entry, the similiter is supposed to be added by the prosecutor, immediately on the plea of not guilty being pleaded by the defendant, which brings the parties to issue, so that a trial may ensue.—4 Step. Com. 478, 490.

Not guilty by statute. See GENERAL ISSUE.

Nothus [fr. νόθος, Gk.], a natural child or a person of spurious birth.

Notice, the making something known to a person of which he was or might be ignorant. Notice is either (1) statutory, i. e. made so by legislative enactment; (2) actual, which brings the knowledge of a fact directly home to the party; or, (3) constructive or implied, which is no more than evidence of facts which raise such a strong presumption of notice that equity will not allow the presumption to be rebutted. Constructive notice may be subdivided into: (a) where there exists actual notice of matter, to which equity has added constructive notice of facts, which an inquiry after such matter would have elicited; and (b) where there has been a designed abstinence from inquiry for the very purpose of escaping notice. The rules of constructive notice have been already carried to an inconvenient length, and they should not be extended.—Per L. C. Cranworth, Ware v. Earl of Egmont, 3 Eq. Rep. 6, 13 (1854). Notice, whether actual or constructive, in order to be binding, must be received during the transaction (in re gestâ) sought to be effected by it. Where judgments have been registered, the fact that searches have been made in the judgment book of the court, where such judgments were entered up, will fix the party searching with notice.—Procter v. Cooper, 2 Eq. Rep. 450 (1853). Whatever is sufficient to put a person upon inquiry (provided there is a reasonable certainty as to time, place, circumstances, and persons), is in equity held to be good notice to bind him. The mere registration of a conveyance is not deemed constructive notice to subsequent purchasers; and actual notice must be established against them. To constitute constructive notice, it is sufficient to affect the conscience of the agent, attorney, or counsel of the party; for in such cases the law presumes notice in the principal, since it would be a breach of trust in the former not to communicate the fact to the latter. A clerk who searches the register for judgments against A. B. will, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be presumed to have seen a judgment which was at the time registered against A. B. Whether this is notice to his principal, if it be proved or could be inferred that the clerk did not communicate to him the result of his search, quære.—Procter v. Cooper, 3 Eq. Rep. 364 (1855), on App. A public act of parliament binds all mankind; but a private act of parliament is not, of itself, notice to a purchaser. A lis pendens, of which a purchaser has not express notice, will not bind him, unless the title of the case with other particulars be registered. 2 Vict. c. 11, s. 7. Bonâ fide purchases for valuable consideration are not to be impeached by notice of an act of bankruptcy, unless a petition for adjudication be filed within twelve calendar months after such an act of bankruptcy.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 134. The mere fact of attesting the execution of a deed is not of itself notice of that deed, for a witness is not as such privy to its contents.

A purchaser with notice may protect himself by purchasing the title of another bonâ fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice; for, otherwise, such bonâ fide purchaser would not enjoy the full benefit of his own unexceptionable title. If a person, who has notice (except in the case of a charity), sell to another, who has no notice, and is a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration, the latter may protect his title, although it was affected with the equity arising from notice, in the hands of the person from whom he derived it; for, otherwise, no man would be safe in any purchase, but would be liable to have his own title defeated by secret equities, of which he could have no possible means of making a discovery.—Le Neve v. Le Neve, Amb. 436 (1747); 2 Tud. Lead. Cas. 21–48.

A purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice of a prior equitable right, who obtains the legal estate at the time of his purchase, is entitled to priority in equity, as well as at law, according to the well-known maxim—where the conflicting equities are equal, the law shall prevail. Nor will equity prevent a bonâ fide purchaser, without notice, from protecting himself against a person claiming under a prior equitable title, by getting in the outstanding legal estate, because, as the equities of both parties are equal, there is no reason why the purchaser should be deprived of the advantage he may obtain at law by his superior activity or diligence. And not only where the purchaser has actually obtained, but where he has the best right to call for the legal estate, he will be entitled to the protection of equity.—

Basset v. Nosworthy, Rep. Temp. Finch, 102 (1673); 2 Tudor's Lead. Cas. 1–20; and Lord St. Leonards' V. and P. c. xxiv., pp. 620–640.

Notice of action. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1288.

Notice to admit. The parties to a suit frequently, by their attornies, agree to admit at the trial documents and other facts; and such agreement is often desirable, to save trouble and expense, where there is no real ground for disputing them.

Either party may call on the other party by notice to admit any document, saving all just exceptions; and in case of refusal, or neglect to admit, the costs of proving the document shall be paid by the party so neglecting or refusing, whatever the result of the cause may be, unless at the trial the judge shall certify that the refusal to admit was reasonable; and no costs of proving any document shall be allowed unless such notice be given, except in cases where the omission to give the notice is in the opinion of the master a saving of expense.—C. L. P. A. (1852), s. 117.

An affidavit of the attorney in the cause, or his clerk, of the due signature of any admissions made in pursuance of such notice, and annexed to the affidavit, shall be in all cases sufficient evidence of such admissions (s. 118).

It is not compulsory in any case, on the party intending to produce documents in evidence, to adopt the above course, and when it is deemed disadvantageous to inform the opposite party of the nature or contents of the documents proposed to be offered at the trial, the premature disclosure may be avoided; but, in that event, the costs of proving the document fall inevitably on the party producing it in evidence.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 319.

Notice of filing declaration. It is not necessary to give notice to a defendant of the filing of a declaration, unless ordered by the court or a judge.—Ibid. 212.

Notice of dishonor. If the drawer of a bill of exchange have not reasonable notice of the drawee's refusal to accept or pay, he is exonerated, unless he have no effects in the hands of the drawee at the time of drawing, or while the bill is running or when it becomes due, for then he is not entitled to notice. In the case of non-payment of a bill of exchange, the holder must give notice thereof within the next day to the drawer and all the endorsers, from whom he means to require payment of the bill, otherwise they will be discharged.

Notice of inquiry. The plaintiff must give a written notice of executing a writ of inquiry to the defendant or his attorney. Notice of trial or inquiry, and of continuance of trial or inquiry, shall be given in town; but countermand of notice of trial or inquiry may be given either in town or country, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge. Ten days' notice shall be given, unless it is to be a short notice, and then four days are sufficient.

Notice to plead. This is necessary in all cases before the plaintiff can sign judgment for want of a plea. It is usually endorsed on the declaration when delivered, but may be given on a separate paper; when the declaration is filed, it is given in the notice of declaration.

The notice must generally be to plead within eight days, but see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 230, 244, 245, 571, 574.

Notice to produce. If the adverse party be in possession of any written instrument which would be evidence for him if produced, a notice to produce it at the trial may be served either upon him, his attorney, or agent. The notice must specify the instrument with a particularity sufficient to inform the opposite party what he is called upon to produce. It must be served a reasonable time before trial, so as to enable the party served to make an effectual search, and produce the same at the proper time.

It is optional with the party upon whom the notice has been served to produce the instrument required or not. If he do not, then, upon proving the service of the notice, which is done by affidavit pursuant to C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 119, it will be permitted to prove the contents of the instrument by a copy or other secondary evidence, in the same manner as if it had been destroyed or lost.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 323.

Notice to quit. Where there is a tenancy from year to year subsisting, it can only be put an end to by a notice to quit, which may be given by either party, and must be given six months previously to the expiration of the current year of tenancy, so as to expire at the same period of the year in which the tenant entered upon the premises. This rule is to be invariably followed in all cases, except where there is some special agreement between the parties to a different effect, or it would seem where a particular local custom intervenes.

Where the relation of landlord and tenant does not exist, a notice to quit is out of the question. Where the term of a lease is to end on a precise day, there is no occasion for a notice to quit previously to bringing an action of ejectment, because both parties are equally apprised of the determination of the term. If a tenant continue in possession for a year after his lease has expired, or rent has been received, a notice must be given before he can be ejected; for where, by consent of both parties, a tenant continues in possession after the expiration of his term, the law implies a tacit renovation of the contract, and in such cases the tenant holds upon the former terms. No fresh notice, however, is necessary where a tenant, after having given a notice, holds over for a year, and pays double rent according to 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 18. Where a lessee holds under a void demise, no notice is necessary; but where a lease granted by a tenant for life under a limited power of leasing, which exceeded his power, was void, and not capable of being confirmed by the remainder-man, yet the remainder-man received money as rent after the death of the tenant for life, it was held to be an admission of a tenancy from year to year, and that a notice to quit must be given before any ejectment could be brought. And though a lease be void by the Statute of Frauds as to the duration of the term, it is considered that the tenant holds under the terms of the lease in other respects, and therefore that the landlord can only put an end to the tenancy at the expiration of the year. In the case of a tenancy from year to year, so long as both parties please, if the tenant die, his personal representatives have the same interest in the land which their testator or intestate had, and are therefore entitled to the same notice to quit; for such tenancy is a chattel interest, and whatever chattel the deceased had must vest in them as his legal representatives. Where the reversion has been conveyed by the lessor during the existence of the tenancy from year to year, the tenant is entitled to a notice to quit before he can be ejected by the grantee of the reversion. Where an infant becomes entitled to the reversion of an estate, leased from year to year, he cannot eject the tenant without giving the same notice as the original lessor must have given. No notice to quit is necessary where the tenant does an act which amounts to a disavowal of the title of the lessor; as where the tenant has attorned to some other person, or answered an application for rent, by saying that his connection as tenant with the party applying has ceased. It is not necessary for a mortgagee to give a notice previously to bringing an ejectment either to the mortgagor or to a tenant who claims under a lease from the mortgagor, granted after the mortgage, without the privity of the mortgagee. And a mortgagee need not give notice to a tenant to quit, before bringing his ejectment, if he mean only to get into the receipt of the rents and profits of the estate, though the mortgage be made subsequently to the tenant's lease; but in such case he shall not be suffered to turn the tenant out of possession by the execution. A tenant from year to year, whose tenancy commenced before a mortgage or grant of the reversion, is entitled to a notice to quit, before he can be ejected by the mortgagee or grantee.

A parol notice to quit by a tenant under a parol lease is sufficient, but where a power is given to determine a lease on giving a notice in writing, it cannot be determined on giving a parol notice. The notice should, however, in all cases be in writing, as being more susceptible of proof, and it may be attested by a witness, who, however, need not be called to prove it.—C. L. P. A. (1854), s. 26.

A notice to quit, signed by one of several joint-tenants on behalf of the others, is sufficient to determine a tenancy from year to year, as to all. A notice given by a mortgagor before default, was held a good notice to determine the tenancy; and a notice given by a steward of a corporation is sufficient, without evidence that he had an authority under seal from the corporation for such purpose. A receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery, with a general authority to let the lands to tenants from year to year, has authority to determine such tenancies by a regular notice to quit. A mere agent to receive rents has no implied authority to give a notice to quit; but an agent to receive rents and let has authority to determine a tenancy. An agent ought to have authority to give such notice at the time when it begins to operate; for a subsequent recognition of the authority will not make the notice good. And a notice to quit by an agent of an agent is not sufficient without a recognition. A notice on an under-tenant, given by the original lessor, is not good.

The notice should be clear and certain, neither ambiguous nor optional. The merely leaving a notice to quit at the tenant's house with a servant, without further proof of its having been explained to the servant, or that it came to the tenant's hands, is not sufficient.

In the ordinary case of a tenancy from year to year, there must be half a year's notice to quit, ending at that period of the year at which the tenancy commenced; and where the rent is reserved quarterly, it does not dispense with the regular half-year's notice to quit required by law. Where the time of the commencement of the tenancy is doubtful, it is always safest to give a general notice to quit at the end of the year of tenancy; which shall expire after one half-year from the time of service of the notice. Where premises are let from year to year, upon an agreement that either party may determine the tenancy by a quarter's notice, the notice must expire at the period of the year when the tenancy commenced.

If a landlord receive or distrain for rent due after the expiration of a notice to quit, it is a waiver of that notice, and giving a second notice to quit amounts to waiver of a notice previously given. If a landlord have given a notice to quit, and the tenant holds over, the landlord cannot waive his notice and distrain for rent subsequently accruing. If, at the end of the year (where there has been a tenancy from year to year), the landlord accept another person as his tenant in the room of the former tenant, without any surrender in writing, such acceptance shall be a dispensation of a notice to quit.—Woodf. L. and T. 286, et seq.

Notice of trial at Common Law. Notice of trial must be given in all cases where there is an issue to be tried by a jury, except where a cause is made a remanet from one sittings to another, or put off by order of Nisi Prius.

It is usual to indorse it on the issue.

Ten days' notice of trial or inquiry shall be given, and shall be sufficient in all cases, whether at bar or Nisi Prius, in town or country, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge.—C. L. P. A. (1852), s. 97.

A countermand of notice of trial shall be given four days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial, unless short notice of trial has been given, and then two days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge, or by consent (s. 98).

A rule for costs of the day for not proceeding to trial pursuant to notice, or not countermanding in sufficient time, may be drawn up on affidavit without motion (s. 99).

The expression 'Short notice of trial,' or, 'Short notice of inquiry,' shall in all cases be taken to mean four days.

Notice of trial or inquiry may be continued to any sitting in or after term, on giving a notice of continuance four days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial or inquiry, unless short notice of trial or inquiry has been given, in which cases two days' previous notice shall be sufficient, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge, or by consent.—H. T. 1853, rr. 35 & 36.

A defendant is not bound to return an irregular notice of trial, and therefore does not waive the irregularity by retaining it.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 312.

Noting. It is usual in cases of non-payment of bills of exchange, for London bankers, after six o'clock on the day upon which the bill falls due, to cause inland bills to be noted, which is merely the first part of the duty required by law of a notary in protesting a bill. This duty consists of three parts: (1) noting; (2) demanding; and (3) protesting. In the case of inland bills, a protest being totally useless, it follows that noting is almost equally so; and the expense usually charged stands merely upon the custom, there being no law or decision in its favor.

Although, in the case of inland bills of exchange, neither noting nor protesting is necessary, the case is widely different in the case of a dishonored foreign bill, which should certainly be taken to a notary the day it is refused acceptance or payment, and it is his business to note, demand, and protest it; and notice of this must be sent the same day to the drawer and indorsers, with a copy of the bill, if the drawer and indorsers are abroad, but mere notice is sufficient if they are in England. Novæ Narrationes (new counts). The collection called Novæ Narrationes contains pleadings in actions during the reign of Edward III. It consists principally of declarations, as the title imports; but there are sometimes pleas and the subsequent pleadings. The Articuli ad Novas Narrationes is usually subjoined to this little book, and is a small treatise on the method of pleading. It first treats of actions and courts, then goes through each particular writ, and the declaration upon it, accompanied with directions, and illustrated by precedents.—3 Reeves, c. xvi., p. 152.

Novellæ, those constitutions of the Civil Law which were made after the publication of the Theodosian code; but sometimes the Julian edition only is meant.

Novellæ or Novellæ Constitutiones form a part of the Corpus Juris. Most of them were published in Greek, and their Greek title is Αὐτοκράτορος Ἰουστινιανοῦ Αὐγούστου Νεαραὶ Διατάξεις. Some of them were published in Latin, and some in both languages.

The first of these Novellæ of Justinian belongs to the year A.D. 535 (Nov. 1), and the latest to the year A.D. 565 (Nov. 137), but most of them were published between the years 535 and 539. These Constitutiones were published after the completion of the second edition of the Code, for the purpose of supplying what was deficient in that work. Indeed it appears that on the completion of his second edition of the Code, the emperor designed to form any new constitutions which he might publish into a body by themselves, so as to render a third revision of the Code unnecessary, and that he contemplated giving to this body of law the name of Novellæ Constitutiones.—Const. Cordi, s. 4.

It does not, however, appear that any official compilation of these new constitutions appeared in the lifetime of Justinian.

The Greek text of the Novellæ, as we now have them, consists of 168 Novellæ, of which 159 belong to Justinian, and the rest to Justin the Second and to Tiberius; they are generally divided into chapters.

There is a Latin epitome of these Novellæ by Julian, a teacher of the law at Constantinople, which contains 125 Novellæ. The Epitome was probably made in the time of Justinian, and the author was probably Antecessor at Constantinople.

There is also another collection of 134 Novellæ, in a Latin version made from the Greek text. This collection is generally called Liber Authenticorum; the compiler and the time of the compilation are unknown.

This collection has been made independently of the Greek compilation. It is divided into nine collationes, and the collationes are divided into tituli.

The most complete work on the history of the Novellæ is by Biener, Geschichte der Novellen. See also Beytrag zu Litterar-Geschichte des Novellen Auszugs von Julian, Von Haubold, Zeitschrift, &c. iv.; Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Novitas non tam utilitate prodest quam novitate perturbat.—Jenk. Cent. 167.—(Novelty benefits not so much by its utility as it disturbs by its novelty.)

Nuces colligere (to collect nuts).

This was formerly one of the works or services imposed by lords upon their inferior tenants.—Par. Antiq. 495.

Nude contract, one made without any consideration, upon which no action will lie, in conformity with the maxim ex nudo pacto non oritur actio.

Nude matter, a bare allegation of a thing done.

Nudum pactum. See NUDE CONTRACT.

Nudum pactum est ubi nulla subest causa præter conventionem; sed ubi subest causa, fit obligatio, et parit actionem—Plow. 309.—(A naked contract is where there is no consideration except the agreement; but where there is a consideration, it becomes an obligation, and gives a right of action.)

Nuisance, or Nusance [fr. nuire, Fr., to hurt], something noxious or offensive.

It is of two kinds: (1) private; (2) public.

(1) Private. It is a principle that every man should so use his own property as not to injure another; and if he act otherwise he subjects himself to an action. An action lies as well against him who continues a nuisance as against him who originally erected it.

(a) Watercourses. An action is maintainable for any diversion or obstruction of a watercourse to which the party complaining has a right.

(b) Commons. The most usual acts of nuisance to commons are by injury to the soil, by digging turf, or injuring the pasture, or by surcharging the common by overstocking it with cattle. In any of these cases an action is maintainable either by the lord or by the commoners.

(c) Lights. An action may be maintained, even by a reversioner, for obstructing the lights of an ancient messuage, or for continuing the obstruction by erecting buildings so near that the light and air cannot have access to the rooms.

The proper form of remedy for an injury sustained by a private nuisance is an action on the case. Besides the remedy by action, the party injured may, in a very clear case, take the law into his own hands and abate the nuisance, but it is never advisable to pursue this course. An action does not lie against an agent for damage done by the negligence of those he employs; for the principal, or those actually employed, are liable. The plaintiff must show himself entitled to the thing to which the nuisance was done, at the time of the nuisance; but a seisin in law, however, is sufficient to sustain such an action.

(2) Public or common, which are classed amongst crimes and misdemeanors, and are annoyances to all the Queen's subjects, whether by act of commission or omission; and when they annoy private individuals only, they form the subject of a civil action. But they are generally indictable only, and not actionable, for it would be unreasonable to multiply suits, by giving every man a separate right of action for what damnifies him in common only with the rest of his fellow subjects.

Public nuisances are:—

(a) Annoyances in the highways, bridges, and the public rivers, by rendering the same inconvenient or dangerous to pass, either positively, by actual obstructions, or negatively, by want of reparations.

(b) All those kinds of nuisances (such as offensive trades and manufactures), which, when injurious to a private person, are actionable, are, when detrimental to the public, punishable by public prosecution, and subject to a fine according to the nature of the offence.

(c) All disorderly inns, alehouses, bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, stage-plays unlicensed, booths, and stages for rope-dancers, mountebanks, and the like.

(d) All lotteries.

(e) The making and selling of fireworks in unlicensed places, or throwing them about in any street, on account of the danger that might ensue to thatched or timber buildings.

(f) Eaves-droppers.

(g) Common scolds.

As to the equitable jurisdiction in granting injunctions:—An information lies, in cases of public nuisances, at the suit of the Attorney-General, to redress the grievance by way of injunction; but the interposition of the court is principally confined to informations seeking preventive relief. In regard to private nuisances, the interference of equity, by way of injunction, goes upon the ground of restraining irreparable mischief, or of suppressing oppressive and interminable litigation, or of preventing multiplicity of suits. There must be such an injury as from its nature is not susceptible of being adequately compensated by damages at law, or such as from its continuance or permanent mischief, must occasion a constantly recurring grievance, which cannot be prevented otherwise than by an injunction. When the injury is irreparable, as where loss of health, loss of trade, destruction of the means of subsistence, or permanent ruin to property, may or will ensue, from the wrongful act or erection; in every such case courts of equity will interfere by injunction, in furtherance of justice and the violated rights of the party.—2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 180. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, as to the removal of nuisances.

Nul charter, nul vende, ne nul done vault perpetualment, si le donor n'est seisie al temps de contracts de 2 droits, sc. del droit de possession et del droit de propertie.—Co. Litt. 266.—(No grant, no sale, no gift, is valid for ever, unless the donor, at the time of the contract, is seised of two rights; namely, the right of possession, and the right of property.)

Nul disseisin, Plea of, a traverse in real actions, that there was no disseisin; it was a species of the general issue.

Nul grand seignior ou chivalier de nostre realm ne doit prender chemin (d'aler hors de realm) sans nostre conge, car issint purroit le realm remain disgarne de fort gents.—3 Inst. 179.—(No great lord or knight of our realm ought to leave the realm without our leave, for thus the realm would remain unprovided with strong men.)

Nul prendra advantage de son tort demesne.—2 Inst. 713.—(No one shall take advantage of his own wrong.)

Nul sans damage avera error ou attaint.—Jenk. Cent. 323.—(No one shall have error or attaint unless he has sustained damage.)

Nul-tiel agard (no such award), a plea traversing an award. Under this plea a defendant cannot object to the award in point of law. 1 Salk. 72; 1 Saund. 327 a.

Nul-tiel record, Issue of, a traverse that there is no such record. This is the proper form of issue whenever a question arises as to what has judicially taken place in a superior court of record; for the law presumes, that, if it took place, there will remain a record of the proceeding. But if the court be not of record, the issue should be directly upon the fact whether any such proceeding took place, and not upon the existence of any judicial memorial.—3 Barn. and Cres. 449; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 924.

Nul tort, Plea of, a traverse in a real action that no wrong was done; it was a species of the general issue.

Nulla bona (no goods), a return made by a sheriff to a fi. fa. attachment, &c. when there is no property to distrain upon.

Nulla curia quæ recordum non habet potest imponere finem, neque aliquem mandare carceri; quia ista spectant tantummodo ad curias de recordo.—8 Co. 60.—(No court which has not a record can impose a fine, or commit any person to prison; because those powers belong only to courts of record.)

Nulla impossibilia aut inhonesta sunt præsumenda; vera autem et honesta et possibilia.—Co. Litt. 78.—(Impossibilities or dishonesty are not to be presumed; but honesty and truth and possibility.)

Nulla virtus, nulla scientia, locum suum et dignitatem conservare potest sine modestiâ.—Co. Litt. 394.—(Without modesty, no virtue, no knowledge, can preserve its place and dignity.)

Nullity, want of force or efficacy; an error in litigation which is incurable, and thus differs from an irregularity which is amendable.

Nullity of Marriage, a matrimonial suit instituted for the purpose of obtaining a decree from the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, declaring that a supposed marriage is null and void. See MARRIAGE.

Nullius filius (a son of nobody, i. e. a natural child).

Nullius hominis auctoritas apud nos valere debet, ut meliora non sequeremur si quis attulerit.—Co. Litt. 383.—(The authority of no man ought to prevail with us, so that we should not adopt better things, if another bring them.)

Nullum crimen majus est inobedientiâ.—Jenk. Cent. 77.—(No crime is greater than disobedience.)

Nullum exemplum est idem omnibus.—Co. Litt. 212. — (No example is the same to all.)

Nullum iniquum est præsumendum in jure.—7 Co. 71.—(No iniquity is to be presumed in law.)

Nullum medicamentum est idem omnibus.—Co. Litt. 317.—(No medicine is the same to all.)

Nullum simile est idem nisi quatuor pedibus currit.—Co. Litt. 3.—(No like is identical, unless it run on all fours.)

Nullum tempus aut locus occurrit regi.—2 Inst. 273; Jenk. Cent. 83.—(No time or place affects the king.) But see 9 Geo. III. c. 16; 32 Geo. III. c. 58; and 7 Wm. III. c. 3, which bind the Crown.

Nullus alius quam rex possit episcopo demandare inquisitionem faciendam.—Co. Litt. 134.—(No other than the king can command the bishop to make an inquisition.)

Nullus capiatur aut imprisonetur propter appellam fœminæ de morte alterius quam viri sui.—M. C. 2 Inst. 68.—(Let no one be taken or imprisoned on the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other than her own husband.)

Nullus commodum capere potest de injuriâ suâ propriâ.—Co. Litt. 148.—(No one can obtain an advantage by his own wrong.)

Nullus debet agere de dolo, ubi alia actio subest.—7 Co. 92.—(Where another form of action is given, no one ought to sue in the action de dolo.)

Nullus dicitur accessorius post feloniam, sed ille qui novit principalem feloniam fecisse, et illum receptavit et comfortavit.—3 Inst. 138.—(No one is called an accessory after the fact but he who knew the principal to have comitted a felony, and received and comforted him.)

Nullus dicitur felo principalis nisi actor, aut qui præsens est, abettans aut auxilians ad feloniam faciendam.—(No one is called a principal felon except the party actually committing the felony, or the party present aiding and abetting in its commission.)

Nullus recedat e curiâ cancellariâ sine remedio.—4 H. 7, 4.—(Let no one depart from the Court of Chancery without a remedy.)

Nummata, the price of anything in money, as denariata is the price of a thing by computation of pence, and librata of pounds.

Nummata terræ, an acre of land.—Spelm.

Nummus [ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου] quia lege fit non naturâ.—Co. Litt. 207.—(Money, [from the Greek νόμος,] because created by law, not by nature.)

Nummus est mensura rerum commutandarum. (Money is the measure of things that are to be exchanged.)

Nunc pro tunc, a proceeding taken now for then, i. e. the proper time when it should have been taken.

Nuncio, a messenger, servant, &c.; a spiritual envoy from the pope.

Nuncupate, to declare publicly and solemnly.

Nuncupative Will, an oral or word-of-mouth testament, declared by a testator in extremis before a sufficient number of witnesses, and afterwards reduced to writing.

The 29 Car. II. c. 3, abolished nuncupative wills, except when made by mariners at sea and soldiers in actual service. See 1 Wm. Exors. 101.

Nuncupative wills are abolished by 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 9, but with a provision by s. 11, that any soldier being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, may dispose of his personal estate, as he might have done before the making of this act. See 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 20.

Nundination, traffic at fairs and markets; any buying and selling.

Nunquam indebitatus. See NEVER INDEBTED.

Nunquam concluditur in falso.—(We never conclude with a fiction.)

Nunquam decurritur ad extraordinarium sed ubi deficit ordinarium.—4 Inst. 84.—(Recourse is never had to what is extraordinary, till what is ordinary fails.)

Nunquam nimis dicitur quod nunquam satis dicitur.—Co. Litt. 375.—(What is never sufficiently said is never said too much.)

Nunquam res humanæ prosperè succedunt ubi negliguntur divinæ.—Co. Litt. 15.—(Human things never prosper where divine things are neglected.)

Nuper obiit (she lately died), an abolished writ that lay for a sister and co-heir, deforced by her coparcener of lands or tenements, whereof their father, brother, or any other common ancestor died seised of an estate in fee-simple.—F. N. B. 197.

Nuptial, pertaining to marriage; constituting marriage; used or done in marriage.

Nuptias non concubitus sed consensus facit.—Co. Litt. 33.—(Not cohabitation but consent makes the marriage.)

Nurture, Guardianship for. See GUARDIAN.

Nurus [Lat.], a daughter-in-law.

Nuzzer, a vow, an offering, a present made to a superior.—Indian.

Nycthemeron [Gk.], the whole natural day, or day and night, consisting of twenty-four hours.—Encyc. Lond.

Nymphomania. See EROTOMANIA.

O

Oath [fr. aith, Goth.; ath, Sax.; eid, Iceland; ehe, eid, Germ.], an appeal to God to witness the truth of a statement. It is called sacramentum, a holy band or tie, and also corporal oath, because a witness, when he swears, places his right hand on the holy evangelists.

The laws of all civilised states require the security of an oath for evidence given in a court of justice, and on other occasions of high importance; and the Christian religion utterly prohibits swearing, except when oaths are required by legal authority (Art. Ch. of Engl. xxxix.) All who believe in a God, the avenger of falsehood, are admitted to give evidence. All witnesses, unless they be in extremis, must take an oath before giving testimony, even the Queen (Willes' Rep. 550). The 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 34, made a Quaker's affirmation, in civil cases, admissible; and by 9 Geo. IV. c. 32, Quakers and Moravians are admitted to give evidence upon their solemn affirmation in all cases, criminal as well as civil. And their affirmation has the same force and effect as an oath in the usual form (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 49). The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 82, extends similar provisions to Separatists. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 77; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, s. 2; and 22 Vict. c. 10. The 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 62, abolishes unnecessary and extra-judicial oaths, and provides, that any justice of the peace, notary-public, or other officer authorized to administer an oath, is empowered to take voluntary declarations in the form specified in the act. And any person wilfully making such declaration false in any material particular, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Witnesses are allowed to swear in that particular form which they consider binding on their conscience.

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 20, allows any person called as a witness in civil proceedings, or required or desiring to make an affidavit or deposition, who shall refuse or be unwilling from alleged conscientious motives to be sworn, to obtain from the court (on its being satisfied of the sincerity of the objection) permission to make a solemn affirmation or declaration instead, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 66, allows a similar affirmation or declaration to be made by a witness in criminal proceedings.

As to the power of committees of both Houses of Parliament to administer oaths, see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 78.

There are many kinds of oaths in our laws, the principal of which will be found under their distinctive names.

The administering of unlawful oaths is an offence against the government, and punishable by transportation. The following statutes relate to this offence: 37 Geo. III. c. 123; 39 Geo. III. c. 79; 52 Geo. III. c. 104; 57 Geo. III. c. 19; 1 Geo. IV. c. 1; 1 Vict. c. 91; and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 12.

Oath-breaking, perjury.

Oath against bribery, one which could have been administered to a voter at an election for members of Parliament. Abolished by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102.

Oath-rite, form used at the taking of an oath.

Obedientia, an office, or the administration of it.—Canon Law.

Obedientia est legis essentia.—11 Co. 100.—(Obedience is the essence of law.)

Obedientiarius, a monastic officer.—Du Cange.

Ob infamiam non solet juxta legem terræ aliquis per legem apparentem se purgare, nisi prius convictus fuerit vel confessus in curia.—Glanv. lib. 14, c. ii.—(On account of evil report, it is not usual, according to the law of the land, for any person to purge himself, unless he have been previously convicted, or confessed in court.)

Obit [a corruption of the Latin obiit or obivit, he died], a funeral solemnity or office for the dead; the anniversary office.

The tenure of obit, or obituary, or chantry lands is taken away by 1 Edw. VI. c. 14; and 15 Car. II. c. 9.

Obiter dictum (an incidental opinion), an opinion of a judge not necessary to the judgment given of record, in contradistinction to a judicial dictum, which is necessary to the judgment.

This last is of much greater authority than the former, because delivered upon deliberation, under sanction of the judge's oath, while an extra-judicial opinion is no more than the prolatum or saying of him who gives it, a gratis dictum.

Objurgatrices, scolds, or unquiet women, punished with the cucking-stool. See CASTIGATORY.

Oblata, gifts or offerings made to the king by any of his subjects; old debts, brought as it were together from preceding years, and put on the present sheriff's charge.

Oblata terræ, half an acre, or, as some say, half a perch of land.—Spelm.

Oblationes dicuntur quæcunque a piis fidelibusque Christianis offeruntur Deo et ecclesiæ, sive res solidas sive mobiles.—2 Inst. 389.—(Those things are called oblations which are offered to God and to the church by pious and faithful Christians, whether they are movable or immovable.)

Oblations, offerings to God and the church; fees payable for christening, marrying, burying, and the like.

Obligation, an act which binds a person to some performance; also a bond containing a penalty, with a condition annexed for payment of money at a certain time; or for the performance of a covenant, &c. As to the divisions of obligations in the Civil Law, see Sand. Just. 421; Rutherf. 1, 31, 33, 34; and Notes, c. ix.

Obligee, the person in whose favor an obligation or bond is entered into; a creditor.

Obligor, he who enters into an obligation or bond, a debtor.

Obreption, surprise, the obtaining a gift of the king by a false suggestion.—Scotch term.

Obscene Publication Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83.

Observance of Anniversary Religious Services. See HOLIDAYS.

Obsignatory, ratifying and confirming.

Obstriction, obligation; bond.

Obtemperandum est consuetudini rationabili tanquam legi.—4 Co. 38.—(A reasonable custom is to be obeyed as a law.)

Obtest, to protest.

Obventions, offerings; tithes and oblations.

Occasio, a tribute which the lord imposed on his vassals or tenants for his necessity.

Occasionari, to be charged or loaded with payments or occasional penalties.

Occasiones, assaits.

Occision, the act of killing.

Occultatio thesauri inventi fraudulosa.—3 Inst. 133.—(The concealment of discovered treasure is fraudulent.)

Occupancy, taking possession of those things which before did not belong to anybody.

The right of occupancy has been confined by the laws of England within a very narrow compass, and was extended only to a single instance; namely, where a person was tenant pur autre vie, or had an estate granted to himself only (without mentioning his heirs), for the life of another man, and died without alienation, during the life of cestui que vie, or him by whose life it was holden; in this case, he that could first enter on the land might lawfully retain the possession so long as cestui que vie lived, by right of occupancy. The title of common occupancy is now, in effect, abolished, for it is enacted by 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 3, that an estate, pur autre vie, of whatever tenure, and whether it be an incorporeal or corporeal hereditament, may, in all cases, be devised by last will and testament; and by s. 6, that if no disposition by will be made of an estate pur autre vie of a freehold nature, it shall be chargeable in the hands of the heir, if it come to him by reason of special occupancy, as assets by descent (as in the case of freehold land, in fee-simple); and should there be no special occupant of any estate pur autre vie, it shall go to the executor or administrator of the party that had the estate by virtue of the grant; and in every case, where it comes to the hands of such personal representative, shall be assets in his hands, to be applied and distributed in the same manner as personal estate.

If an estate pur autre vie had been granted to a man and his heirs during the life of cestui que vie, and the grantee died without alienation, while the life for which he held continued, there could not be a title by common occupancy, but the heir would succeed as special occupant, which law is now in force.

A property in goods and chattels may be acquired by occupancy, for

(1) It has been said, that anybody authorized by the Crown may seize to his own use such goods as belong to an alien enemy.

(2) All persons may, on their own lands, or in the seas, generally exercise the right to pursue and take any fowl or insect of the air, any fish or inhabitant of the waters, and any beast or reptile of the field. The exceptions to this right are royal fish, such as whales, sturgeons, &c., animals of forest, chase, or free warren, fish belonging to a free fishery, and game.

(3) Property arising from accession. See ACCESSION, property by.

(4) Property arising from confusion. See CONFUSION, property by.

Occupant, he who is in possession of a thing.

Occupatile, that which has been left by the right owner, and is now possessed by another.

Occupation, possession; act of taking possession; also, trade or mystery.

Occupative, possessed, used, employed.

Occupavit, a writ that lay for him who was ejected from his freehold in time of war, as the writ of novel disseisin lay for one disseised in time of peace.

Occupier, a possessor.

Ochiem, the chief of a branch of a great family.

Ochlocracy [fr. ὄχλος, Gk., a multitude, and κράτος, power or command], a form of government wherein the populace has the whole power and administration in its own hand; a democracy; mob-rule.

Octo tales. See DECEM TALES.

Oderunt peccare boni, virtutis amore; oderunt peccare mali, formidine pœnæ.—(Good men hate sin through love of virtue; bad men through fear of punishment.)

Odhal, alodial, which see.

Odio et atiâ, a writ anciently called breve de bono et malo, addressed to the sheriff to inquire whether a man committed to prison upon suspicion of murder, were committed on just cause of suspicion, or only upon malice and ill will; and if, upon the inquisition, it were found that he was not guilty, then there issued another writ to the sheriff to bail him.—Reg. Orig. 133. But the practice now is to issue a habeas corpus.

Odiosa et inhonesta non sunt in lege præsumenda; et in facto quod se habet ad bonum et malum, magis de bono quam de malo præsumendum est.—Co. Litt. 78.—(Odious and dishonest things are not to be presumed in law; and in an act which partakes both of good and bad, the presumption should be more in favor of what is good than what is bad.)

Œconomicus, an executor.

Œconomus, an advocate, or defender.

Œconomy, Laws of social, those regulations in a state which relate immediately to the community at large, or to large classes of it, but which are not connected with the subject of government, whether civil or ecclesiastical. Such are the laws relating to corporations, the poor, charities, gaols, highways, trade, and navigation, public health, public conveyances, the press, houses of public reception, &c.

Off-going crop. See AWAY-GOING CROPS.

Offence, crime; act of wickedness. It is used as a genus, comprehending every crime and misdemeanor, or as a species, signifying a crime not indictable, but punishable summarily, or by the forfeiture of a penalty.

Offences are divided into three classes, viz.: (1) Treasons, which see; (2) Felonies or major offences; and (3) Misdemeanors or minor offences.

Nothing can well be more unsatisfactory than the punishments assigned to different offences, or the distinctions between felony and misdemeanor, as they exist at the present time, and it seems vain to hope that a broad, plain, and rational distinction between felony and misdemeanor can be established.—Greaves' Introduction to the Criminal Law Acts, p. 43; 2nd ed. A classification of offences into felonies and misdemeanors would therefore be of little practical value. See FELONY AND MISDEMEANOR.

In 1861, six Acts were passed for the consolidation and amendment of the statute law of England and Ireland relating to certain criminal offences. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, several previous Acts were repealed; c. 96 dealt with larceny and other similar offences; c. 97 with malicious injuries to property; c. 98 with forgery; c. 99 with offences relating to the coin; and c. 100 with offences against the person. It would be impossible to enumerate all the several species of offences, but, with the exception of treason, they are usually divided into the following classes:—

I. Offences against the person:—

Such of these as are dealt with by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, are thus classified:—

(1) Homicide (ss. 1–10).
(2) Attempts to murder (ss. 11–15).
(3) Letters threatening to murder (s. 16).
(4) Acts causing or tending to cause danger to life or bodily harm (ss. 17–35).
(5) Assaults (ss. 36–47).
(6) Rape, abduction, and defilement of women (ss. 48–55).
(7) Child-stealing (s. 56).
(8) Bigamy (s. 57).
(9) Attempts to procure abortion (ss. 58 & 59).
(10) Concealing the birth of a child (s. 60).
(11) Unnatural offences (ss. 61–63).
(12) Making gunpowder for the purpose of committing an offence (s. 64).

Besides these, the following may be mentioned:—

(1) Forcing mercantile seamen on shore in a foreign country and leaving them behind by masters of ships (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 206).
(2) False imprisonment.

II. Offences against property, which are divided into

(A) Larceny and other similar offences (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96). These offences are thus classified:—

(1) Larceny of cattle or other animals (ss. 10–26).
(2) Larceny of written instruments (ss. 27–30).
(3) Larceny of things attached to or growing on land (ss. 31–37).
(4) Larceny from mines (ss. 38 & 39).
(5) Larceny from the person, and other like offences, such as demanding money by threats, or with force, or threatening to accuse of crimes with intent to extort, inducing persons by violence or threats to execute deeds, &c. (ss. 40–49).
(6) Sacrilege, burglary, and housebreaking (ss. 50–59).
(7) Larceny in the house (ss. 60 & 61).
(8) Larceny in manufactories (s. 62).
(9) Larceny in ships, wharves, &c. (ss. 63–66).
(10) Larceny or embezzlement by clerks, servants, or persons in the public service (ss. 67–73).
(11) Larceny by tenants or lodgers (s. 74).
(12) Fraud by agents, bankers, or factors (ss. 75–87).
(13) Obtaining money, &c., by false pretences (ss. 88–90).
(14) Receiving stolen goods (ss. 91–99).
(15) Taking a reward for helping to recover stolen property (s. 106).

(16) Advertising a reward for the return of stolen property (s. 102); and see LARCENY.

(B) Malicious injuries to property (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), which are thus classified:—

(1) Injuries by fire to buildings and goods therein (ss. 1–8).

(2) Injuries by explosive substances to buildings and goods therein (ss. 9 & 10).

(3) Injuries to buildings by rioters, &c. (ss. 11 & 12).

(4) Injuries to buildings by tenants (s. 13).

(5) Injuries to manufactures, machinery, &c. (ss. 14 & 15).

(6) Injuries to corn, trees, and vegetable productions (ss. 16–24).

(7) Injuries to fences (s. 25).

(8) Injuries to mines (ss. 26–29).

(9) Injuries to sea and river banks, and to works on rivers, canals, &c. (ss. 30 & 31).

(10) Injuries to ponds (s. 32).

(11) Injuries to bridges, viaducts, and toll-bars (ss. 33 & 34).

(12) Injuries to railway carriages and telegraphs (ss. 35–38).

(13) Injuries to works of art (s. 39).

(14) Injuries to cattle and other animals (ss. 40 & 41).

(15) Injuries to ships (ss. 42–49).

(16) Sending letters threatening to burn or destroy (s. 50).

(17) All other malicious injuries to property not before provided for (ss. 51–53).

(18) Making or having gunpowder with intent to commit a felony (s. 54).

(C) Forgery (24 & 25 Vict. c. 98). See FORGERY.

Besides the above offences, the following may be mentioned:—

(1) Stealing letters or money out of letters; opening or delaying letters after delivery by mistake to the wrong person; or stealing printed votes, newspapers, &c. (1 Vict. c. 36, ss. 25, 26, 27, 31, 32).

(2) False personation of soldiers, seamen, and marines. See FALSE PERSONATION.

(3) Offences against the bankruptcy law (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 221).

(4) Negligently setting fire to houses and buildings by servants (punishable summarily) (14 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 84).

(5) Forcible entry and detainer of property. As well at common law as by 5 Ric. II. st. 1, c. 8; 15 Ric. II. c. 2; 8 Hen. VI. c. 9; 31 Eliz. c. 11; 21 Jac. I. c. 15.

III. Offences against the sovereign or civil government.

(1) Offences relating to the coin (24 & 25 Vict. c. 99).

(2) Embezzling the Queen's stores (4 Geo. IV. c. 53).

(3) Having unlawful possession of naval stores (9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 41).

(4) Serving or procuring others to serve foreign states. Fitting out or arming vessels for the service of foreign states (59 Geo. III. c. 69).

(5) Administering unlawful oaths or being engaged in unlawful societies (37 Geo. III. c. 123). As to regular lodges of freemasons, see 39 Geo. III. c. 79; 57 Geo. III. c. 19, s. 25; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 12.

(6) Discharging fire-arms or missiles, &c. at the Queen (5 & 6 Vict. c. 51, s. 2).

(7) Speaking or writing against the sovereign.

(8) Præmunire (præmoneri), i. e. introducing a foreign power, and creating imperium in imperio.

(9) Contempts against the sovereign's title in common and unadvised discourse.

(10) Contempts against the Crown's ecclesiastical supremacy (10 Geo. IV. c. 7, s. 24, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 60), or against the royal palaces.

(11) Maladministration in public trusts and employments (50 Geo. III. c. 59, s. 2).

(12) Buying or selling offices in the gift of the Crown (5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16, and 49 Geo. III. c. 126).

(13) Offences relating to naval or military stores, ships, &c. (12 Geo. III. c. 24; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 64).

(14) Desertion, or seducing to desert from the army or navy (57 Geo. III. c. 7).

(15) Refusing or neglecting to take the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, within such period as the law requires after admission to any office.

(16) Concealing treasure-trove, which belongs to the Crown.

(17) Preferring the interests of a foreign potentate to those of our own.

(18) Disobeying the sovereign's lawful commands.

(19) Disobedience to any Act of Parliament, where no particular penalty is assigned.

(24) Disobeying orders of justices, &c.

(25) Solicitations to commit offences.

VII. Offences against the public peace.

(1) The riotous assembling of twelve persons or more, and not dispersing upon proclamation. The Riot Act is 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5.

(2) Affray, i. e. the fighting of two or more in a public place to the terror of the public.

(3) Riot, i. e. a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling of their own authority, with a common intent to assist one another against any one who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful.

(4) Rout, i. e. a disturbance of the peace, by persons assembling with an intention to do a thing, which, if it be executed, will make them rioters; and actually making a motion towards the execution thereof.

(5) Unlawful assembly, i. e. a disturbance of the peace, by persons barely assembling with an intention to do a thing, which, if it were executed, would make them rioters, but neither actually executing it, nor making a motion towards the execution of it.

(6) Tumultuous petitioning (13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 5; 57 Geo. III. c. 19, s. 23).

(7) Riding or going armed with dangerous or unusual weapons (Statute of Northampton, 2 Edw. III. c. 3).

(8) Spreading false news.

(9) False and pretended prophecies, with intent to disturb the peace.

(10) Challenges to fight, either by word or letter, or knowingly bearing them.

(11) Libel (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 75).

VIII. Offences against public trade.

(1) Smuggling (8 & 9 Vict. c. 87; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 248; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 3).

(2) Cheating, and using false weights and measures (numerous statutes).

(3) Monopoly (21 Jac. I. c. 3).

(4) Conspiracy by illegal means to raise wages.

(5) Interfering with the rights of labor (6 Geo. IV. c. 129, s. 3, and 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 29; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 39 & 40.

IX. Offences against the public health, police, or economy.

(1) Breach of the laws respecting quarantine (6 Geo. IV. c. 78, s. 21), or of the Vaccination Acts (16 & 17 Vict. c. 100; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 59).

(2) Selling adulterated or unwholesome provisions. Several statutes. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84.

(3) Common nuisances, such as—

(a) Omitting to repair public highways or bridges.

(b) Obstructing, encroaching on, or annoying the public in using public highways, bridges, or shores.

(c) Carrying on unwholesome occupations near to public highways or habitations, keeping disorderly houses, such as gaming-houses and brothels, or keeping dangerous animals, &c. Exposing in a public thoroughfare a person infected with a contagious disease. As to betting-houses, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. As to the smoke nuisance in the metropolis, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 128.

(4) Indecency, such as the publication or exhibition of indecent books or pictures, or the indelicate exposure of the person in public places. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, as to the sale of obscene books, &c.

(5) Drunkenness (4 Jac. I. c. 5, and 21 Jac. I. c. 7, ss. 1 & 3).

(6) Wanton and furious driving, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100.

(7) Cruelty to animals (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, amended by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60).

(9) Refusing to serve a public office.

(10) Offences against the Game Acts (1) poaching by night, which for this purpose commences at the expiration of the first hour after sunset, and concludes at the beginning of the last hour before sunrise (9 Geo. IV. c. 69). See also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114. (2) Poaching by day, which for this purpose commences at the beginning of the last hour before sunrise, and concludes at the expiration of the last hour after sunset (1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32.)

(11) Vagrancy. Vagrants are divided into three classes:—(1) Idle and disorderly persons; (2) Rogues and vagabonds; and (3) Incorrigible rogues (5 Geo. IV. c. 83, amended by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 38).

Offerings, personal tithes, payable by custom to the parson or vicar of a parish, either occasionally, as at sacraments, marriages, christenings, churching of women, burials, &c.; or at constant times, as at Easter, Christmas, &c.—2 & 3 Edw. VI. cc. 13, 20, 21.

Offertorium, the offerings of the faithful, or the place where they are made or kept; the service at the time of sacrament.

Office, that function by virtue whereof a person has some employment in the affairs of another, whether judicial, ministerial, legislative, municipal, ecclesiastical, &c.—Cowel. It is a species of incorporeal hereditament.—2 Bl. Com. 36.

Also, a place where business is transacted.

Office, Inquest of. See INQUEST OF OFFICE.

Office-copy, a transcript of a proceeding filed in the proper office of a court under the seal of such office.

Office-found, the finding of a jury in an inquest of office of a fact which entitles the Crown to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels. See INQUEST OF OFFICE.

Office-hours. The several offices of the Court of Chancery, except the offices of the accountant-general and taxing masters, are to be opened on every day of the year except Sundays, Good Friday, Monday and Tuesday in Easter week, Christmas day, and all days appointed by proclamation to be observed as days of general fast or thanksgiving.—Consol. Ord. 1860, v., r. 1.

The offices of the accountant-general and taxing masters are to be opened on every day of the year, except the days specified in rule 1, and except during vacations (r. 2).

The office of the vacation taxing master is to be opened during the vacations on every day except the days specified in rule 1 (r. 3).

The Lord Chancellor may, from time to time, by special order, direct the offices to be closed on days other than those mentioned in Order v., and direct any of the vacations to commence and terminate on days different from the fixed days mentioned in rules 4 & 5 (r. 6).

At common law, by R. 173, H. T. 1853, 'the masters' offices in the several Courts shall be open in term time from eleven o'clock in the forenoon till five o'clock in the afternoon, and not in the evening; and in the vacation from eleven o'clock in the forenoon till three o'clock in the afternoon, except between the 10th day of August and the 24th day of October, when they are to be open from eleven in the morning till two in the afternoon, and except on Good Friday, Easter eve, Monday and Tuesday in Easter week, Christmas day, and the three following days, and such of the four following days as may not fall in the time of term, but not otherwise, namely, the Queen's birthday, the Queen's accession, Whit Monday, and Whit Tuesday, when the offices shall be closed.' By the directions of the Judges made in H. T. 1853, 'between the first day of September and the 24th day of October in each year, one of the masters of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, shall have authority to tax bills of costs, take references, and perform other necessary and immediate matters arising in or appertaining to any or either of the said Courts at the office of his own Court; and for such purpose one of the masters shall attend on certain days in each week, as may be found necessary, and of which due notice shall be affixed in the Judges' Chambers, and in the respective offices of the masters of each Court; and such master shall be considered as the vacation master.' See HOLIDAY; VACATION.

Officer, a man employed to discharge an office.

Officia judicialia non concedantur ante quam vacent.—11 Co. 4.—(Judicial offices may not be granted before they are vacant).

Officia magistratûs non debent esse venalia.—Co. Litt. 234.—(The offices of magistrate ought not to be sold).

Official, pertaining to a public charge.

In the civil law, he is the minister of, or attendant upon, a magistrate. In the canon law, he is the person to whom a bishop commits the charge of his spiritual jurisdiction; there is one in every diocese, called officialis principalis, i. e. chancellor; the rest, if there are more, are officiales foranei, i. e. commissaries. In our statutes, he is the person whom the archdeacon appoints as his substitute.—Wood's Inst. 30.

Official Assignees, certain persons from the class of merchants or accountants, appointed by the Lord Chancellor, to act in all bankruptcies; one of whom must in all cases be an assignee of the bankrupt's estate and effects, together with the assignee or assignees chosen by the creditors. All the personal estate, the profits of the realty, and the proceeds of all such estates as shall be sold, are received by such official assignee alone, and paid by him into the Bank of England to the credit of the accountant in bankruptcy. Until assignees are chosen by the creditors, he is sole assignee of the bankrupt's estate and effects. He is attached to the proceedings at the sitting to adjudicate.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 38–45; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 109.

Official Liquidators, officers appointed to conduct the proceedings, and to assist the court in winding up a Joint Stock Company.—25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 92.

Official Logbook, a logbook in a certain form, and containing certain specified entries required by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 280–282, to be kept by all British merchant ships, except those exclusively engaged in the coasting trade.

Official Managers, persons formerly appointed, under statutes now repealed, to superintend the winding-up of insolvent companies, under the control of the Court of Chancery.

Official Trustees of Charities, appointed by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137, amended by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 24.

Official Use, an active use before the Statute of Uses, which imposed some duty on the legal owner or feoffee to uses, as a conveyance to A. with directions for him to sell the estate and distribute the proceeds amongst B, C, and D. To enable A to perform this duty, he had the legal possession of the estate to be sold.

Officiality, the court or jurisdiction of which an official is head.

Officiariis non faciendis vel amovendis, a writ addressed to the magistrates of a corporation, requiring them not to make such a man an officer, or to put one out of the office he has, until inquiry is made of his manners, &c.—Reg. Orig. 126.

Officina Justitiæ, a department of the Common Law jurisdiction of Chancery, out of which original writs issue.

Officio, ex, oath of, an oath whereby a person may be obliged to make any presentment of any crime or offence, or to confess or accuse himself of any criminal matter or thing, whereby he may be liable to any censure, penalty, or punishment.—3 Bl. Com. 447.

Officious will, a testament which is consonant with a testator's natural affection and moral duties.

Officit conatus si effectus sequatur.—Jenk. Cent. 55.—(The attempt endangers if an effect follow.)

Officium nemini debet esse damnosum.—(An office ought to be injurious to no person.)

Old Bailey Sessions. These were superseded by the Central Criminal Court, which see.

Old Natura Brevium, an old book containing an account of the writs in use in the time of Edward III. It is usually cited O. N. B. or Vet. N. B. Fitzherbert made it the model of his own treatise on the same subject.—3 Reeves, 151.

Old Style. See NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Old Tenures, a treatise, so called to distinguish it from Littleton's book on the same subject, which gives an account of the various tenures by which land was holden, the nature of estates, and some other incidents to landed property in the reign of Edward III. It is a very scanty tract, but has the merit of having led the way to Littleton's famous work.—3 Reeves, 151.

Oleron, an island lying in the bay of Acquitain, at the mouth of the river Charente, formerly in the possession of the Crown of England.

The inhabitants of the island of Oleron have been able mariners for seven or eight hundred years past. They are said to have framed and drawn up the laws of the navy or the marine, which are still called the Laws of Oleron. According to the French writers, these maritime laws were digested in this island under the title of Réole des Jugemens d'Oleron, by direction of Queen Eleanor, the wife of Henry II., in her quality of Duchess of Guienne, and afterwards enlarged and improved by her son Richard I. But Selden (de Dom. Mar. c. xiv.) denies this, and maintains that they were compiled and promulgated by Richard I. as King of England. However, it is proper to add, that more modern writers, as Mons. Boucher, of Paris, and our countryman, Mr. Luders, consider the whole account as fallacious—M. Boucher calling the story of our Richard I. and Queen Eleanor une chimère des plus invraisemblables.—Monthly Review, Dec. 1811. The laws of Oleron were to a great extent the foundation of the maritime laws of most of the states of Europe.

Oligarchy, a form of government wherein the administration of affairs is lodged in the hands of a few persons.

Olympiad, a Grecian epoch; the space of four years.

Omission, neglect to do something. Some omissions render the proceedings void in which they occur, and other omissions are in some circumstances punishable as crimes and offences.

Omissio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur.—2 Buls. 131.—(The omission of those things which are silently understood is of no consequence.)

Omittance, forbearance.

Omnis actio est loquela.—Co. Litt. 292.—(Every action is a complaint.)

Omnis conclusio boni et veri judicii sequitur ex bonis et veris præmissis et dictis juratorum. Co. Litt. 226.—(Every conclusion of a good and true judgment arises from good and true premises, and sayings of juries.)

Omnis consensus tollit errorem.—2 Inst. 123. (Every assent removes error.)

Omnis innovatio plus novitate perturbat quam utilitate prodest.—2 Bulst. 338.—(Every innovation disturbs more by its novelty than benefits by its utility.)

Omnis interpretatio si fieri potest ita fienda est in instrumentis, ut omnes contrarietates amoveantur.—Jenk. Cent. 96.—(Every interpretation, if it can be done, is to be so made in instruments, that all contradictions may be removed.)

Omnis nova constitutio futuris temporibus formam imponere debet, non præteritis.—2 Inst. 95. (Every new institution should give a form to future times, not to past.)

Omnis privatio præsupponit habitum.—Co. Litt. 339.—(Every privation presupposes former enjoyment.)

Omnis querela et omnis actio injuriarum limitata est infra certa tempora.—Co. Litt. 114.—(Every plaint, and every action for injuries, are limited within certain times.)

Omnis ratihabitio retro trahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur.—Co. Litt. 207.—(Every consent given to what has been already done has a retrospective effect, and is equivalent to a previous request.)

Omnium, the aggregate of certain portions of different stocks in the public funds.—Com. term.

Omnium domos regum vigilia defendit, ideo lex vigilat pro rege.—Jenk. Cent. 61.—(The vigilance of kings guards the houses of all, and, therefore, the law guards the king.)

Omnium rerum quarum usus est, potest esse abusus, virtute solo excepta.—Dav. 79.—(There may be an abuse of everything of which there is an use, virtue alone excepted.)

Oncunne, accused.

One hundred thousand pounds clause, a precautionary stipulation inserted in a deed making a good tenant to the præcipe in a common recovery. See 1 Prest. Conv. 110.

Onerando pro ratâ portionis, a writ that lay for a joint-tenant, or tenant-in-common, who was distrained for more rent than his proportion of the land comes to.—Reg. Orig. 182.

Onerari non debet (he ought not to be burdened), a form of commencement of a pleading, substituted in some few cases for actionem non. But see H. T., 4 Wm. IV.; and the cases 1 Saund. 290, n. b.

Onerous cause, a good and legal consideration.—Scotch term.

O. Ni. It was the course of the Exchequer, as soon as the sheriff entered into and made up his account for issues, amerciaments, &c., to mark upon each head O. Ni.; which denoted oneratur, nisi habeat sufficientem exonerationem, and presently he became the king's debtor, and a debet was set upon his head; whereupon the parties paravaile became debtors to the sheriff, and were discharged against the king, &c.—4 Inst. 116.

But sheriffs now account to the commissioners for auditing the public accounts.

Onus episcopale, ancient customary payments from the clergy to their diocesan bishop, of synodals, pentecostals, &c.

Onus importandi, the charge or burden of importing merchandise.

Onus probandi, the burden of proof. See BURDEN OF PROOF.

Opening biddings. Where estates are sold, under the decree of a court of equity, the court considers itself to have a greater power over the contract than it would have were the contract made between party and party; and as the chief aim of the court is to obtain as great a price for the estate as can possibly be got, it is in the habit of opening the biddings after the estate is sold.

When a person is desirous of opening a bidding, he must, at his own expense, apply to the court, by motion for that purpose, stating the advance offered. Notice of the motion must be given to the person who is the purchaser of the lot, and to the parties in the cause. If the court approve of the sum offered, the application will be granted, and on the order being drawn up, entered, and served, a new sale must be had before the chief clerk. The order is made at the expense of the person opening the biddings, and he must bear the expense of paying in his deposit, and pay the costs of the first purchaser, and interest, at the rate of four per cent. on such part of the purchase-money as the chief clerk shall find to have lain dead. The biddings will be opened more than once, even on the application of the same person, if a sufficient advance be offered. Biddings, generally, cannot be opened after the confirmation of the certificate of the highest bidder. Where the biddings are opened, the advance is to be deposited immediately.

The biddings of an estate sold under a bankruptcy have been opened in analogy to the rules upon sales in courts of equity.—St. Leon. V. and P. 90.

Opening the case. On a trial before a jury the counsel who upholds the affirmative of the question at issue begins, because he is called upon to give evidence in support of his case, in conformity with the civil law maxim: ei incumbit probatio, qui dicit, non qui negat; cum per rerum naturam factum negantis probatio nulla sit.—Cod. 4.

Opening the pleadings, stating at a trial before a jury the substance of the pleadings. This is generally done by the junior counsel of the plaintiff.

Open law [lex manifesta, Lat.], the making or waging of law.

Open policy, one in which the interest of the insured is to be ascertained in case of loss.

Open theft [open theof, Sax.], a theft that is manifest.

Open tide, the time after corn is carried out of the fields.

Operarii, such tenants, under feudal tenures, as held some little portions of land by the duty of performing bodily labor and servile works for their lord; they were no other than the servi or bondmen.

Operatio, one day's work performed by a tenant for his lord.

Opetide, the ancient time of marriage, from Epiphany to Ash-Wednesday.

Opinio est duplex: scilicet opinio vulgaris, orta inter graves et discretos, et quæ vultum veritatis habet; et opinio tantum orta inter leves et vulgares homines, absque specie veritatis.—4 Co. 107.—(Opinion is of two kinds, namely, common opinion, which springs up among grave and discreet men, and which has the appearance of truth; and opinion only which springs up among light and foolish men, without the semblance of truth.)

Oportet quod certæ personæ, terræ, et certi status, comprehendantur in declaratione usuum. 9 Co. 9.—(It is right that given persons, lands, and estates, should be comprehended in a declaration of uses.)

Oportet quod certa res deducatur in judicium.

Jenk. Cent. 84.—(A thing certain must be brought to judgment.)

Opposer, an officer formerly belonging to the green-wax in the Exchequer. Abolished.

Opposita juxta se posita magis elucescunt.—Bacon.—(Things opposite are more conspicuous when placed together.)

Oppression, the trampling upon or bearing down a person, under pretence of law, which is unjust.

Optima est lex quæ minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis; optimus judex qui minimum sibi.—Bac. Aphor. 46.—(That system of law is best which confides as little as possible to the discretion of a judge; that judge the best who relies as little as possible on his own opinion.)

Optima statuti interpretatrix est (omnibus particulis ejusdem inspectis) ipsum statutum.—8 Co. 117.—(The best interpreter of a statute is (all the separate parts being considered) the statute itself.)

Optimacy, nobility; men of the highest rank.

Optimus interpres rerum usus.—2 Inst. 282. (Use is the best interpreter of things.)

Optimus interpretandi modus est sic leges interpretare ut leges legibus concordant.—8 Co. 169.—(The best mode of interpretation is so to interpret laws that they may accord with each other.)

Optimus legum interpres consuetudo.—4 Inst. 75.—(Custom is the best interpreter of the laws.)

Option. When a new suffragan bishop is consecrated by the archbishop of the province, by a customary prerogative, the archbishop claims the collation of the first vacant dignity or benefice in that see, at his own choice, i. e. option.—Cowel.

Optional writ, a præcipe, so called because it was in the alternative, commanding the defendant to do the thing required, or show the reason wherefore he had not done it.

Or [Fr.], gold, called sol by some heralds when it occurs in the arms of princes, and topaz or carbuncle when borne by peers. Engravers represent it by an indefinite number of small points.—Heraldic term.

Ora, a Saxon coin, valued at sixteen pence, and sometimes at twenty pence.—Domesday.

Oraculum, a decision by a Roman emperor.

Oral, delivered by the mouth; not written.

Oral pleading, pleading by word of mouth in presence of the judges. This was the original mode of pleading; it was, however, superseded by written pleadings in the reign of Edward III.

Orando pro rege et regno, an ancient writ which issued while there was no standing collect for a sitting Parliament, to pray for the peace and good government of the realm.

Orator, a petitioner; a plaintiff in a bill, or information in Chancery, was formerly so called.

Oratrix, or Oratress, a female petitioner; a female plaintiff in a bill in Chancery was formerly so called.

Orbation, privation of parents or children; poverty.—Cockeram.

Ordeal [fr. ordal, Sax., from or, great, and dele, judgment], an ancient manner of trial in criminal cases, practised amongst our Saxon ancestors, who affected to believe that God would actively interpose to establish an earthly right. There were four sorts: (1) camp-fight, duellum, or combat; (2) fire ordeal; (3) hot water ordeal; (4) cold water ordeal, which titles see. Verstegan's Decayed Intelligence, 64; Turner's Ang. Sax. vol. ii. 532; 2 Hallam's Mid. Ages, 466. They are, of course, all abolished.

Ordeffe, or Ordelfe, a liberty whereby a man claims the ore found in his own land; also, the ore lying under land.

Ordels, the right of administering oaths and adjudging trials by ordeal within a precinct or liberty.—Cowel.

Order, mandate, precept, command; also, a class or rank.

Orders are promulgated by the courts of law and equity, not only for the proper regulation of their own proceedings, but also to enforce obedience to justice, and compel that which is right to be performed.

Order of discharge, an order made under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, by a court of bankruptcy, the effect of which is to discharge a bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands provable under the bankruptcy. It is in its effect analogous to a certificate of conformity under the previous law. The provisions of the Act relating to orders of discharge are as follows:—All classification of certificates is abolished, and in every case where the discharge of a bankrupt shall be suspended, when allowed it shall simply state the period for which it was suspended and the reasons for such suspension; and if the bankrupt shall have been sentenced to imprisonment under the provisions of this Act such discharge shall also set forth the fact of such sentence and the period of such imprisonment (s. 157).

After the bankrupt has passed his last examination, unless an order of discharge shall have been previously made, the court shall appoint a sitting for the purpose of considering the question of granting such order, fourteen days notice of which shall be given in the London Gazette and such newspapers as the court shall direct. The assignees, or any creditor who has proved, may be heard against such discharge (s. 158).

In granting orders of discharge, the following rules shall be observed:—

(1) If on the hearing of any application for an order of discharge, the assignees or any creditor shall allege, and if, with or without such allegation, the court shall be of opinion that there is ground for charging the bankrupt with acts or conduct amounting to a misdemeanor under the Act (see s. 221), the court shall, if the bankrupt consent thereto, direct a clear statement in writing of the charge to be delivered to the bankrupt and shall appoint a day for trying the bankrupt on such charge; and if the bankrupt require it, shall summon a jury, and may direct the creditors' assignee or the official assignee, or any of the creditors of the bankrupt, to act as prosecutor on such trial. Provided always, that in every case of accusation against a bankrupt of acts amounting to a misdemeanor, the court may direct that the bankrupt be indicted and prosecuted in one of the ordinary courts of criminal justice, and in all other cases the order of discharge shall take effect immediately from its date, subject to appeal.

(2) If on such trial by a jury, or by the commissioner alone, the bankrupt shall be convicted of any offence by this Act made a misdemeanor, the commissioner shall, in addition to the punishment awarded for the offence, have power to direct that the order of discharge be either wholly refused or suspended during such time and upon such conditions as he shall think fit.

(3) If the bankrupt shall not be accused of acts amounting to misdemeanor, or if he shall have been accused and acquitted, but in either case there shall be made, or shall appear to the court to exist, objection to the granting of an immediate discharge, the court shall proceed to consider the conduct of the bankrupt before and after adjudication, and the manner and circumstances in and under which his debts have been contracted; and if the court shall be of opinion that the bankrupt has carried on trade by means of fictitious capital, or that he could not have had, at the time when any of his debts were contracted, any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the same, or that, if a trader, he has, with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs, wilfully omitted to keep proper books of account, or whether trader or not, that his insolvency is attributable to rash and hazardous speculation, or unjustifiable extravagance in living, or that he has put any of his creditors to unnecessary expense by frivolous or vexatious defence in any action or suit to recover any debt or money due from him, the court may either refuse an order of discharge, or may suspend the same from taking effect from such time as it may think fit, or may grant it, subject to any condition or conditions touching any salary, pay, emoluments, profits, wages, earnings, or income which may afterwards become due to the bankrupt, and touching after-acquired property of the bankrupt, or may be imprisoned for any period of time not exceeding one year from the date of such sentence.

No person shall be liable to any criminal proceeding or penalty in respect of any matter which may have occurred before the passing of this Act, to which he would not have been liable if this Act had not passed (s. 159).

With respect to all persons heretofore bankrupts, and whose certificates of conformity shall have been refused, the court may at any time after the expiration of three years from the time of such refusal hear and determine the application of any such bankrupt for an order of discharge, and, if it think fit, may grant such order either absolute or subject to any condition or conditions in the same manner as if the bankruptcy of such applicant had taken place after the commencement of this Act (s. 160).

The order of discharge shall, upon taking effect, discharge the bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands, provable under his bankruptcy, save as by the Act otherwise provided; and if thereafter he shall be arrested, or any action shall be brought against him for any such debt, claim, or demand, he shall be discharged upon entering an appearance, and may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt, and may give this Act and the special matter in evidence, and the order of discharge shall be sufficient evidence of the bankruptcy and the proceedings precedent to the order of discharge (s. 161).

If a bankrupt, after the order of discharge takes effect, be arrested or detained in custody for a debt, claim or demand provable under his bankruptcy, where judgment has been obtained before the order of discharge takes effect, the court, or a judge of a superior court of law, shall, on proof of the order of discharge, and, unless there appear good reason to the contrary, direct the officer who has the bankrupt in custody to discharge him, which shall be done accordingly, without fee (s. 162).

The order of discharge shall not release or discharge any person who was a partner with the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy, or was then jointly bound, or had made any joint contract with him (s. 163).

After the order of discharge takes effect, the bankrupt shall not be liable to pay or satisfy any debt, claim, or demand, provable under the bankruptcy, or any part thereof, or any contract, promise, or agreement, verbal or written, made after adjudication; and if he be sued on any such contract, promise, or agreement, he may plead in general that the cause of action occurred pending proceedings in bankruptcy, and may give this Act and the special matter in evidence (s. 164).

The order of discharge shall discharge the bankrupt from the effects of any process, issuing out of any court, for contempt of any court, for non-payment of money, or of costs or of expenses in any court, and from all costs which he would be liable to pay in consequence of or on purging his contempt; and a bankrupt in custody under any such process as aforesaid, shall, on obtaining an order of discharge, be entitled to be discharged from such custody forthwith (s. 165).

Any contract, covenant, or security, made or given by a bankrupt or other person, with, to, or in trust for any creditor, for securing the payment of any money as a consideration, or with intent to persuade the creditor to forbear opposing the order for discharge, or to forbear to petition for a rehearing of, or to appeal against the same, shall be void, and any money thereby secured or agreed to be paid shall not be recoverable, and the party sued on any such contract or security may plead in general that the cause of action accrued pending proceedings in bankruptcy, or may give this Act and the special matter in evidence: provided always, that no such security, if a negotiable security, shall be void, as against a bonâ fide holder thereof, for value, without notice of the consideration for which it was given (s. 166).

If any creditor of a bankrupt shall obtain any sum of money, or any goods, chattels, or security for money, from any person as an inducement for forbearing to oppose, or for consenting to the allowance of the discharge of such bankrupt, or to forbear to petition for the recal of the same, every such creditor so offending shall forfeit for every such offence the treble value or amount of such money, goods, chattels, or security so obtained (s. 167).

The order of discharge, whether suspended or not, shall not be reviewed by the court unless it see good cause to believe that the order was obtained by false evidence, or by reason of the suppression of evidence, or otherwise fraudulently, in any of which cases the court may, upon the application of a bankrupt, or of a creditor who has proved, and subject to such deposit for costs, and to such notices by advertisement or otherwise, as the court shall think fit, grant a rehearing of the matter, and rehear it accordingly, and, upon rehearing it, shall make such order as shall seem just, in like manner as it might upon an original hearing (s. 168).

If, upon such hearing, the court shall annul or suspend the order of discharge, all persons having bonâ fide become creditors of the bankrupt between the time of the order originally taking effect and the time of its being annulled or suspended, on rehearing shall, as against any property acquired by the bankrupt during the same period, and in priority to the original creditors, be admitted to prove, and have dividends under the bankruptcy (s. 169).

The order of discharge shall not be drawn up until after the expiration of the time allowed for appeal, or if an appeal be brought until after the decision of the Court of Appeal upon such appeal, and shall bear date either the day after the expiration of the time allowed for appeal, or the day of the decision of the Court of Appeal, as the case may require (s. 170).

At any time, within thirty days after any order of discharge shall have been allowed or refused, and subject to such order as to deposit of costs as General Orders shall direct, any creditor of the bankrupt, or any creditor's assignee, or the bankrupt, may, if the order of discharge has been made or refused by any commissioner or any county court judge, apply to the Court of Appeal in Chancery that such order of discharge may be granted or recalled, and delivered up to be cancelled, and such court may, on good cause shown, order such order of discharge to be granted, or to be recalled and cancelled (s. 171).

The order of discharge shall be in such form as General Orders shall direct, and shall be under the hand of the Commissioner and the seal of the Court, and notice of the granting thereof shall be advertised in the London Gazette and in two local papers (s. 172). See also Gen. Ord. Oct. 12, 1861; and Re Mew & Thorne, 31 L. J. (Bank), 87.

Order of revivor, an order as of course for the continuance of an abated suit. It superseded the bill of revivor. The opposite party may move to discharge it within twelve days after service.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52, and Cons. Ord. 1860, xxxii., r. 1.

Orders of the clergy. See Holy Orders.

Ordinance, law, rule, prescript.

Ordinance of the forest, a statute made touching matters and causes of the forest.—33 & 34 Edw. I.

Ordinance of Parliament, act of Parliament; acts and ordinances being convertible terms. There seems, however, to be this difference between them: an ordinance was but a temporary act, not introducing any new law, but founded on acts formerly made; an act was a perpetual law not to be altered but by king, lords, and commons. These distinctions are not now observed.

Ordinarius ita dicitur quia habet ordinariam jurisdictionem, in jure proprio, et non propter deputationem.—Co. Litt. 96.—(The ordinary is so called, because he has an ordinary jurisdiction in his own right, and not a deputed one.)

Ordinary, a judge who has authority to take cognizance of causes in his own right, and not by deputation.—Civ. Law.

By the common law, one who has exempt and immediate jurisdiction in causes ecclesiastical.

Also, a bishop; and an archbishop is the ordinary of the whole province, to visit and receive appeals from inferior jurisdictions. Also, a commissary or official of a bishop or other ecclesiastical judge having judicial power; an archdeacon; officer of the royal household.

Ordinary of assize and sessions, a deputy of the bishop of the diocese, anciently appointed to give malefactors their neck verses, and judge whether they read or not; also, to perform divine services for them, and assist in preparing them for death.

Ordinary conveyances, those deeds of transfer which are entered into between two or more persons, without an assurance in a superior court of justice. See DEED.

Ordinary of Newgate, one who is attendant upon condemned malefactors in that prison to prepare them for death; he records the behaviour of such persons. Formerly, it was the custom of the ordinary to publish a small pamphlet upon the execution of any remarkable criminal.

Ordinatio Forestæ, 33 Edw. I. st. 5; 34 Edw. I. st. 5.—2 Reeves, c. ix., pp. 104 & 106.

Ordinatio pro statu Hiberniæ, 17 Edw. I.—2 Reeves, c. ix., p. 99.

Ordination, the conferring holy orders; or initiating a person into the priesthood. The first thing necessary, on application for holy orders, is the possession of a title, that is, a sort of assurance from a rector to the bishop, that, provided the latter finds the person fit to be ordained, the former will take him for his curate, with a stated salary. The candidate is then examined by the bishop or his chaplain respecting both his faith and his erudition; and various certificates are necessary, particularly one signed by the clergyman of the parish in which he has resided during a given time. Subscription to the thirty-nine articles is required; and a clerk must have attained his twenty-third year before he can be ordained a deacon; and his twenty-fourth to receive priest's orders. The ceremony of ordination is performed by the bishop, by the imposition of hands on the person to be ordained. In the English church, and in most Protestant countries where the church is connected with the state, ordination is a requisite to preaching; but, in some sects, ordination is not considered necessary for that purpose, although it is considered proper, previously to the administration of the sacraments.

In the Presbyterian and congregational churches, ordination means the act of settling or establishing a licensed preacher over a congregation with pastoral charge and authority, or the act of conferring on a clergyman the powers of a settled minister of the gospel, without the charge of a particular church, but with general powers wherever he may be called upon to officiate. As to the ordination of priests and deacons for or in the colonies, see 59 Geo. III. c. 60; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 33; and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 52.

Ordinatione contra servientes, a writ that lay against a servant for leaving his master, contrary to the ordinance or statute 23 & 24 Edw. III.—Reg. Orig. 189.

Ordine placitandi servato, servatur et jus.—Co. Litt. 303.—(The order of pleading being preserved, right is preserved.)

Ordines, a general chapter or other solemn convention of the religious of a particular order.

Ordines majores et minores, the holy orders of priest, deacon, and sub-deacon, any of which qualified for presentation and admission to an ecclesiastical dignity or cure, were called ordines majores; and the inferior orders of chanters, psalmists, ostiary, reader, exorcist, and acolyte, were called ordines minores; persons ordained to the ordines minores had their prima tonsura, different from the tonsura clericalis.—Cowel.

Ordinum fugitivi, those of the religious who deserted their houses, and, throwing off the habits, renounced their particular order in contempt of their oath and other obligations.—Par. Antiq. 388.

Ordnance debentures, bills issued by the Board of Ordnance on the treasurer of that office for the payment of stores, &c.

Ordnance office, or Board of Ordnance, an office kept within the Tower of London, which superintends and disposes of all the arms, instruments, and utensils of war, both by sea and land, in all the magazines, garrisons, and forts of Great Britain. It is divided into two distinct branches, the civil and the military; the latter being subordinate to and under the authority of the former.—4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 24, s. 4, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 117.

Ordo, that rule which monks were obliged to observe.

Ordo Albus, the white friars or Augustines; the Cistercians also wore white.

Ordo Niger, the black friars. The Cluniacs likewise wore black.

Ordo nobilium pluribus gaudet privilegiis.—Jenk. Cent. 107.—(The rank of nobility enjoys many privileges.)

Ore tenus (by word of mouth).

Orfgild [fr. orf, Sax., cattle, and gild, recompense], a delivery or restitution of cattle. But Lambarde says it is a restitution made by the hundred or county for any wrong done by one who was in pledge, or rather a penalty for taking away cattle.—Lamb. Arch. 125.

Orgild, without recompense; as where no satisfaction was to be made for the death of a man killed, so that he was judged lawfully slain.—Spelm.

Orige. See ORWIGE.

Original bills in equity. See BILL IN CHANCERY.

Original charter, that which is granted first to the vassal by the superior.—Scotch phrase.

Original and derivative estates. An original is the first of several estates, bearing to each other the relation of a particular estate and a reversion. An original estate is contrasted with a derivative estate; and a derivative estate is a particular interest carved out of another estate of larger extent.—Prest. on Est. 125.

Original writ, or Original (breve originale, Lat.), the beginning or foundation of a real action at common law. It is also applied to processes for some other purposes.

It is a mandatory letter issuing out of the common law or ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, under the Great Seal, and, in the sovereign's name, addressed to the sheriff of the county where the injury is alleged to have been committed, containing a summary statement of the cause of complaint, and requiring him to command the defendant to satisfy the claim, and, on his failure to comply, then to summon him to appear in one of the superior courts of common law, there to account for his non-compliance. In some cases, however, it omits the former alternative, and requires the sheriff simply to enforce the appearance.

Original writs differ from each other in their tenor, according to the nature of the plaintiff's complaint, and are conceived in fixed and certain forms. Many of these forms are of a remote and undefined antiquity, but others are of later origin, and their history is as follows:—

The ancient writs had provided for the most obvious kinds of wrong; but, in the progress of society, cases of injury arose new in their circumstances, so as not to be reached by any of the writs then known in practice; and it seems that either the clerks of the Chancery (whose duty it was to prepare the original writ for the suitor) had no authority to devise new forms to meet the exigency of such cases, or their authority was doubtful, or they were remiss in its exercise. Therefore, by the statute of West. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 24, it was provided, 'That as often as it shall happen in the Chancery that in one case a writ is found, and in a like case, falling under the same right, and requiring like remedy, no writ is to be found, the clerks of the Chancery shall agree in making a writ or adjourn the complaint till the next Parliament, and write the cases in which they cannot agree, and refer them to the next Parliament, &c.' This statute, while it gives to the officers of the Chancery the power of framing new writs in a like case with those that formerly existed, and enjoins the exercise of that power, does not give or recognise any right to frame such instruments for cases entirely new. It seems, therefore, that for any case of that description, no writ could be lawfully issued except by authority of Parliament. But, on the other hand, new writs were copiously produced, according to the principle sanctioned by this act, i. e. in a like case, or upon the analogy of actions previously existing; and other writs, also, being added from time to time, by express authority of the legislature, large accessions were thus, on the whole, made to the ancient stock of brevia originalia.

All forms of writs once issued were entered from time to time, and preserved in the Court of Chancery in a book called 'The Register of Writs,' which in the reign of Henry VIII. was first committed to print and published. This book is still an authority, as containing in general an accurate transcript of the forms of all original writs as then framed. But a variation from the register is not conclusive against the propriety of a form, if other sufficient authority can be adduced to prove its correctness.

It was essential to the due institution of all actions in the superior courts, that they should commence by original writ, and in real actions this is still necessary; but in personal actions the use of original writs is abolished, and they are commenced by writ of summons.—2 Wm. IV. c. 39; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

These instruments, however, have had the effect of limiting and defining the right of action itself, and no cases are even now considered as within the scope of judicial remedy, but those to which some known original writ (when these instruments were in universal use) would have applied, or for which some new original writ, framed on the analogy of those already existing, might, under the provisions of the statute Westminster 2nd, have been lawfully devised. The enumeration of writs and that of actions have become, in this manner, identical.

Great uncertainty exists as to the origin of these ancient writs. Some eminent authorities declare that these writs had their origin in the Roman law, and were in use long before the time of the Conqueror, while others as confidently assert that we derived them, through Normandy, from a Francic source.—Step. on Plead. app. n. 2.

The following original writs are issued, not ex debito justitiæ but ex merâ gratia, and are sometimes denominated discretionary writs: De ventre inspiciendo; supplicavit; certiorari; prohibition; writs of error in criminal cases; ad quod damnum; scire facias, to repeal letters-patent, &c. See 1 Mad. Eq. b. 1.

Originalia, transcripts sent to the Remembrancer's office in the Exchequer out of the Chancery, distinguished from recorda, which contain the judgments and pleadings in actions tried before the Barons.

Origo rei inspici debet.—1 Co. 99.—(The origin of a thing ought to be inquired into.)

Ornest, the trial by battle, which does not seem to have been usual in England before the time of the Conqueror, though without doubt originating in the kingdoms of the north, where it was practised under the name of holmgang, from the custom of fighting duels on a small island or holm.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Orphan, a fatherless child or minor, or one deprived of both father and mother.

The Lord Chancellor is the general guardian of all orphans and minors throughout the realm.

In London, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen have in their court of orphans the custody of the orphans of deceased freemen, and also the keeping of their lands and goods; accordingly the executors and administrators of freemen leaving such orphans, are to exhibit inventories of the estate of the deceased, and give security to the chamberlain for the orphan's part or share.

Orphanotrophi, managers of houses for orphans.—Civ. Law.

Orta est quæstio, si quis ante pater matrem suam desponsaverat fuerit genitus vel natus, utrum talis filius sit legitimus hæres, cum postea matrem suam desponsaverat; et quidem, licet secundum canones et leges Romanas, talis filius sit legitimus hæres; tamen secundum jus et consuetudinem regni nullo modo tanquam hæres in hæreditate sustinetur, vel hæreditatem de jure regni petere potest.—2 Inst. 96.—(A question arose whether anyone born before his father married his mother could become a legitimate heir, if he married her afterwards; and indeed, by the canon and Roman laws, such a son would be a legitimate heir; but, by the law and custom of this kingdom, such person could by no means be considered as heir, or succeed to the inheritance.)

Ortelli, the claws of a dog's foot.—Kitch.

Ortolagium, a garden plot or hortilage.

Orwige—sine wita, without war or feud, such security being provided by the laws, for homicides under certain circumstances, against the fœhth, or deadly feud, on the part of the family of the slain.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Osculum pacis, a former custom of the church, so called because in the celebration of the mass, after the priest had spoken these words, Pax Domini vobiscum, the people kissed each other; afterwards, when this custom was abrogated, another was introduced, which was that whilst the priest spoke the afore-mentioned words, a deacon offered the people an image to kiss, which was commonly called pacem.—Matt. Paris, A.D. 1100.

Ostensible partner, one whose name is made known, and appears to the world as a partner, and is really such.

Ostensio, a tax anciently paid by merchants &c. for leave to show or expose their goods for sale in markets.—Du Cange; Anc. Inst. Eng.

Ostium Ecclesiæ, dower ad. See AD OSTIUM ECCLESIÆ.

Oswald's Law, the law by which was effected the ejection of married priests, and the introduction of monks into churches, by Oswald Bishop of Worcester, about A.D. 964.

Oswald's Law Hundred, an ancient hundred in Worcestershire, so called from Bishop Oswald, who obtained it from King Edgar, to be given to St. Mary's church in Worcester. It is exempt from the sheriff's jurisdiction, and comprehends 300 hides of land.—Camd. Brit.

Ourlop, the lierwite or fine paid to the lord by the inferior tenant, when his daughter was corrupted or debauched.

Ousted, dispossessed.

Ouster, dispossession.

A wrong or injury that may be sustained in respect of hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, carrying with it the amotion of possession; for thereby the wrongdoer gets into the actual occupation of the land or hereditament, and obliges him that has a right to seek his legal remedy, in order to gain possession and damages for the injury sustained. Such dispossession may be either of the freehold or of chattels real.

Ouster of the freehold is effected by various methods: 1st, abatement; 2nd, intrusion; 3rd, disseisin; 4th, deforcement; and 5th, discontinuance.

Ouster of chattels real consists: 1st, of amotion of possession from estates held by statute, recognizance, or elegit, which happens by a species of disseisin or turning out of the legal proprietor before his estate is determined by raising the sum for which it is given to him in pledge; and 2nd, of amotion of possession from an estate of years, which also takes place by a like kind of disseisin, ejection, or turning out of the tenant from the occupation of the land during the continuance of his term.

The following are the present modes of remedy:—

In the case of land or corporeal hereditaments, the only proper remedy is by way of specific recovery; a mere action for damages, though it will also lie, being in general obviously inadequate to the nature of the injury. The only modes of obtaining a specific recovery, which are generally applicable, are those of entry or ejectment. There are, however, besides these, the two real actions of dower, by which redress is given for one particular species of deforcement. And there are some particular cases of ouster, for which particular remedies are provided, besides those by action. In the case of forcible entry and ouster, the statutes against forcible entries and detainers give the power to justices of the peace to restore possession. In cases between landlord and tenant, where half a year's rent is in arrear, and the tenant has deserted the premises, and left the same uncultivated or unoccupied, the 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 16, and 59 Geo. III. c. 52, authorize a proceeding before two justices of the peace to obtain restitution. By 59 Geo. III. c. 12, ss. 17, 24, 25, paupers intruding into parish property may be dispossessed by warrant of two justices of the peace; and by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74, a method of proceeding before two justices in petty sessions, to obtain possession, is also provided for landlords in certain cases of holding over by tenants when the rent does not exceed 20*l.* nor the term seven years, and no fine is reserved on forfeiture, &c.; and as to county-courts, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 50.

As to the remedy upon ouster of incorporeal hereditaments, such as commons, advowsons, and the like, these also may be claimed in the action of dower, supposing the claimant to be a dowress; and tithes may be recovered in ejectment; and a next presentation by an action of quare impedit.—See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26, abolishing dower and quare impedit as real actions. The general remedy is an action of trespass on the case, in which damages are recovered for the invasion of the right.—3 Step. Com. 500, et seq.

Ousterlemain [amovere manum, Lat.], the delivery of the lands out of the guardian's hands, upon the male heir attaining twenty-one, or the female heiress sixteen years of age. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Also, a livery of land out of the sovereign's hands, on a judgment given for him that sued out a monstrans de droit.

Ouster le mer, beyond the sea; a cause of excuse, if a person, being summoned, did not appear in court.

Out of court, a plaintiff in an action at common law must declare within one year after the service of a writ of summons, otherwise he is out of court, unless the court shall have, by special order, enlarged the time for declaring.

Outfangthef, a liberty or privilege, in the ancient common law, whereby a lord was enabled to call any man dwelling in his manor, and taken for felony in another place out of his fee, to judgment in his own court.

Outhest, or Outhom, a calling men out to the army by sound of horn.

Outhouses, buildings belonging to and adjoining dwelling houses.

Outland, land lying beyond the demesnes, and granted out to tenants at the will of the lord, like copyholds. Subdivided into theodans, or lesser thanes, disposed amongst those who attended the lord, and those parts allotted to their husbandmen or churls.—Spelm.

Outlaw [fr. utlaghe, Sax.; utlagatus, Lat.], a person put out of the law, or deprived of its benefits.

Outlawry [fr. utlagaria, Lat.], the being put out of the law for contempt in wilfully avoiding the execution of the process of the Queen's court.

I. Civil actions.

It is a proceeding adopted against a defendant who has absconded and cannot be found. If the defendant be a woman, the proceeding is called a waiver; for as women were not sworn to the law by taking the oath of allegiance in the leet (as men anciently were when of the age of twelve years and upwards), they could not properly be outlawed, but were said to be waived, i. e. derelicta, left out, or not regarded. And for the same reason an infant cannot be outlawed under the age of twelve years. Peers and members of parliament are exempt from outlawry, except in criminal cases. Where there are several defendants, there may be outlawry against one or more of them.

(a) Before judgment.

Since the C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 24, proceedings to outlawry cannot be taken for the purpose of compelling an appearance by a defendant where the action is commenced by writ of summons.

(β) After judgment.

If non est inventus be returned to a ca. sa. an exigi facias is sued out.

The exigi facias is a judicial writ commanding the sheriff to demand the defendant from county-court to county-court, until he be outlawed.

It seems it ought to be tested on the quarto die post of the return of the ca. sa. and in term time. It must be returnable on a day certain, on some day being either the third inclusive before the commencement of term, or between that day and the third day exclusive before the last day of the term. It cannot be made returnable in a term after the term following that in which the writ is tested; and there must be fifteen days at least between the teste and return, and, if possible, the return days should be so regulated as that five hustings in London, or county courts elsewhere, may be held between the teste and return of the writ, in order to save the expense of an allocatur exigent.

A writ of proclamation is not, it seems, necessary.

The exigi facias is executed by exacting the defendant or calling upon him to appear at five successive county courts, or in London, at five successive hustings, unless, before that time, he appear, &c.

If there are not five county courts or hustings between the teste and return of the exigi facias, there must be issued an allocatur exigent so as to make up the number.

If the defendant appear before the return of the exigent, a supersedeas is issued to stay any further proceedings in the sheriff's office. If the defendant do not appear, he is outlawed at the return of these writs, and a capias utlagatum issues, which is either general, against the person only, or special, against the person, lands, and goods.

If the defendant has not as yet appeared, &c. and there is no probability of his doing so, satisfaction for the debt and costs may be obtained out of the property seized under the capias utlagatum. A transcript of the proceedings are obtained from the master, and taken to the Exchequer, where a rule is granted for persons to come in and claim the property seized, upon the expiration of which rule a venditioni exponas issues to the sheriff to sell the goods, a levari facias to levy the issues and profits of the freehold land, and a scire facias to recover debts due to the defendant, if necessary. If, to a special capias utlagatum, the sheriff return an inquisition, finding that the defendant had benefices, but no lay fee, the court will award a writ of sequestration on reading the transcript of the outlawry and inquisition.

When the goods have been sold, &c. if the amount do not exceed the sum of fifty pounds, a motion is made in the Court of Exchequer for an order to pay it over to the person at whose instance the outlawry has taken place, and a subpœna will issue to the sheriff requiring him to pay over the proceeds, deducting the necessary expenses. If the money exceed fifty pounds, the Lords of the Treasury must be petitioned, and the Attorney-General's consent must be obtained. If the debt be considerable, and the chattel property not sufficient to satisfy it, a lease or grant of the Queen's right to levy the issues of the defendant's freehold lands, by petition to the Lords of the Treasury, may be obtained. A warrant will thereupon be granted for the lease, and the lease is made out at the proper office of the Court of Exchequer.

A defendant cannot be outlawed on a judgment, after error brought.

The defendant may be relieved from the outlawry either by obtaining the Queen's pardon, or by reversing it, either by an application to the court, or a judge at chambers, or by proceedings in error, coram nobis or vobis.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1295.

II. Criminal prosecutions.

If a defendant cannot be arrested on a capias bench warrant, or warrant of a magistrate, he is liable, on his non-appearance to an indictment, to be outlawed. In misdemeanors, the first process is a venire facias, which is for the party's appearance, upon the return of which, if it appear that he have lands in the county, a distress infinite issues from time to time till he appears; if he have no lands, then a capias issues, and then an alias and pluries. In treason and felony, a capias is the first process. The exigent is then issued, and a writ of proclamation, and on his not appearing at the fifth exaction or inquisition, he is outlawed, and incapable of availing himself of the benefit of the law.

The forfeiture upon indictments for misdemeanors is the same as in civil actions; but in treason or felony, it amounts to a conviction and attainder of the offence, and he may be arrested by anyone in order to be brought to execution.

The outlawry may be reversed by plea or by proceedings in error.—4 Step. Com. 467, 550.

The maxim applicable to outlaws is, 'Let them be answerable to all, and none to them.' Accordingly, any person outlawed is civiliter mortuus. He can hold no property given or devised to him; and all the property which he held before is forfeited. He can neither sue on his contracts, nor has he any legal rights which can be enforced; while, at the same time, he is personally liable upon all causes of action. He can, however, bring actions in autre droit, as executor, administrator, &c. because in such actions, he only represents persons capable of contracting, and under the protection of the law.—Exp. Franks, 7 Bing. 767.

Outparters, stealers of cattle.

Outputers, such as set watches for the robbing any manor-house.—Cowel.

Outriders, bailiffs-errant employed by sheriffs or their deputies, to ride to the extremities of their counties or hundreds to summon men to the county or hundred court.

Outstanding term, a term in gross at law, which, in equity, may be made attendant upon the inheritance, either by express declaration or by implication. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112.

Outsucken multures, quantities of corn paid by persons voluntarily grinding corn at any mill to which they are not thirled or bound by tenure.

Ovelty, a kind of equality of service in subordinate tenures.

Overcyted, or Overcyhsed, proved guilty or convicted.

Overdue, past the time of payment.

When bills of exchange are indorsed after they are overdue, the indorsee is liable to great suspicion; and it behoves him to use every precaution, and make every possible inquiry, for he takes the bill with all its faults on the credit of the indorser, and must stand in the same situation as the holder when the bill first became payable. This rule, however, does not apply to cheques.—9 B. and C. 388.

By 17 Geo. III. c. 7, an overdue bill under 5*l.* cannot be indorsed.

Overhernissa, contumacy or contempt of court.

Overrule, to annul or make void; set aside, reverse.

Oversamessa, a forfeiture for contempt or neglect in not pursuing a malefactor.

Overseers of the poor, public officers created by the 43 Eliz. c. 2, to provide for the poor of every parish. There are two or more, according to the extent of the parish. Churchwardens are, by this statute, overseers of the poor, and they join with the overseers in making poor rates; but the churchwardens having distinct business of their own, usually leave the care of the poor to the overseers, though anciently they were the sole overseers of the poor.—Wood's Inst. 98.

Oversewenesse. See OVERHERNISSA.

Oversman, an umpire.—Scotch term.

Overt, open.

Overt act, an open act by law must be manifestly proved.—3 Inst. 12.

Overt word, an open, plain word, not to be misunderstood.

Overture, an opening; a proposal.

Ovrages, or Ouvrages, days' works.

Ovres, acts, deeds, or works.

Owel, equal.

Owelty, equality.

Owlers, persons who carried wool, &c. to the sea-side, by night, in order that it might be shipped off contrary to law.

Owling, the offence of transporting wool or sheep out of the kingdom. Abolished by 5 Geo. IV. c. 107.

Oxfild, a restitution anciently made by a hundred or county for any wrong done by one that was within the same.—Lamb. Arch. 125.

Oxford. See UNIVERSITY.

Oxgang, or Oxgate, fifteen acres of land. Corrupted, in the north, to osken.—Kelm. Domes. Illustr.

Oydor [fr. oyr, Sp., to hear], a judge.

Oyer (to hear), the ancient word for assizes; oyer of a deed is abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 55.

Oyer de record, a petition made in court that the judges, for better proof's sake, will hear or look upon any record.

Oyer and terminer, a commission directed to the judges and other gentlemen of the county to which it is issued, by virtue whereof they have power to hear and determine treasons, and all manner of felonies and trespasses. Terminer is sometimes written determiner.

When any sudden insurrection takes place, or any public outrage is committed, which requires speedy reformation, or there is a press of business, then a special commission is immediately granted.

Oyer and terminer, Courts of, and general gaol delivery, tribunals held before the Queen's commissioners, among whom are usually two judges of the superior courts of law at Westminster, twice in every year in every county of the kingdom, the metropolis and its vicinity excepted. See ASSIZE.

Oyez (hear ye), the introduction to any proclamation or advertisement given by the public criers both in England and Scotland. It is most unmeaningly pronounced, oh! yes!

Oysters, stealing, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 26, s. 26.

P.

Paage [old Fr., fr. paagium, low Lat.], a toll for passage through another's land. Obsolete.

Pacare, to pay.

Pacatio, payment.—Mat. Par. A.D. 1248.

Pace, a measure of length containing two feet and a half. The geometrical pace is five feet long; the common pace is the length of a step, the geometrical is the length of two steps, or the whole space passed over by the same foot from one step to another.

Paceatur (let him be freed or discharged).

Paci sunt maximè contraria, vis et injuria.—Co. Litt. 161.—(Violence and injury are especially contrary to peace.)

Pack, to delude, deceive, or counterfeit, e.g. to pack a jury. As to false packing of hay and straw, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 114, which inflicts a penalty of 10*l.*

Package, scavage, baillage, and portage, duties charged in the port of London on the goods imported and exported by aliens, or by denizens, being the sons of aliens.

The Act 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 66, authorized the Lords of the Treasury to purchase these duties from the city. This was done at an expense of about 140,000*l.* and the duties were abolished.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Pack of wool, a horse-load, which consists of 17 stone and 2 pounds, or 240 pounds weight.—Fleta, l. 2, c. xii.

Pact [fr. pacte, Fr.; pactum, Lat.], a contract, bargain, covenant.

Pacta privata juri publico derogare non possunt.—7 Co. 23.—(Private compacts cannot derogate from public right.)

Paction [fr. pactio, Lat.], a bargain, or covenant.

Pactional, by way of bargain or covenant.

Pactitious, settled by covenant.

Pacto aliquod licitum est, quod sine pacto non admittitur.—Co. Litt. 166.—(By compact, something is permitted which, without compact, is not admitted.)

Pactum de non petendo, an agreement made between a creditor and his debtor that the former will not demand from the latter the debt due. By this agreement the debtor is freed from his obligation.—Civ. Law. This is not unlike the covenant not to sue of our Common Law.

Pactum de quotâ litis, an agreement by which a creditor promised to pay a portion of a debt difficult to recover, to a person who undertook to recover it.—Civ. Law.

Pactum constitutæ pecuniæ, an agreement by which a person appointed to his creditor a certain day, or a certain time, at which he promised to pay; or an agreement by which a person promises to pay a creditor.—Civ. Law.

Padder, a robber, a foot highwayman.

Paddock [fr. pannе, Sax., a park], a small inclosure for deer or other animals.

Pagarchus [fr. pagus, Lat., village, and ἀρχή, Gk., command], a petty magistrate of a pagus or little district in the country.

Pagoda, a temple; also a gold coin in the south of India valued at 8*s.*—Indian.

Pagus, a county.

Pagus, derived from the Doric παγά, a fount; because villages were originally formed round springs of water. 'Religion did first take place in cities, and in that respect was a cause why the name of Pagans, which properly signifieth a country people, came to be used in common speech for the same that infidels and unbelievers were.'—Hooker, E. P. v. 80.

Paine, or Peine forte et dure [pœna fortis et dura, Lat.], a special punishment formerly inflicted on those who, being arraigned of felony, refused to put themselves on the ordinary trial, but stubbornly stood mute. It was vulgarly called 'pressing to death.'—2 Reeves, 134.

Pains and Penalties, Acts of Parliament to attaint particular persons of treason or felony, or to inflict pains and penalties beyond or contrary to the common law, to serve a special purpose. They are in fact new laws, made pro re natâ.

Pairing-off, a practice which is said to have originated in the time of Cromwell, whereby two members of the House of Commons of opposite opinions agree to absent themselves from voting during a given period. See PROXY.

Pais, or Pays, the people out of whom a jury is taken.

Pais, Conveyances in, ordinary conveyances between two or more persons in the country, i. e. upon the land to be transferred.

Pais, Trial by, a trial by the country, i.e. a jury.

Paisso, pasnage, a liberty for hogs to run in forests or woods to feed upon mast.—Mon. Angl. i. 682.

Palabras [Sp., on my word], a kind of petty oath.

Palace Court, a court formerly held in the borough of Southwark having jurisdiction over personal actions arising within twelve miles of the palace of Whitehall, abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, s. 13.—3 Bl. Com. 76. See MARSHALSEA.

Palagium, a duty to lords of manors for exporting and importing vessels of wine at any of their ports.

Palatine, possessing royal privileges. See COUNTY PALATINE.

Palfridus, a palfrey, a horse to travel on.

Paling-man, a merchant-denizen, or one born within the English pale.

Pallio cooperire, an ancient custom, where children were born out of wedlock, and their parents afterwards intermarried; the children, together with the father and mother, stood under a cloth extended while the marriage was solemnized. It was in the nature of adoption. By such custom the children were taken to be legitimate by the civil, but not by the common law.

Pamphlet [fr. par un filet, Fr., by a thread], a small book, usually printed in the octavo form, and stitched.

It is enacted by 10 Anne, c. 19, s. 113, that no person shall sell, or expose to sale, any pamphlet, without the name and place of abode of some known person, by or for whom it was printed or published, written or printed thereon, under a penalty of 20*l.* and costs. See 60 Geo. III. and 1 Geo. IV. c. 9; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 73, and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 76.

Pandectæ or Digesta. In the last month of the year A. D. 530, Justinian, by a constitution addressed to Tribonian, empowered him to name a commission for the purpose of forming a code out of the writings of those jurists who had enjoyed the Jus Respondendi, or, as it is expressed by the emperor, 'antiquorum prudentium quibus auctoritatem conscribendarum interpretandarumque legum sacratissimi principes præbuerunt.' The compilation, however, comprises extracts from some writers of the republican period.—Const. Deo Auctore.

Ten years were allowed for the completion of the work. The instructions of the emperor were, to select what was useful, to omit what was antiquated or superfluous, to avoid unnecessary repetitions, to get rid of contradictions, and to make such other changes as should produce out of the mass of ancient juristical writings a useful and complete body of law (jus antiquum).

The work was to be named Digesta, a Latin term, indicating an arrangement of materials; or Pandectæ, a Greek word, expressive of the comprehensiveness of the work. It was also declared that no commentaries should be written on this compilation, but permission was given to make paratitla, or references to parallel passages, with a short statement of their contents (Const. Deo Auctore, s. 12). It was also declared, that abbreviations (sigla) should not be used in forming the text of the Digest. The work was completed in three years (17 Cal. Jan. A.D. 533), as appears by a constitution both in Greek and Latin, which confirmed the work, and gave to it legal authority.

The number of writers from whose works extracts were made is thirty-nine.

Justinian's plan embraced two principal works, one of which was to be a selection from the jurists, and the other from the Constitutiones.

The first, the Pandects, was very appropriately intended to contain the foundation of the law; it was the first work since the date of the Twelve Tables, which in itself, and without supposing the existence of any other, might serve as a central point of the whole body of the law. It may be properly called a code, and the first complete code since the time of the Twelve Tables, though a large part of its contents is not law, but is dogmatic, or is taken up with the investigation of particular cases. Instead of the insufficient rules of Valentinian III. the excerpts in the Pandects are taken immediately from the writings of the jurists in great numbers, and arranged according to their matter.

The Code also has a more comprehensive plan than the earlier codes, since it comprises both rescripts and edicts. These two works, the Pandects and the Code, ought properly to be considered as the completion of Justinian's design. The Institutiones cannot be viewed as a third work; independent of both, it serves as an introduction to them, or as a manual.

Lastly, the Novellæ are single and subsequent additions or alterations, and it is merely an accidental circumstance that a third edition of the Code was not made at the end of Justinian's reign, which would have comprised the Novellæ that had a permanent application.—Savigny, as quoted in Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

The Pandects are divided into fifty Books, each Book containing several Titles, divided into Laws, and the Laws generally into several Parts or Paragraphs.

The first is called Principium, being the beginning of the law; the rest are called Paragraphs.

The First Book begins with laying down the general principles of justice, and sets forth its different kinds; it then proceeds to treat of divisions of Persons and Things; Senators are mentioned next; and lastly, Magistrates, their delegates and assessors.

In the Second we have an account of the power of Magistrates, and their several Jurisdictions, continents; how a defendant is to be brought to try an issue, and of Bail for Action. The subject of the latter part of this Book is Covenants and Transactiones, imparlances.

The Third Book explains, in the first place, who those persons are that are allowed to sue at law; and as infamous persons are not admitted so to do, the second title treats of them. The following, of those whose assistance is required in legal proceedings, as attorneys, &c.; and lastly, the Third Book treats of the Oath of Calumny.

The Fourth Book explains the different causes for restoring a question to its normal state, and of an act done under coercion or fear of death. The next subject it treats of is Compromises and Arbitrations; after which it speaks of Innkeepers and others in whose custody we leave anything.

The Fifth states, after having treated of Judgments, who ought to make an Assignment of the demand of Inheritance, and of the Impeachment of a Will for Informality.

The Sixth treats of Real Actions by which private persons recover their own; which actions may be civil and direct, or prætorian or equitable.

The Seventh respects Burdens termed Personal (servitutes), Usufructs (leases), hirings.

The Eighth treats of Real Burdens, prædial and urban.

The Ninth treats of Personal assimilated to the Real Actions, as actions for damage or crime committed by a slave, the actions of the Lex Aquilia; and as connected with this last, at the end of the Book, of the Action for Damage done by throwing things into a Highway, and of Noxal Actions.

The Tenth Book treats of Mixed Actions, such as the action of bounding and butting, finium regundorum; the action for partition of an inheritance or other particular thing; of the action called Ad Exhibendum, to compel the party 'to produce,' which is preparatory to the Real Action above mentioned.

The Eleventh Book treats of Interrogatories upon Facts; of such matters as are to be heard before the same Judge; of Seduced or Runaway Slaves; of Gambling, False Measurements of Land; and lastly, of Burials and Funeral Expenses.

The Twelfth Book explains certain Personal Actions, such as the action for a loan, and some others which go by the name of Condictio, which properly signifies the fixing a day for the appointment of a Judge.

The Thirteenth Book speaks also of some of these actions, and then of things Lent and of the Actions Relating to Pledges.

The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Books treat of Actions arising from Contracts made by Three Persons, but whereby such are bound; and lastly, of Scim Macedonianum.

The Sixteenth contains Scim Velleianum, Compensations, and the Actions concerning Deposits.

The Seventeenth treats of Commissions (Mandatum), and Partnership.

The Eighteenth contains the Law on the Usual Covenants of Contracts of Sale, the mode of their decision, and on what ground these contracts may be receded from, and upon whom the gain or the loss of the thing sold is to fall.

The Nineteenth, in the first part, treats of Actions of Bargain and Sale, of Actions of Hiring, of the Action for Computation of Value, called Æstimationis, of Permutation, of the Action on the Terms of the Contract, called Præscriptis Verbis, arising from innominate contracts.

The Twentieth Book treats of Pledges, of the Precedence of Creditors, and the subrogation of the Rights of Prior Lien; of the Distractio Pignoris, or sale of things pawned; and the Redemption of the Pledge, or extinguishment of lien.

The Twenty-first explains the Ædile's Edict concerning the Sale of Slaves and Animals; Dispossession, called Evictio; Warranty, and the Exception of the thing Bought and Delivered.

The first part of the Twenty-second treats of Usury, Fruits, Dependencies, Accessaries to Things, and Default; the second, of Proofs and Presumptions, and of Ignorance of the Law or Fact.

The Twenty-third is upon Espousals, Marriage, Dowry, Agreements made relatively to that subject, and of Lands given in Dowry.

The Twenty-fourth lays down the Law of Gifts between Husband and Wife; of Divorce, and Recovery of the Marriage Portion.

The Twenty-fifth treats of Expenses laid out upon Dowries; of Actions for the Recovery of things carried away by a Wife or other Person against whom no Action of Theft lies; of the Obligation to acknowledge Children, and provide for their maintenance; and lastly, of Concubines.

The Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Books treat wholly of Guardianships, Tutela, and Curatela, and of the Actions which result from them; of Exemption from Wardship, and the Alienation of Goods belonging to Wards, Pupillæ or Minores.

The Twenty-eighth Book contains the Law of Wills; the Institution and Disinheritance of Children; of the Institution of an Heir; of Substitutions; of Conditions required in Institutions, and of the Right of Deliberating before Accepting an Inheritance.

The Twenty-ninth Book treats of Military Wills; of the Acquisition of an Inheritance, and of the Opening of Wills, &c., and of Codicils.

The Thirtieth, Thirty-first, and Thirty-second treat of Legacies and Bequests in Trust in general.

The Thirty-third, and likewise the first Titles of the Thirty-fourth, treat of Particular Legacies; the Catonian Regulations; of Legacies reputed never to have been left, and those of which unworthy persons are deprived.

The Thirty-fifth speaks of conditional Legacies, and of the Law Falcidia, reserving a certain portion of the inheritance for the heir.

The Thirty-sixth explains the Scim Tribellianum, regulating Bequests in Trust; the Time when Legacies and Fiduciary Bequests become due, and the security the Heir is obliged to give for their Liquidation, if left conditionally; and of their Foreclosure in default of such security.

The Thirty-seventh Book speaks first of the succession to a Deceased Person's estate, called universal, granted by the Prætor, under the name of Bonorum Possessio; after which it treats of Hotch-Pot (Collationes), of Goods and Dowry, and the Right of Patronage.

The Thirty-eighth Book lays down the Duties of Freed Men to their Patrons; the Law of their Succession; of Intestate Succession under the authority of the Prætor; and lastly, of Domestic and Legal Heirs, and of the Scim Tertullianum and Orphilianum.

The Thirty-ninth Book first shows the means which the Law or the Prætor furnishes to prevent anyone from receiving Damage, where a Personal, Real, or Mixed Action will not lie; these means are, Caveat against a New Work —Cautio Damni Infecti, and the Action of Eavesdrop—De Aquâ Pluviâ Arcendâ; it ends with the Explanation of Donations which come into operation during the life of the donor, and of such as are made in contemplation of Death.

The Fortieth Book relates to Manumissions, distinguishing between Ingenui, Freed Men, and Slaves, and explaining their rights.

The Forty-first treats of the different modes by which Property in Things is acquired by the Law of Nations; of Possession; of Prescriptions; and lastly, of lawful causes authorising Possession, and consequently making it capable of Prescription.

The Forty-second treats, in the first place, of Things Adjudged; of Definitive and Interlocutory Sentences; of Confessions in Judgment; of the Assignment of Goods; of the causes of Seizure and its Effects; and of the privileges of Creditors; it then passes to Curators appointed for the Administration of Goods, and for the revocation of Acts done to defraud Creditors.

The Forty-third treats of Injunctions and Possessory Actions.

The Forty-fourth first treats of Exceptions and Defences, and then of Obligations and Actions.

The Forty-fifth of Stipulations.

The Forty-sixth of Sureties, Novations, and Delegations of Payment and Discharges of Acceptilations, Stipulations, and some Bails for Action.

The Forty-seventh treats of Offences termed Private.

The Forty-eighth begins with public Judgments; then follow Accusations, Inscriptions, Prisons, and all Public Offences; thence it passes to the Sctm Turpillianum and abolition of crimes; and lastly, it treats of Torture, Punishments, Confiscation, Exile, Transportation, and of the bodies of Malefactors executed.

The Forty-ninth treats of Appeals, and matters relating thereunto; it then gives an account of the Rights of Exchequer; of matters relating to Captives, Military Discipline, Soldiers, and Veterans.

The Fiftieth Book treats of the Rights of Cities and Citizens; of Magistrates and their Children; of Public Offices, and the causes which exempt persons from them; and also of the Right of Immunity; after, of Deputies and Ambassadors; of the administration of Things belonging to Cities; of Public Works, Fairs, Promises (termed Pollicitationes), Judgments given in extraordinary cases by Magistrates; of Brokers and Factors; of Taxes laid upon the Provinces; and lastly, it ends with the Interpretation and signification of Law Terms, and of the Rules of the law. Besides this distribution of the Digest into Fifty Books, it was divided into seven parts, but the reason that induced the Emperor to make this division is not known. Some supposed it was done in order to separate the different matters, and include all that related to one subject in one Part, consisting of several Books. Others attribute it to the superstitious respect of the ancients for the number seven, as the most perfect.

The First Part contained the first four Books.

The Second Part, intitled De Judiciis, contained all, beginning with the Fifth to the end of the Eleventh.

The Third Part, De Rebus, included all to the end of the Nineteenth.

The Fourth Part included the Accessories to Contracts and Actions arising out of Marriage and Guardianship, ending with the Twenty-seventh Book.

The Fifth, intituled De Testamentis, began with the Twenty-seventh and ended with the Thirty-sixth.

The Sixth is intituled De Bonorum Possessionibus, at the commencement of the Thirty-seventh Book, and ends with the Forty-fourth.

The Seventh contains the remaining six Books.

The division of the Pandects into the Digestum Vetus, Digestum Novum, and the Infortiatum, belongs to the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

That part of the Pandects from the First Book to Title II. of the Twenty-fourth (De Divortiis) formed the DIGESTUM VETUS; so called, according to Odofredus, because first compiled—dicitur Digestum Vetus, quia prius fuit in compilatione.

The Infortiatum begins with Title III. of the Twenty-fourth Book (Soluto Matrimonio), and ends with the Thirty-eighth Book; an unnatural division, as it begins not only in the middle of the book, but in the middle of the doctrine of Succession.

The word INFORTIATUM is, according to Odofred, so named from its author Infortiatus; or, according to Inerius, Aurum vel argentum, nam ab initio fuerunt habiti alii libri legales in civitate istâ, postea supervenit Infortiatum unde scientia nostra aucta vel augmentata est, sicut dicitur pannus Infortiatus in quo magis est de lanâ quam sit de aliis communiter. And again, Ut dicitur de veste de lanâ INFORTIATA; i. e. de veste de lanâ augmentata. Inerius, too, says, Jus nostrum augmentatum Infortiatum est, sic et vestis serica dicitur Infortiata, &c.; and Odofred explains the word by augmentatum, an augmentation to the parts then already known —the Old and New Digests; that is, found afterwards and inserted in its proper place between those parts already known and in use. But a still more extraordinary subdivision was that of the latter portion of the Infortiatum, termed the TRES PARTES; this begins not only in the middle of a Book, of a Title, and of a Lex, but also in the middle of a sentence of that law. The initiatory words doubtless gave it the name by which it went, Illa pars, quæ dicitur Tres Partes non est liber, quia est super Infortiato, et non est ibi lex vel sectio, sed totum sub lege illâ quærebatur, says Odofredus. That glossator, moreover, informs us, that they had not the Infortiate which was at Rome, and was afterwards brought to Pentapolis in an imperfect state; that is, minus the portion beginning Tres Partes.

Savigny, however, clears up the question more satisfactorily. He says that the Digestum Vetus—that portion called the Tres Partes—and the Digestum Novum were discovered; and lastly the remaining part, namely, that beginning with Title III. of the Twenty-fourth Book, and ending at 35, 2, 82, where the Tres Partes begin. On this discovery being made, this missing portion was inserted into its proper place, between the end of Title II. of the Twenty-fourth Book of the Tres Partes, until then forming a continuous part of the Digestum Vetus.

As for the Digestum Novum, Savigny thinks it only meant pars secunda, and Vetus, pars prior, and is not to be taken in the sense of not new or newly found; both having been found simultaneously.

In order to prevent the circulation of incorrect editions, three Ultramontane and three Citramontane scholars were chosen every year in the University of Bologna, and termed Peciarii; they were excused from all other munera publica, and held their sessions once a week for the purpose of correcting imperfect copies in possession of circulating libraries; a fine of five soldi was imposed on all possessors of defective books, together with the expenses of correction, for which purpose every doctor or scholar was obliged to lend his own perfect copy, under pain of a fine of five lire; hence the term exempla correcta et bene emendata. Books thus corrected were advertised by the bedel.—1 Colqu. R. C. L. 67–73.

Panduxator, a brewer.—Old Records.

Panduxatrix, a woman that brews and sells ale.

Panel [fr. panellum, Lat.; panneau, Fr., a square or panel], a little part, or rather a schedule or page, containing the names of such jurors as the sheriff returns to pass upon a trial; and empanelling a jury is nothing but the entering them into the sheriff's roll or book.

In Scotch law, the prisoner at the bar or person who takes his trial before the Court of Justiciary for some crime.

Pannage [fr. pannagium, low Lat.; panage, Fr.], food that swine feed on in the woods, as mast of beech, acorns, &c., which some have called pawnes. Also, the money taken by the agistors for the food of hogs, with the mast of the royal forests.—Cowel.

Pannagium est pastus porcorum, in nemoribus et in silvis, utputa, de glandibus, &c.—1 Buls. 7.—(A pannagium is a pasture of hogs, in woods and forests, upon acorns, and so forth.)

Pannel. See Panel.

Pannellation, act of empanelling a jury.

Pannier-man, one who calls the members in the inns of court to dinner, &c., and provides mustard, pepper, and vinegar for the hall.

Pannus, a garment made with skins.—Fleta, l. 2, c. xiv.

Pantomime, the name given to a dramatic performance of a particular kind; mimicry. See Lee v. Simpson, 3 C. B. 871.

Paper Book, the issues in law, &c., upon special pleadings, formerly made up by the clerk of the papers, who was an officer for that purpose, but now by the plaintiff's attorney or agent.

By rule of all the courts of Hilary Term, 1853, r. 68, 'four clear days before the day appointed for argument, the plaintiff in error shall deliver copies of the judgment of the court below to the judges of the Queen's Bench on error from the Common Pleas or Exchequer, and to the judges of the Common Pleas on error from the Queen's Bench; and the defendant in error shall deliver copies thereof to the other judges of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, before whom the case is to be heard; and in default by either party, the other party may on the following day deliver such books as ought to have been delivered by the party making default, and the party making default shall not be heard until he shall have paid for such copies, or deposited with the Master a sufficient sum to pay for such copies.'

By rule of all the courts of Hilary Term, 1853, r. 16, 'four clear days before the day appointed for argument, the plaintiff shall deliver copies of the demurrer-book, special case, special verdict, or appeal cases with the points intended to be insisted on, to the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench or Common Pleas, or Lord Chief Baron (as the case may be), and the senior judge of the court in which the action is brought; and the defendant shall deliver copies to the other two judges of the court, next in seniority, and in default thereof by either party, the other party may on the day following deliver such copies as ought to have been so delivered by the party making default; and the party making default shall not be heard until he shall have paid for such copies, or deposited with the master, a sufficient sum to pay for such copies. If the statement of the points have not been exchanged between the parties, each party shall, in addition to the two copies left by him, deliver also his statement of the points to the other two judges, either by marking the same in the margin of the books delivered, or on separate papers.'—Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 572, 916.

Paper-credit, credit given on the security of any written obligation purporting to represent property.

Paper-days. In each of the Common Law Courts there are certain days in each term called special paper-days, because the court, on those days, hears the cases which have been entered in the special paper for argument. There are also in the Queen's Bench, Crown paper-days for disposing of business on the Crown side of the court.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 158.

Paper-money, bank notes, bills of exchange, and promissory-notes.

Paper-office (in the palace of Whitehall), an ancient office, where all the public writings, matters of state and council, proclamations, letters, intelligences, negotiations of the Queen's ministers abroad, and generally all the papers and dispatches that pass through the offices of the Secretaries of State, are deposited.

Also, an office or room in the Court of Queen's Bench, where the records belonging to that court are deposited; sometimes called Paper-mill.

Papism, popery.

Papist [fr. papa, Lat., a pope], one who adheres to the communion of the church of Rome. The word seems to be considered by the Roman Catholics themselves as a nick-name of reproach, originating in their maintaining the supreme ecclesiastical power of the pope.

By 18 Geo. III. c. 60; 31 Geo. III. c. 32; and 43 Geo. III. c. 30, most of the severer penalties and disabilities to which papists were formerly subject were removed on condition of their qualifying by such oath and declaration as in those acts respectively provided; and by 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, commonly called the Catholic Emancipation Act, Roman Catholics were restored in general to the full enjoyment of all civil rights, except that of holding ecclesiastical offices and certain high appointments in the state. By the provisions of this statute all enactments by which any declaration against transubstantiation, the invocation of the saints, or the sacrifice of the mass, were required from any persons, as qualifications for sitting in Parliament or otherwise, are repealed; and persons professing the Roman Catholic religion, upon taking and subscribing an oath prescribed by the act (which comprises, among other things, the abjuration of any intention to subvert the church establishment, and an oath never to exercise any privilege to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion or government) are relieved from all disabilities and penalties whatever, and made competent to sit in Parliament, to vote at Parliamentary elections, and to be members of lay corporations. They are also qualified, upon taking and subscribing the same oath (which is to stand in place of all other tests whatever), to exercise any franchise or civil right except that of presenting to benefices, and to hold any office, with the exception of the following: the office of guardian, justice, or regent of the United Kingdom; of lord high chancellor or commissioner or keeper of the Great Seals; of lord lieutenant, deputy, or chief governor of Ireland; of high commissioner to the general assembly of the church of Scotland; or any office in the church or the ecclesiastical courts, or in the universities, colleges, and public schools.

Doubts, however, having been still entertained as to the right of Roman Catholic subjects in England to acquire and hold property for the support of religious worship, and for educational or charitable purposes, it was provided by the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115, that they should be subject, in this particular, to the same laws as were applicable to Protestant dissenters; and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 49, repealed all such enactments as still remained in force, however fallen into oblivion, calculated in any manner to oppress the Roman Catholic subjects of the realm, on account of their religious persuasion. But see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 60.

Papist livings. The right to present to them is vested and secured to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, according to the several counties in which they are situated.

Par, state of equality; equal value.

Parachronism [fr. παρά, Gk., besides; and χρόνος, time], error in the computation of time.

Paracium, the tenure between parceners, viz., that which the youngest owes to the eldest without homage or service.—Domesday.

Parage, an equality of blood or dignity; but more especially of land, in the partition of an inheritance between co-heirs; more properly, however, an equality of condition among nobles, or persons holding nobly. Thus, when a fief is divided among brothers, the younger hold their part of the elder by parage, i. e. without any homage or service.

Paragium, equality, the portion which a woman may obtain on her marriage.

Paragraph, a part or section of a statute, bill, affidavit, &c., which contains one article, the sense of which is complee.

Paralogy [fr. παρά, Gk., against; and λόγος, reason], false reasoning.

Paramount, superior; having the highest jurisdiction, as lord paramount, the supreme lord of the fee, the sovereign.

Paraphernalia [fr. παρά, Gk., beyond; and φερνή, dower], something reserved to a wife over and above her dower or dotal portion. It includes all the personal apparel and ornaments of the wife which she possesses, and which are suitable to her rank and condition of life.

At law, the husband, in his lifetime, may dispose of his wife's paraphernalia, excepting, indeed, her necessary apparel; and they are liable to the claims of creditors, with the like exception. But the wife is entitled to her paraphernalia against his representatives; for the husband cannot, by will, dispose of them, or leave them to his representatives.

Where the husband, either before or after marriage, gives to his wife articles of paraphernal nature, they are not treated as absolute gifts to her as her own separate property; for if they were, she might dispose of them at any time, and he could not appropriate them to his own use. But they are deemed gifts sub modo only, i. e. for the purpose of being worn by the wife as ornaments of her person. But if the like articles were bestowed upon her by her father, or by a relative, or even by a stranger, before or after marriage, they would be deemed absolute gifts to her separate use; and then, if received with the husband's consent, he could not, nor could his creditors, dispose of them, any more than they could of any other property received and held to her separate use.—2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 554.

Parasceve, the sixth day of the last week in Lent, popularly called Good-Friday. It is a dies non juridicus.

Parasitus, a domestic servant.—Blount.

Parasynexis, a conventicle, or unlawful meeting.—Civ. Law.

Paratitla, an abbreviated explanation of some titles or books of the code or digest.—Civ. Law.

Paravail [fr. par, Fr., and avayler, to dismiss], the lowest tenant of a fee; or he who is immediate tenant to one who holds of another.

Parcella terræ (a parcel of land).

Parcel Makers, two officers in the Exchequer who formerly made the parcels of the escheators' accounts, wherein they charged them with everything they had levied for the sovereign's use within the time of their being in office, and delivered the same to the auditors, to make up their accounts therewith.—Prac. Exch. 99.

Parcels, a description of property, formally set forth in a conveyance, together with the boundaries thereof, in order to its easy identification.

Parcels, Bill of, an account of the items composing a parcel or package of goods, transmitted with them to the purchaser.

Parcenary, the tenure of lands by parceners.

Parceners. See COPARCENARY.

Parchment, skins of sheep dressed for writing [fr. pergamena, Lat.], so called, because invented at Pergamus, in Asia Minor, by King Eumenes, when paper, which was in Egypt only, was prohibited by Ptolemy to be transported into Asia.

Parco fracto, a writ against him who violently broke a pound, and took away beasts which were lawfully impounded.—Reg. Orig. 166.

Pardon, forgiveness of a crime; remission of punishment.

The pardoning of criminals is the peculiar and most amiable prerogative of the sovereign.

The Queen may pardon all offences merely against the Crown and the public, excepting: (1) That to preserve the liberty of the subject, the committing any man to prison out of the realm is, by the Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. II. c. 2, made a præmunire, unpardonable even by the Crown; nor (2) can the Queen pardon where private justice is principally concerned in the prosecution of offenders 'non potest rex gratiam facere cum injuriâ et damno aliorum.' Therefore she cannot pardon a common nuisance while it remains unredressed, or so as to prevent an abatement of it; though afterwards she may remit the fine. Neither can the Queen pardon an offence against a popular or penal statute after information brought; for thereby the informer has acquired a private property in his part of the penalty. But the 22 Vict. c. 32, enables the Crown to remit penalties for offences, although payable to parties other than the Crown. See also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 109, & c. 97, s. 67. By 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, no pardon, under the Great Seal of England, shall be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. But after the impeachment has been solemnly heard and determined, the prerogative of pardon may be extended to the person impeached.

As to the manner of pardoning, it is enacted by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 13, that where the king's majesty shall be pleased to extend his royal mercy to any offender convicted of any felony punishable with death or otherwise, and by warrant under his royal sign-manual, countersigned by one of his principal secretaries of state, shall grant to such offender either a free or a conditional pardon, the discharge of such offender out of custody, in the case of a free pardon, and the performance of the condition in the case of a conditional pardon, shall have the effect of a pardon under the Great Seal for such offender as to the felony for which such pardon shall be granted; subject, however, to a proviso, that they shall have no effect to prevent or mitigate the punishment to which the offender might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any felony committed after such pardon.

By 9 Geo. IV. c. 32, s. 3, reciting that it is expedient to prevent all doubts respecting the civil rights of persons convicted of felonies not capital, who have undergone the punishment to which they were adjudged, it is enacted that where any offender shall be convicted of any felony not punishable with death, and shall endure the punishment to which he has been adjudged for the same, the punishment so endured shall have the like effects and consequences as a pardon under the Great Seal, as to the felony whereof the offender was so convicted; subject, however, to a proviso that it shall not prevent or mitigate any punishment to which he might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any other felony.

It is a general rule that whenever it may reasonably be presumed that the Queen has been deceived, the pardon is void. A pardon of all felonies will not pardon a conviction or attainder of felony, but the conviction or attainder must be particularly mentioned; and a pardon of felonies will not include piracy, for that is no felony punishable at the common law. A pardon shall be taken most beneficially for the subject, and most strongly against the sovereign. A pardon may also be conditional, that is, the Queen may extend her mercy upon what terms she pleases, and may annex to her bounty a condition either precedent or subsequent, on the performance whereof the validity of the pardon will depend, and this by the common law; which prerogative is daily exercised in the pardon of felons, on condition of being confined to hard labor for a stated time, or of transportation to some foreign country for life or for a term of years.

A pardon by Act of Parliament is more beneficial than by the Queen's charter; for a man is not bound to plead it, but the court must, ex officio, take notice of it; neither can he lose the benefit of it by his own laches or negligence, as he may of the Queen's charter of pardon. The Queen's charter of pardon must be specially pleaded, and that at a proper time. It may be pleaded in bar as at once destroying the end and purpose of the indictment, by remitting the punishment to which the offender is liable. There is one advantage in pleading a pardon in bar or in arrest of judgment, before sentence is past, which gives it the preference over such a plea after sentence or attainder. This is, that by stopping the judgment, it stops the attainder, and prevents the corruption of blood which follows in certain cases, on conviction, and which cannot afterwards be purged except by Act of Parliament. The 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 13, gives the judges of the court a discretionary power to bind over the criminal pleading such pardon to his good behaviour, with two sureties, for any term not exceeding seven years.

The effect of a pardon is to make the offender a new man (novus homo), to acquit him of all corporal penalties and forfeitures annexed to the offence pardoned, and not so much to restore his former as to give him new credit and capacity. A pardon of treason or felony, even after conviction or attainder, will enable a person to maintain an action of slander for calling him a traitor or felon. A pardon, prior to conviction, will prevent any forfeiture either of lands or goods, though on the other hand, it will not, without express words of restitution, divest either the Crown or a subject of any interest already vested in either by force of an attainder or conviction precedent. See CORRUPTION OF BLOOD, and APPROVER.

Pardon, in the canon law, extends beyond the affairs of this world, being an indulgence which the pope grants to supposed penitents for remission of the pains of purgatory, which they have merited for the punishment of their sins.

Pardoners, persons who carried about the pope's indulgences, and sold them to any who would buy them.

Parens est nomen generale ad omne genus cognationis.—Co. Litt. 80.—(Parent is a name general for every kind of relationship.)

Parens Patriæ, the sovereign, as parens patriæ, has a kind of guardianship over various classes of persons, who, from their legal disability, stand in need of protection, such as infants, idiots, and lunatics.

Parent and Child, an universal and natural relationship, derived from the bond of husband and wife.

The duties of parents consist in three particulars—the maintenance of their children, their protection, and their education.

Very slight circumstances will be sufficient to raise the presumption of a contract on the part of a father to pay for necessaries provided to his infant-child. The poor-laws compel maintenance; for the father and mother, grandfather and grandmother, or children of poor persons not able to work, shall maintain them at their own charges, if of sufficient ability, according as the quarter-sessions or two justices in petty sessions shall direct; and if a parent run away and leave his children, the churchwardens and overseers of the parish shall seize his rents, goods, and chattels, and dispose of them towards their relief.—See POOR LAWS, 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 110; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 87.

No person is bound to provide a maintenance for his issue, unless where the children are impotent and unable to work, either through infancy, disease, or accident; and then only obliged to find them with necessaries. Our law has made no provision to prevent the disinheriting of children.

The protection of children is a natural duty, and rather permitted than enjoined by our municipal laws. Their education also is rather a moral than a legal duty.

A father is, generally speaking, guardian to his infant children; and it is understood, that though this right ceases, in some instances and for some purposes, at fourteen, he is always entitled, in his paternal capacity, to the control of their persons, until the age of twenty-one; and if the possession of them during this period be withheld from him, he may in general regain it by writ of habeas corpus. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 56, whosoever by force or fraud shall take or entice away or detain any child under the age of fourteen, with intent either to deprive its parent or any other person having lawful charge of it, of the possession thereof, or to steal any article about its person, shall be guilty of felony, &c.

A father may correct his infant-child in a reasonable manner; for this is for the benefit of his education. His consent to the marriage of his child, if under age, is also required.—4 Geo. IV. c. 76; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 85.

As to property, where the child has any real estate, his father, in the capacity of guardian, has generally the charge of it, and may receive the rents and profits during the minority of the child, subject to the liability to account for them on the child's attaining full age.

With respect to the mother, she has no legal power over the child in the father's lifetime, at least as against the father, except that by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54, where the child is within the age of seven years, the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls may, upon the mother's petition (unless she have been judged adulteress), make an order on the father or testamentary guardian to deliver it into her custody. After the father's death, the mother is entitled to the custody of her child until the age of twenty-one years, and if she is unmarried her consent to the marriage of an infant child is necessary (see MARRIAGE); but she cannot appoint a guardian by will (see GUARDIAN). The Divorce Court has power to make such orders as it may think fit with regard to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children of the parties to suits for judicial separation, nullity of marriage, or dissolution of marriage.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 35; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 4. The law has not deemed it necessary to make much provision on the subject of filial obligations, but it is held that a child is justified in defending the person, and maintaining the cause or suit of a parent, as a parent is justified in performing the same duties for a child.—2 Step. Com. 295.

Parentela, de parentelâ se tollere, signified a renunciation of one's kindred and family. This was, according to ancient custom, done in open court, before the judge, and in the presence of twelve men, who made oath that they believed it was done for a just cause. We read of it in the laws of Henry I. After such abjuration, the person was incapable of inheriting anything from any of his relations, &c.—Encyc. Lond.

Parenticide [fr. parens, Lat., a father, and cædo, to kill], one who murders a parent.

Pares, a person's peers or equals; as the jury for trial of causes, who were originally the vassals or tenants of the lord, being the equals or peers of the parties litigant; and, as the lord's vassals judged each other in the lord's courts, so the sovereign's vassals, or the lords themselves, judged each other in the sovereign's courts.—3 Bl. Com. 349.

Pares copulantur paribus.—Bacon.—(Like things unite with like.)

Pariar, Pariah, an outcast of the Hindoo tribes.—Indian.

Paribus sententiis reus absolvitur.—4 Inst. 64.—(Where the opinions are equal, a defendant is acquitted.)

Paricide, a word to be distinguished from patricide, or parricide, with two r's, which is simply a softening of the t. The one is a murderer generally; the other a murderer of his father. The derivation is evidently in one case fr. parem, Lat., an equal, and cædo, to kill, that is, the murder of a fellow-citizen, not a slave; but in the other, fr. patrem, a father, and cædo. See PARRICIDE.

Par in parem imperium non habet—Jenk. Cent. 174.—(An equal has no power over an equal.)

Pari passu [Lat.] (by the same gradation), equally, without preference.

Parish [fr. parochia, low Lat.; paroisse, Fr., fr. παροικία, Gk., habitation], the particular charge of a secular priest. It is that circuit of ground which is committed to the care of one parson or vicar, or other minister having permanent cure of souls therein.—1 Step. Com. 120. As to the origin of parishes, see 2 Hall M. A. c. vii. pt. 1, p. 144.

Parish-apprentices, persons who are bound out by the overseers of parishes, or by the guardians of the poor. The children of poor persons may be apprenticed out by the overseers, with consent of two justices, and by the guardians without such consent, till twenty-one years of age, to such persons as are thought fitting; who are no longer, however, compellable to take them.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 13; and see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 11; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

Parish-clerk. The office of parish-clerk is one of extreme venerableness and antiquity; next in dignity to the clergy, says Leland; semi-ecclesiastical, according to Camden. Witty Fuller likens him in his Church History to the bat—half-bird, half-beast—yet so as there is more in him of the former than of the latter; his clergy wings outweigh the laic or mouse part of him. He is the mouthpiece of the congregation, says Hooker; mouth of mouths, according to Bishop Bull; the connecting link between the minister and people; cousin, twice removed, to the vicar, says another; note, that the curate is betwixt. Bellwether to the flock, says Bishop Andrews, speaking it in honor. Spelman doubts whether he is not entitled to a portion of the lesser tithes—say a tenth. From all which expressions, though some of them seem run up into a height of metaphor and allegory greater peradventure than the matter soberly considered will bear, we may yet gather in what kind of estimation antiquity has held the function.—Encyc. Lond.

He is generally appointed by the incumbent, but by custom may be chosen by the inhabitants; his appointment may be by word of mouth only; and his remuneration depends altogether upon the custom of the particular parish.—58 Geo. III. c. 45; 59 Geo. III. c. 134; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104. He may be suspended or removed by the archdeacon for misconduct or neglect.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 59.

The Company of Parish Clerks is the most ancient in the city of London; yet they stand at the bottom of the list, and have neither livery nor the privilege of making their members free of the city.

Parishes (New) Acts, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104.

Parish-officers, churchwardens, overseers, and constables.

Parish-priest, the parson; a minister who holds a parish as a benefice. If the predial tithes are appropriated, he is called rector; if impropriated vicar.

Parish-registers. See BILLS OF MORTALITY.

Parishioner, one that belongs to a parish.

Parishioners are a body-politic for many purposes; as to vote at a vestry if they pay scot and lot; and they have a sole right to raise taxes for their own relief, without the interposition of any superior court. They may make bye-laws to mend the highway, and to make banks to keep out the sea, and for repairing the church, and making a bridge, &c. or any such thing for the public good.—Encyc. Lond.

Paritor [fr. apparitor, Lat.], a beadle; a summoner to the courts of civil law.

Parium eadem est ratio, idem jus.—(Of things equal, the reason is the same, and the same is the law.)

Park [fr. parcus, Lat., from parco, to spare], a place of privilege for wild beasts of venery, and also for other wild beasts that are beasts of the forest and of the chase; and those wild beasts are to have a firm place and protection there, so that no man may hurt or chase them within the park, without license of the owner.

A park differs from a forest, in that, as Compton observes, a subject may hold a park by prescription or royal grant, which he cannot do with respect to a forest. It differs from a chase also, because a park must be enclosed; if it lie open, it is a good cause of seizing it into the sovereign's hands, as a free chase may be if it lie enclosed.

To a park three things are required:—1st, a grant thereof; 2nd, inclosure by pale, wall, or hedge; 3rd, beasts of a park, such as buck, doe, &c.—Cro. Car. 59.

As to the management of the royal parks, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 42; as to Victoria Park, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 46; and as to Battersea Park, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 77. As to Kennington Park, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 29.

Park-bote, to be quit of enclosing a park or any part thereof.

Parker, a park-keeper.

Parkhurst Prison, established in the Isle of Wight for the confinement and correction of young offenders, male or female, as well those under sentence of penal servitude as those under sentence of imprisonment. The rules for this prison are to be made by one of the Principal Secretaries of State, and afterwards laid before Parliament, and they may include the infliction of corporal punishment on all such offenders. By the same authority a governor, chaplain, surgeon, matron, and other necessary officers are to be appointed.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 39; 3 Step. Com. 240.

Parliament, the Imperial, the legislature of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, consisting of the Queen, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the knights, citizens, and burgesses.

The word is generally considered to be derived fr. the French, parler, to speak. 'It was first applied,' says Blackstone, 'to general assemblies of the state, under Louis VII., in France, about the middle of the twelfth century.' The earliest mention of it in the statutes is in the preamble to the statute of Westminster 1st A. D. 1272.

The origin of any ancient institution must be difficult to trace, when, in the course of time, it has undergone great changes; and few subjects have afforded to antiquaries more cause for learned research and ingenious conjecture than the growth of our Parliament into the form which it had assumed when authentic records of its existence and constitution are to be found. Great councils of the nation existed in England both under the Saxons and Normans, and appear to have been common among all the nations of the north of Europe. They were called by the Saxons michel-synoth, or great council; michel-gemote, or great meeting; and wittena-gemote, meeting of wise men, by the last of which they are now most familiarly known. There appear to have been wittena-gemotes in each of the kingdoms composing the Saxon Heptarchy, and these, after the union of the kingdoms, became united into one great assembly or council.

The constitution of these councils cannot be known with any certainty, and there has been much controversy on the subject, and especially as to the share of authority enjoyed by the people. Different periods have been assigned for their admittance into the legislature. Coke, Spelman, Camden, and Prynne, agree that the commons formed part of the great synods or councils before the Conquest, but how they were summoned, and what degree of power they possessed, is a matter of doubt and obscurity. Under the Saxon kings, the forms of local government were undoubtedly popular. The shire-gemote was a kind of county Parliament at which the alderman or earl of the shire (being himself elected to that office by the freeholders) presided, with the bishop, the shire-gerieve, or sheriff, and the assessors appointed to assist their deliberations upon points of law. A shire-gemote was held twice a-year in every county, when the magistrates, thanes, abbots, with all the clergy and landholders, were obliged to be present. A variety of business was conducted, but the proceedings of these assemblies generally partook more of the character of a court of justice than of a legislative body. That the wittena-gemote, or national council, was of an equally popular constitution with the shire-gemote is not so certain. If the smaller proprietors of land were not actually disqualified by law from taking part in the proceedings, yet their poverty, and the distance of the council from their homes, must generally have prevented them from attending. It has been conjectured that they were represented by their tithing-men, and the inhabitants of towns by their chief magistrates; but no system of political representation can be traced back to that time.—Squire on the English Constitution, pp. 120, 244; Henry's History of England, vol. iii., p. 372. In the absence of any such trace, however, the late Mr. Sharon Turner says, that 'after many years' consideration of the question, he is inclined to believe that the Anglo-Saxon wittena-gemote very much resembled our present Parliament in the orders and persons that composed it, and that the members who attended as representatives were chosen by classes analogous to those who now possess the elective franchise.'—History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. iii., p. 180. He considers it 'incumbent on the historical antiquary to show, not when the people acceded to the wittena-gemotes, but when, if ever, they were divested of the right of attending them,' as the German national councils, from which this Saxon institution derived its origin, were attended by all the people; and he argues that 'the total absence of any document or date of the origin of the election of representatives by the freeholders of counties is the strongest proof we can have that the custom has been immemorial, and long preceded the Norman Conquest. The facts that such representatives have been called knights of the shire, and that milites, or an order like those afterwards termed knights, were part of the wittena-gemote, befriend this deduction.'—Ib. p. 184. As there are no records which can be held as conclusive upon this point of history, we must be satisfied with conjecture, and the liberal character of the other Saxon institutions inclines us to infer that whether there was representation or not, the commonalty had a share in the government.

That we are indebted to our Saxon ancestors for the germs of our free institutions there can be no doubt, though we cannot trace their growth so distinctly as we could wish. That the people were frequently present at the deliberations of the wittena-gemote, and that the authority of their name was used, appears from many records, but whether as witnesses (in which capacity they are sometimes spoken of), or because their presence was necessary to give effect to laws, is not so clear. In the reign of Ethelwolf, A. D. 855, a great council was held at Winchester, in which a tenth of the whole nation was given to the church by 'the king, the barons, and the people, in an infinite multitude,' but the nobles only signed the law.—Ingulf, p. 863. A 'copious multitude of people, with many knights,' is also said to have attended a similar council in the fifth year of the reign of King Canute, but it does not appear that the people took any part in the proceedings save as spectators. In Edward the Confessor's law, de Apibus, a tenth is confirmed to the church, 'by the king, the barons, and the people;' but in other laws of the same king, the whole authority of the state is declared to be vested in the king, acting with the advice of his barons. The Normans were not likely to advance the pretensions of the people whom they had conquered. Theirs was an oppressive feudal government at variance with popular privileges. All rank and property was the gift of the Crown, involving military service and subordination. Spelman, in his Treatise on Parliaments, thus describes the political condition of the commonalty under the feudal system: 'Every lord having authority over his tenant, the superior, as comprehending them all, and holding in capite (i. e. in chief, or direct from the king), was tied to the king to see all under his tenure to be of good government. By reason whereof, whatsoever those their lords agreed or disagreed unto in matters of the state and commonwealth, it did bind every of them their inferiors. Hence, then, it comes to pass, that in making laws of the kingdom, the common people were not consulted with, but only the barons, or those who held in capite, who then were called concilium regni.'—Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, p. 60.

From the haughty character of the Norman barons, Mr. Turner infers the improbability of an elective Parliament having been instituted since the Conquest. Here, again, no positive evidence is supplied by our records. The laws and charters of the early Norman kings constantly mention councils of bishops, abbots, barons, and the chief persons of the kingdom, but are silent as to the commons.

In the 22nd year of Henry II., A. D. 1176, Benedict Abbas, one of our monkish annalists, relates that, about the feast of St. Paul, the king came to Northampton, and there held a great council concerning the statutes of his realm, in the presence of bishops, earls, and barons of his dominions, and with the advice of his knights and men. This is the first record which appears to include the commons in the national councils.

Forty years afterwards, the Great Charter of King John throws a light upon the constitution of Parliament, which no earlier record had done; but even there the origin of a representative system is left in obscurity. It reserves to the city of London, and to all other cities, boroughs, and towns, and to the cinque ports, and other ports, all their ancient liberties and free customs; but whether the summons to Parliament, which is there promised, was then first instituted, or whether it was an ancient privilege confirmed and guaranteed for the future, the words of the charter do not sufficiently explain. From this time, however, may be clearly traced the existence of a Parliament similar to that which has continued to our own days. 'The main constitution of Parliament, as it now stands,' says Blackstone, 'was marked out so long ago as the seventeenth year of King John, A.D. 1215, in the Great Charter granted by that prince, wherein he promises to summon all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, personally, and all other tenants-in-chief under the Crown, by the sheriff and bailiffs, to meet at a certain place, with forty days' notice, to assess aids and scutages when necessary; and this constitution has subsisted in fact, at least, from the year 1266 (49 Hen. III.), there being still extant writs of that date to summon knights, citizens, and burgesses to Parliament.' There are writs of an earlier date than that mentioned by Blackstone, in the 49 Hen. III., which involve the principle of representation, though not to the same extent. One, in the 38th year of that reign, requires the sheriff of each county to cause to come before the king's council two good and discreet knights of his county, whom the men of the county shall have chosen for this purpose, in the stead of all and each of them, to consider, along with the knights of other counties, what aid they will grant the king.—2 Prynne's Register, p. 23. This, however, was for a particular occasion only; and to appear before the council is not to vote as an estate of the realm. Nevertheless, representation of some kind there existed; and it is interesting to observe how early the people had a share in granting subsidies. Another writ, in 1261, directs the sheriffs to cause knights to repair from each county to the king at Windsor. It only remains to notice a statute passed, 15 Edw. II., 1322, which declares that 'the matters to be established for the estate of the king, and of his heirs, and for the estate of the realm and of the people, should be treated, accorded, and established in Parliament by the king, and by the assent of the prelates, earls, and barons, and the commonalty of the realm, according as had been before accustomed.' In reference to this statute, Mr. Hallam observes, 'that it not only establishes, by a legislative declaration, the present constitution of Parliament, but recognises it as already standing upon a custom of some length of time.'—1 Const. Hist. p. 5; and see 3 Hall. M. A. c. viii. pt. 3, p. 4.

The authority of Parliament extends over the United Kingdom, and all its colonies and foreign possessions. There are no other limits to its power of making laws for the whole empire than those which are common to it, and to all other sovereign authority, the willingness of the people to obey, or their power to resist them. It has power to alter the constitution of the country; for that is the constitution which the last Act of Parliament has made. It may take away life by acts of attainder, and make an alien to be as a natural-born subject.

Parliament does not, in the ordinary course, legislate directly for the colonies. For some the Queen in council legislates, and others have legislatures of their own, and propound laws for their internal government, subject to the approval of the Queen in council, but these may afterwards be repealed or amended by statutes of the Imperial Parliament. There are some subjects, indeed, upon which Parliament, in familiar language, is said to have no right to legislate; such, for instance, as the church; but no one who thinks correctly, can intend more by that expression than that it is inexpedient to make laws as to such matters.

The very prayers and services of the church are prescribed by statute. Parliament has changed the professed religion of the country, and has altered the hereditary succession to the throne. To conclude, in the words of Sir Edward Coke, the power of Parliament 'is so transcendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds.'

Custom and convenience have assigned to different branches of the legislature peculiar powers, but they are subject to any limitation, or even transference, which Parliament may think fit to enact.

It is by the act of the Sovereign alone that Parliament can be assembled.

There have been only two instances in which the lords and commons have met of their own authority, namely, previously to the restoration of King Charles II. and at the Revolution in 1688.

There is one contingency upon which the Parliament may meet without summons under the authority of an Act of Parliament. It was provided by the 6 Anne, c. 7, that 'in case there should be no Parliament in being at the time of the demise of the Crown, then the last preceding Parliament should immediately convene and sit at Westminster, as if the said Parliament had never been dissolved.' By the 37 Geo. III. c. 127, a Parliament so revived would only continue in existence for six months, if not sooner dissolved.

As the Sovereign appoints the time and place of meeting, so also at the commencement of every session she declares to both houses the cause of summons by a speech delivered to them in the House of Lords by herself in person, or by commissioners appointed by her. Until she has done this, neither house can proceed with any business.

After the speech any business may be commenced, and the Commons, in order to assert their right to act without reference to any authority but their own, invariably read a bill a first time pro formâ, before they take the speech into consideration.

Parliament, it has been seen, can only commence its deliberations at the time appointed by the Sovereign, neither can it continue them any longer than she pleases. She may prorogue Parliament by having her command signified in her presence by the Lord Chancellor or Speaker of the House of Lords to both houses, or by writ under the Great Seal, or by commission. The effect of a prorogation is at once to suspend all business until Parliament may be summoned again. Not only are the sittings of Parliament at an end, but all proceedings pending at the time, except impeachments by the Commons, are quashed.

Adjournment is solely in the power of each house respectively.

The Sovereign may also put an end to the existence of Parliament by a dissolution. She is not, however, entirely free to define the duration of a Parliament, for after seven years it ceases to exist under the statute of George I., commonly known as the Septennial Act. Parliament is dissolved by proclamation after having been prorogued to a certain day.

The judicial functions of the Lords, and their right to pass bills affecting the peerage, which the Commons may not amend, are the only properties peculiar to them apart from their personal rights and privileges.

The chief powers vested in the House of Commons are those of imposing taxes and voting money for the public service. Bills for these purposes can only originate in that house, and the Lords may not make any alterations in them, except for the correction of clerical errors.

Another important power peculiar to the Commons is that of determining all matters touching the election of their own members, and involving therein the rights of the electors.

The power of administering oaths is exercised by the Lords and Commons. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 78.

Both Houses of Parliament possess various rights and privileges for the maintenance of their collective authority, and for the protection, convenience, and dignity of individual members. The power of commitment for contempt has always been exercised by both houses. The House of Lords, in addition to the power of commitment, may impose fines. Freedom of speech is one of the privileges claimed by the Speaker on behalf of the Commons; but it has long since been confirmed as the right of both Houses of Parliament by statutes. The law presumes that everything said in Parliament is with the view to the public good, and necessary for the conduct of public business; but should a member publish his speech, he is viewed as an author only; and if it contain libellous matter, he will not be protected by the privilege of Parliament.

The persons of members are free from arrest or imprisonment in civil actions, but their property is as liable to the legal claims of all other persons as that of any private individual. Their servants do not enjoy any privilege or immunity whatever.

The privilege of freedom from arrest has always been subject to the exception of cases of 'treason, felony, and surety of the peace.' Peers are always free from arrest; and as regards the Commons, their privilege is generally held to exist for forty days after every prorogation, and forty days before the next appointed meeting.

Each House of Parliament is acknowledged to be the judge of its own privileges.

In the House of Lords, business may proceed when three peers are present; but forty members are required to assist in the deliberations of the lower house.

When any question arises upon which a difference of opinion is expressed, it becomes necessary to ascertain the numbers on each side. In the Lords, the parties in favor of the question are called 'content,' and those opposed to it 'non-content.' In the Commons, these parties are described as the 'ayes' and 'noes.' When the Speaker cannot decide by the voices which party has the majority, or when his decision is disputed, a division takes place.

In addition to the power of expressing assent or dissent by a vote, peers may record their opinion, and the grounds of it, by a protest, which is entered in the journals, together with the names of all the peers who concur in it.

When matters of great interest are to be debated in the upper house, the Lords are summoned; and in the House of Commons an order is occasionally made that the house be called over, and members not attending when their names are called, are reported as defaulters, and ordered to attend on another day, when, if they are still absent, and no excuse be offered, they are sometimes committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms.

The business, which occupies nearly the whole attention of both houses, if we except the hearing of appeals by the Lords, and the trial of controverted elections by the Commons, is the passing of bills.—May's Imperial Parliament. See HOUSE OF LORDS, HOUSE OF COMMONS, and IMPEACHMENT.

Parliamentary Agents, persons whose business is to promote or oppose the passing of private Acts of Parliament. A solicitor may act as a parliamentary agent. As to the delivery, taxation, and recovery of their costs, see 10 & 11 Vict. c. 69, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 78.

Parliamentary Committee, a committee of members of the House of Peers or of the House of Commons, appointed by either house for the purpose of making inquiries, by the examination of witnesses or otherwise, into matters which could not be conveniently inquired into by the whole house. Not only any bill, but any subject that is brought under the consideration of either house, may, if the house thinks proper, be referred to a committee; and when the inquiry is ended, the committee, through their chairman, make a report to the house of the result. All election petitions are now inquired into by select committees of the House of Commons, the members of which are chosen by lot. All private bills, such as bills for railways, canals, roads, or other undertakings in which the public is concerned, are referred to select committees of each house before they are sanctioned by that house. Their reports are not absolutely binding upon the house. Great weight is always attached to them, and the house seldom reverses their decision upon such matters.

Paroche, a parish.

Parochia est locus quo degit populus alicujus ecclesiæ.—5 Co. 67.—(A parish is a place in which the population of a certain church resides.)

Parochial, belonging to a parish. See POOR LAWS.

Parochial Chapels, places of public worship in which the rites of sacrament and sepulture are performed.

Parochial Buildings in Scotland. As to their erection and improvement, see 25 & 26 Vict. cc. 58 & 103. And as to district parochial churches in Ireland, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 123.

Parochian, a parishioner.

Paroichia, a parish.

Parol [fr. parole, Fr.], by word of mouth.

Also, the pleadings in an action were, when they were given vivâ voce in court, frequently termed the parol.

As to parol leases, assignments, contracts, and conveyances, see 29 Car. II. c. 3, commonly called 'The Statute of Frauds.'

Parol arrest, any justice of the peace may, by word of mouth, authorize any one to arrest another who is guilty of a breach of the peace in his presence.

Parol demurrer, abolished by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 47, s. 10.

Parol evidence, testimony by the mouth of a witness.

It is a general rule that oral evidence shall in no case be received as equivalent to, or as a substitute for, a written instrument, where the latter is required by law, or to give effect to a written instrument, which is defective in any particular which by law is essential to its validity; or to contradict, alter, or vary a written instrument, either appointed by law, or by the compact of private parties, to be the appropriate and authentic memorial of the facts which it recites; for by doing so, oral testimony would be admitted in the place of a species of evidence decidedly superior in degree.

But parol evidence is admissible to defeat a written instrument on the ground of fraud, mistake, &c., or to apply it to its proper subject, or in some instances, as ancillary to such application, to explain the meaning of doubtful terms, or to rebut presumptions arising extrinsically. In these cases the parol evidence does not usurp the place or arrogate the authority of written evidence, but either shows that the instrument ought not to be allowed to operate at all, or is essential in order to give to the instrument its legal effect.—3 Stark. Evid. 752.

The general rule with regard to the admission of parol evidence to explain the meaning of, or to add to, vary, or alter the express terms of a deed, is, that it shall not be admitted, except: (1) where, although the deed is clearly enough expressed, some ambiguity arises from extrinsic circumstances; (2) where the language of a charter or deed has become obscure, and the construction doubtful from antiquity; (3) where the grant appears uncertain, owing to a want of acquaintance with the grantor's estate; (4) where it is important to show a different consideration consistent with but not repugnant to that stated in the deed itself; (5) where it becomes necessary to show a different time of delivery from that at which the deed purports to have been made; (6) where it is sought to prove a customary right not expressed in the deed, but which is not inconsistent with any of its stipulations; or, lastly, where fraud or illegality in the formation of the deed is relied on to avoid it. If a clause in a deed be so ambiguously or defectively expressed that a court of justice cannot, even by reference to the context, collect the meaning of the parties, it will be void on account of uncertainty.—Woodf. Land. and Tent. 83.

Parol lease, a verbal lease. See 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 2.

Parole, the promise made by a prisoner of war, when he has leave to go anywhere, of returning at a time appointed, or not to take up arms till exchanged.

Parricide, one who kills his father; one who destroys or invades any person or thing to whom he owes particular reverence: as his country or patron. Also the crime of killing one's father.

Our laws, unlike the ancient laws, distinguish in no respect between the crime of parricide and that of killing a husband, wife, or master, and the crime of simple murder. See PARICIDE.

Parson [fr. persona, Lat., because the parson omnium personam in ecclesiâ sustinet; or from parochianus, the parish-priest.—Johnson. It was anciently written persone.—Todd], the rector or incumbent of a parish; one that has a parochial charge or cure of souls.

A parson has, during his life, the freehold in himself of the parsonage-house, the glebe, the tithes, and other dues. But these are sometimes appropriated, that is to say, the benefice is perpetually annexed to some spiritual corporation, either sole or aggregate, being the patron of the living, which the law esteems equally capable of providing for the service of the church as any clergyman. Many appropriations, however, are now in the hands of lay persons, who are usually styled, by way of distinction, lay impropriators.

In all appropriations there is generally a spiritual person attached to the same church, under the name of vicar, to whom the spiritual duty or cure of souls belongs, in the same manner as to the rector in parsonages not appropriate or rectories; and to whom, on the other hand, a certain portion of the tithes or other emoluments of the church, by way of exception out of those enjoyed by the appropriator, is assigned.

The method of becoming a parson or a vicar is much the same. To both there are, in general, four requisites necessary: holy orders, presentation, institution, and induction. A parson or vicar may cease to be so by death, by cession, or by taking another benefice, by consecration to a bishopric, by resignation, or by deprivation.—3 Step. Com. 19.

Parsonage, the benefice of a parish.

Parson imparsonee [fr. persona impersonata, Lat.], a clerk in complete and full possession of a spiritual benefice.

Parson mortal [fr. persona mortalis, Lat.], a rector instituted and inducted for his own life. But any collegiate or conventional body, to whom a church was for ever appropriated, was termed persona immortalis.

Pars rationabilis, the ancient division of a man's goods into three equal parts, of which one went to his heirs or lineal descendants, another to his wife, and the third was at his own disposal; or if he died without a wife, he might then dispose of one moiety, and the other went to his children, and so è converso; but if he died without either wife or issue, the whole was at his own disposal. The shares of the wife and children were called their reasonable parts; and the writ de rationabili parte bonorum was given to recover them. This law has been altered by imperceptible degrees, and the deceased may now by will bequeath the whole of his goods and chattels.—2 Step. Com. 193; 1 Wms. Exors. 2.

Parte quâcunque integrante sublatâ tollitur totum.—8 Co. 41.—(An integral part being taken away, the whole is taken away.)

Partem aliquam rectè intelligere nemo potest, antequam totum, iterum atque iterum, perlegerit. 3 Co. 52.—(No one can rightly understand any part until he has read the whole again and again.)

Partes finis nihil habuerunt, &c. (the parties to the fine had nothing, &c.), an exception taken against a fine levied.—3 Rep. 88.

Partial insanity, mental unsoundness always existing, although only occasionally manifest; in fact, monomania.—Dew v. Clark, Add. 279; Waring v. Waring, 6 Mos. P. C. 341.

Partial loss See ABANDONMENT.

Particeps criminis, or Fraudis (a partner in crime or fraud.)

Participes plures sunt quasi unum corpus, in eo quod unum jus habent, et oportet quod corpus sit integrum, et quod in nullâ parte sit defectus.—Co. Litt. 164 a.—(Many parceners are as one body, inasmuch as they have one right, and it is necessary that the body be perfect, and that there be a defect in no part.)

Participes, quasi partis capaces, sive partem capientes, quia res inter eas est communis, ratione plurium personarum.—Ibid. 164 b.—(Parceners, as it were 'partes capaces,' or 'partem capientes,' because the thing is common to them, by reason of their being many persons.)

Particula, a small piece of land.

Particular estate, that interest which is granted or carved out of a larger estate, which then becomes an expectancy either in reversion or remainder. See 3 Prest. Conv. 169.

Particular lien, a right of retaining possession of a chattel from the owner, until a certain claim upon it be satisfied. See LIEN.

Particular tenants, alienation by, when they conveyed by a feoffment, fine, or recovery, a greater estate than the law entitled them to make, a forfeiture ensued to the person in immediate remainder or reversion. As if a tenant for his own life aliened by feoffment for the life of another or in tail or in fee, these being estates which either must or may last longer than his own, his creating them was not only beyond his power, and inconsistent with the nature of his interest, but was also a forfeiture of his own particular estate to him in remainder or reversion, who was entitled to enter immediately.

The same law which is thus laid down with regard to tenants for life held also with respect to all tenants of mere chattel-interests.

This forfeiture differed materially from forfeiture by breach of condition in deed, for in that case the reversioner is in as of his former seisin, and consequently not only the estate of the tenant himself, but all interests derived out of it (even though derived before the forfeiture) were defeated; but in case of such forfeiture by particular tenants, all legal estates by them created (as if tenant for twenty years grant a lease for fifteen), and all charges by him lawfully made on the lands would have been good and available in law. But fines and recoveries having been abolished, and a feoffment having no longer a tortious operation (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4), a tenant, by creating a larger interest than he has in the property, does not incur a forfeiture, for such a creation is now void as to the excess, and good for his own interest.—1 Step. Com. 468.

Particulars of breaches. Where an ejectment is brought for a forfeiture, the court, or a judge upon application, will order the plaintiff to give the defendant particulars of the covenants and breaches, &c. on which he means to insist that the defendant has forfeited his term, and that he shall not be allowed to give evidence at the trial of anything not contained in such particulars.—C.L.P. Act (1852), s. 175; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1038.

Particulars of breaches of, and objections to, Patent. The Act for amending the law of patents, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 41, enacts that 'in any action in any of her Majesty's superior courts of record at Westminster, or in Dublin, for the infringement of letters-patent, the plaintiff shall deliver with his declaration particulars of the breaches complained of in the said action; and the defendant, on pleading thereto, shall deliver with his pleas, and the prosecutor in any proceedings by scire facias to repeal letters-patent shall deliver with his declaration, particulars of any objections on which he means to rely at the trial in support of the pleas in the said action, or in the suggestions of the said declaration in the proceedings by scire facias respectively; and at the trial of such action or proceedings by scire facias, no evidence shall be allowed to be given in support of any alleged infringement or of any objection impeaching the validity of such letters-patent which shall not be contained in the particulars delivered as aforesaid. Provided always, that the place or places at or in which and in what manner the invention is alleged to have been used or published prior to the date of the letters-patent shall be stated in such particulars. Provided also, that it shall and may be lawful for any judge at chambers to allow such plaintiff, or defendant, or prosecutor, respectively, to amend the particulars delivered as aforesaid upon such terms as to such judge shall seem fit. Provided also, that at the trial of any proceedings by scire facias, to repeal letters-patent, the defendant shall be entitled to begin and to give evidence in support of such letters-patent; and in case evidence shall be adduced on the part of the prosecutor impeaching the validity of such letters-patent, the defendant shall be entitled to the reply.' As to particulars of objection to copyright, see 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, s. 16.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1452.

Particulars of criminal charges. A prosecutor, when a charge is general, is frequently ordered to give the defendant a statement of the acts charged.

Particulars of escape. The defendant is entitled to a statement of the escape sued for, with the precise day of such escape.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1191.

Particulars of payment. Where a defendant pleads payment, a plaintiff, according to a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, may obtain particulars of the payments relied upon, on an affidavit stating that he cannot safely go to trial without them.—Ireland v. Thompson, 4 Bing. N. C. 716, sed qu. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1451.

Particulars of premises, &c. A defendant, if there be any reasonable doubt as to the lands, &c., for which an ejectment is brought, may take out a summons before a judge, and obtain an order calling upon the plaintiff to give him a bill of particulars. The court or a judge may also order the defendant to give a particular of the premises for which he defends, 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1038.

Particulars of residence. Where a plaintiff is unknown to a defendant, the latter may call for particulars of his residence or place of abode from the opposite attorney, and if he refuse to give it, or give a fictitious account of a person who cannot be found, the court or a judge will stay proceedings until security be given for costs.—C. L. P. Act (1852), s. 169.

An attorney may in general be compelled by a court or a judge to disclose the place of his client's residence, if the application be made in an early stage of a cause, but he cannot be compelled to disclose the place of his client's residence after verdict.

Particulars of set-off. Where a defendant pleads a set-off, the plaintiff may obtain a particular of the set-off in the same cases as a defendant would be entitled to it, if the matter so set off were declared upon; and if the defendant in such a case do not deliver a bill of particulars within the time limited in the judge's order for that purpose, he will not be allowed to give evidence of his set-off at the trial.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1450.

Particulars of the plaintiff's demand. By r. 19, H. T. 1853, 'with every declaration (unless the writ have been specially indorsed pursuant to s. 25 of the C. L. P. Act, 1852) delivered or filed, containing causes of action such as those set forth in schedule B of that Act, and numbered from 1 to 14 inclusive, or of a like nature, the plaintiff shall deliver or file full particulars of his demand under such claim, where such particulars can be comprised within three folios; and, where the same cannot be comprised within three folios, he shall deliver or file such a statement of the nature of his claim, and the amount of the sum or balance which he claims to be due, as may be comprised within that number of folios, and with every plea of set-off containing claims of a similar nature as those in respect of which a plaintiff is required to deliver or file particulars, the defendant shall in like manner deliver particulars of his set-off. And to secure the delivery or filing of particulars in all such cases, it is ordered that if any such declaration shall be delivered or filed, or any plea of set-off delivered, without such particulars or such statement as aforesaid, and a judge shall afterwards order a delivery of particulars, the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, shall not be allowed any costs in respect of any summons, for the purpose of obtaining such order, or of the particulars he may afterwards deliver; and a copy of the particulars of the demand and set-off shall be annexed by the plaintiff's attorney to every record at the time it is entered with the proper officer.'

Where the declaration contains special counts, it may be laid down as a general rule, that in all actions in which the plaintiff does not specify in the declaration the particulars of his cause of action, a judge, upon summons, will make an order upon him to give the defendant the particulars in writing, and that all proceedings be stayed in the meanwhile.

In actions for torts, it is generally the practice to refuse particulars of demand, which in most cases are comprised in the declaration. But, under circumstances, a judge will in such actions, compel a delivery of particulars, if there be an affidavit stating that the defendant does not know for what the plaintiff is proceeding.

By R. H. T. 1853, r. 21, 'a summons for particulars and order thereon may be obtained by a defendant before appearance, and may be made, if the judge think fit, without the production of any affivavit.' A judge may make an order at any time before the trial. The term of pleading issuably, and taking short notice of trial, if necessary, will be imposed on a defendant by the order. The order operates as a stay of proceedings from the time of its service till the particulars have been delivered. The particulars must be explicit, and should specify items, dates, and amounts. If they be incorrect, the party who delivered them may have leave to amend them; or if not sufficiently explicit, the other party may take out a summons, and obtain an order for further and better particulars.

By r. 21, H. T. 1853, 'a defendant shall be allowed the same time for pleading after the delivery of particulars under a judge's order which he had at the return of the summons; unless otherwise provided for in such order.'

At the trial, the party who delivered the particulars will be confined in his proof to the items therein contained, but if it appear from the defendant's evidence that he is entitled to recover for items not included in the bill, he shall recover them.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1437, et seq.

Particulars, the courts have a general jurisdiction, independently of statute, to order a detailed statement of the demand in any litigation, or of the defence to be given, that surprise may be avoided, and substantial justice promoted.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1437.

Particulars of Sale. See CONDITIONS OF SALE.

Parties, persons jointly concerned in any act; litigants.

The parties to an action at law are called in real actions demandant and tenant, and in personal actions plaintiff and defendant, and so in suits in equity.

In appeals they are called appellant and respondent.

The order in which the parties to a conveyance are set out is as follows: (1) The owner of the legal inheritance; (2) Persons having equitable or beneficial interests in the inheritance; (3) Persons possessed of chattel interests; (4) The grantee or releasee; (5) Trustees for the grantee or releasee.

In criminal cases they are the prosecutor and the prisoner or defendant.

Partition, the act of dividing.

Partition, Bill for a, a proceeding in Chancery which resembles the action communi dividendo of the civil law.

Since the abolition of the inadequate writ of partition at common law by the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36, equity enjoys the exclusive jurisdiction of dividing the estates of joint tenants, tenants in common and coparceners, which is effected by first ascertaining the rights of the several persons interested, and then issuing a commission, which is an equitable process, to make the partition required; and upon the return of the commissioners, and confirmation of that return by the court, the partition is finally completed by mutual conveyances of the allotments made to the several parties. Where the object is the partition of an advowson it is done by the decree (without a commission), directing alternate presentations. Equity is now empowered by 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 85, to decree a partition of copyholds. Where one of the parties interested is an infant, the court will now order such infant to execute the necessary deeds instead of waiting till his majority.—Cole v. Sewell, 17 Sim. 40 (1849).

With a view to the more convenient and perfect partition or allotment of the premises, equity frequently decrees a pecuniary compensation to one of the parties for owelty or equality of partition, so as to prevent any injustice or unavoidable inequality, as where one party has laid out large sums in improvements on the estate.

On a partition, every part of the estate need not be divided. If there be three houses, it would not be right to divide every house, for that would be to spoil them; but some recompense is to be made, either by a sum of money or rent for owelty of partition, to those that have the houses of least value.

The commissioners are not limited as to time in executing the commission; the proceedings under it are open, and may take place in or within twenty miles of London, all parties having a right to be present, as the commissioners act in a judicial capacity; they proceed without a jury.

It is not usual to give any costs of a partition until the commission; but the costs of issuing and executing it, and of confirming the return of the commissioners, are borne by the parties in proportion to the value of their respective interests, no costs of the subsequent proceedings being given.

Partition, Deed of, a primary or original conveyance. When an estate is held in community by joint tenants, tenants in common, coparceners, or joint heirs in gavelkind, and they are desirous of dividing it into distinct portions to be exclusively enjoyed by each, and are not under legal disability, they can accomplish such desire by this deed. Sometimes, instead of agreeing as to their several allotments, a reference is made to a person by them to divide the estate into the required portions, and a good plan of effecting this division is to convey the whole estate to the proposed referee upon trust to convey the several allotments to the respective parties, according to his award. A partition of any tenements or hereditaments, not being copyhold, is void at law, unless made by deed (8 & 9 Vict. 106, s. 3), and it is no longer to imply any condition in law (Ib. s. 4), so that a declaration negativing implied mutual warranty is now unnecessary.

There are two methods of carrying out a partition; one is by separate conveyances of the several allotments, when every party has the custody of his own title-deed; the other is by including the several allotments in one conveyance executed in several parts, one for each party. And this is the better method of the two, since it obviates the necessity of covenants to produce the respective conveyances.

A partition of copyholds should be by surrender and admittance, and thus the lord's consent is had.

It is frequently expedient, from the difficulties and intricacy of settlements, to effect a partition of property by a private Act of Parliament, which operates as a conveyance, and binds persons under disability. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 90, enacts that the appointed valuer upon the written request of any person interested in land to be inclosed in undivided shares, or as a joint tenant, coparcener, or tenant in common, is to make partition of, and allot the same in severalty to the persons interested who are to hold the allotments, subject to the same uses as if the partition had not been made. Such valuer is also to apportion the costs and expenses (s. 91).

In Kent, where the land is of gavelkind tenure, they call these partitions shifting, from the Saxon, shiftan, to divide; herciscere, Lat.

Partition, Writ of, abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Partner, partaker, sharer; one who has part in anything; associate.

Partnership is the result of a contract whereby two or more persons agree to combine property or labor, or both, for the purpose of a common undertaking and the acquisition of a common profit.—Smith's Merc. Law.

Every person except a married woman can contract a partnership. Married women are legally incapable of this contract, and although they are frequently entitled to shares in banking-houses and other mercantile concerns, their husbands in their stead become partners in the concern. An infant-partner is entitled to all the benefits, although not liable for the losses of the partnership, if he avail himself of his minority: but if, on attaining majority, he do not disaffirm the partnership, he is responsible on contracts subsequently made by the firm.

Partnerships are either public or private. Public partnerships are usually denominated companies or societies. They consist of a large number, definite or indefinite, of persons who have joined together to carry on some undertaking. Some of them are incorporated by letters-patent, or by Act of Parliament, while others are unincorporated, as most of the fire and life insurance companies, and are, in fact, ordinary partnerships. They usually, however, divide their capital into shares, each partner holding one or more of them up to a certain restricted number, transferable under certain regulations; the business is intrusted to officers, generally under the superintendence of directors, elected from the general body, for whose acts the whole company is responsible.

The Queen can charter a society, or public company, for the advantage of trade, but not for a total restraint thereof. A royal charter is necessary to enable a company to hold lands, to have a common seal, and to enjoy the other privileges of a corporation. Trading companies sometimes obtain Acts of Parliament which confer exclusive privileges not grantable, according to the principles of the common law, by the Queen's charter. A charter is sometimes procured to limit the risk of the partners, for when societies are incorporated, the members are liable to the extent of their shares only, but when unincorporated, their liability is unlimited.

Public incorporated trading companies are not regulated by the same legal principles as those which govern ordinary partnerships. Thus, the members, as such, are not, as a general rule, subject to the bankrupt laws; nor are they liable in their individual capacities; nor for the debts or engagements of other members; in short, they are only liable in respect of the trade, and contracts carried on and made in the corporate character, to the extent of their respective shares or interests in the joint stock.

Private partnerships are contracted by the mere consent of the parties, no charter or license being necessary. Consent may be expressly testified by articles of copartnership, or positive agreement; or it may be implied from the acts and conduct of the parties, which is equally effective. Persons having a mutual interest in the profits of any business carried on by them, or appearing ostensibly as joint traders, may be treated as partners by the world, whatever may be the nature of the agreement under which they act, or whatever motive or inducement may have prompted them so to act.

It is so essentially necessary that the parties exercise their choice freely and voluntarily, that the joint donees, or joint legatees, of one and the same thing, or those chancing, through other causes, to hold something undivided between them, to be possessed in common, without any mutual agreement, cannot be treated as partners, for they hold not by force of their own free election; nor can the executors and representatives of deceased partners, in their representative characters, be deemed partners; a community of interest, however, exists between them and the surviving partners, until the affairs of the concern are wound up. And one partner cannot introduce a stranger into the concern as a partner without the consent of the rest, although he has a right to charge his own undivided interest to any extent he pleases in favor of such stranger.

A partnership may be limited to a particular transaction or branch of business, without comprehending all the adventures in which any one partner may embark. And where this limitation is distinctly defined, and in the absence of any power, expressed or implied, enabling a part of the firm to bind the whole to the responsibility of any new project, it is not competent for any number of the firm, short of the whole partnership, to embark it in any undertaking not contemplated by the original contract. Each partner has a right to hold his copartners to the specified purposes of their union whilst the partnership continues, and not to rest upon indemnities with respect to what he has not contracted to engage in, and he cannot be compelled to part with his shares, although he might sell them for double what he originally gave for them; his principal reason for keeping them may be that the partnership concern should be carried on according to the contract. The original contract, and the loss which his partners would suffer by a dissolution is his security that it shall be so carried on for him and them beneficially, and with augmented improvement in the value of his and their shares.

Partners, upon their entering into partnership, usually execute articles of agreement by the terms and stipulations of which the concern is regulated, and the rights, duties, and obligations of the partners, inter se, are defined; and such terms, &c., cannot be impeached unless they contravene any rule or principle of law.

In the absence of any express agreement, the partnership is regulated by the contract implied by law from the relation of the parties. And where a partnership is constituted by the mere act of trading jointly, each person so trading, although liable to creditors for the whole amount of the losses, is only responsible, inter se, for his own proportion of them, and each will be considered, as to the profits, as equally interested, unless the contrary appear.

Partners are ordinarily divided as follows: (1) ostensible partners; (2) nominal partners; (3) dormant partners: which see.

At law there are several actions which it is competent to a partner to bring against persons who are jointly engaged with him in trade: account, covenant, assumpsit, and trover are severally adapted to the adjustment of partnership differences. Besides the legal remedies, relief is, in most cases of partnership dissensions, administered in a court of equity.

A dissolution of a partnership may take place,

(1) By the act, or agreement, or consent of the parties, including all cases where the partnership is merely at will, or is for a prescribed period, which expires by efflux of time or otherwise, according to its own limitation, or is voluntarily dissolved by mutual consent within the prescribed or limited period.

(2) By the decree of a court of equity, which may be made on account of

(a) Causes arising subsequently to the formation of the contract, founded upon the alleged misconduct, or fraud, or violation of duty of one partner; or of (b) Causes arising subsequently to the formation of the contract, where no blame, laches, or impropriety of conduct necessarily attaches to any of the partners, as ill health, sudden incapacity, insanity.

(3) By mere operation of law; as (a) By the change of the state or condition of one or more of the partners.

(b) By the transfer of the property of one or more of the partners by his or their own act or by the act of the law.

(c) By the bankruptcy and insolvency of one or more of the partners.

(d) By a public war between the countries of which the partners are respectively subjects.

(e) By the death of one or more of the partners. Consult Collyer, Gow, or Story on 'Partnership,' Smith's Merc. Law. See JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.

Partnership property. It makes no difference whether partnership property, held for the purposes of a trade or business, consists of personal or movable property or of real or immovable property, or of both, so far as the ultimate rights and interests of the partners are concerned. It is true, that at law, real or immovable property is deemed to belong to the person in whose name the title by conveyance stands. If it is in the name of a stranger, or of one partner only, he is deemed the sole owner at law; if it is in the names of all the partners, or of several strangers, they are deemed joint-tenants, or tenants in common, according to the true interpretation of the terms of the conveyance. But, however the title may stand at law, or in whose name or names soever it may be, the real estate of the partnership will in equity be treated as belonging to the partnership, and disposable and distributable in like manner as its personal property, and the parties in whose names it stands as owners of the legal title will be held to be trustees for the partnership, and accountable accordingly to the partners, according to their several shares, rights, and interests in the partnership, as cestuis que trust or beneficiaries of the same. Hence, in equity, in case of the death of one partner, there is no survivorship in the real estate of the partnership, but his share will go to his representatives.—Collyer on Partnership, 82.

Part owners or Quasi-partners [quasi associés, Lat., Fr.], joint-owners, or tenants-in-common, who have a distinct, or at least an independent, although an undivided interest in the property. Neither of them can transfer or dispose of the whole property, or act for the others as partners can in relation thereto; each can merely deal with his own share, and to the extent of his own several right and interest.

Part-owners of ships are tenants-in-common, holding distinct but undivided interests, and each is deemed the agent of the others, as to the ordinary repairs, employment, and business of the ship, in the absence of any known dissent. A majority of the owners in interest can employ the ship, although the minority may dissent, and they may appoint a master, and the dissenting minority will be bound, unless those dealing with the master have had notice of their dissent, or they have protected themselves by proper proceedings in the Court of Admiralty. Story's Agency, 37.

Partridge, a fowl of warren.

Parturition. See DELIVERY.

Partus ex legitimo thoro non certius noscit matrem quam genitorem suum.—Fortescue, 42. (The offspring of a legitimate bed knows not his mother more certainly than his father.)

Partus sequitur ventrem.—2 Bl. Com. 390.—(The offspring follows the dam.)

Party-jury, a jury made up of half foreigners and half natives.

Party-wall, a wall that separates one house from another.

The common use of a wall separating adjoining lands belonging to different owners is primâ facie evidence that the wall and the land on which it stands belong to the owners of those adjoining lands, in equal moieties, as tenants in common. If a house or office be separated from other premises by a wall, and that wall belongs to the owner of the house or office, he is of common right bound to repair it; and an action will lie against him for not doing it. As to the repair of party structures under the Building Act, see Woodf. Land. and Ten. 486, et seq.

Parum differunt quæ re concordant.—2 Bulst. 86.—(Things which agree in substance differ but little.)

Parum est latam esse sententiam nisi mandetur executioni.—Co. Litt. 289.—(It is not enough that sentence be given unless it be carried to execution.)

Parum proficit scire quid fieri debet, si non cognoscas quomodo sit facturum.—2 Inst. 503. (It avails little to know what ought to be done, if you do not know how it is to be done.)

Parvise, an afternoon's exercise or moot for the instruction of young students, bearing the same name originally with the Parvisiæ of Oxford.—Selden's notes on Fortesque, c. li.

Pas, precedence; right of going foremost.

Pasch [fr. pasahh, Heb.], the passover.

Pascha clausum, the octaves of Easter or Low-Sunday, which close that solemnity.

Pascha floridum, the Sunday before Easter, called Palm-Sunday.

Paschal rents, yearly tributes paid by the clergy to the bishop or archdeacon at their Easter visitations.

Pascua, a particular meadow or pasture land set apart to feed cattle.

Pascuage, the grazing or pasturage of cattle.

Pasnage or Pathnage in woods, &c. See PANNAGE.

Passage, a way over water.

Passagio, an ancient writ addressed to the keepers of the ports to permit a man who had the king's leave to pass over sea.—Reg. Orig. 193.

Passagium regis, a voyage or expedition to the Holy Land made by the kings of England in person.—Cowel.

Passator, he who has the interest or command of the passage of a river; or a lord to whom a duty is paid for passage.

Passengers, persons conveyed for hire from one place to another. Passenger-ships are those peculiarly appropriated to the conveyance of passengers. In some respects, passengers by ship may be considered as a portion of the crew. They may be called on by the master or commander of the ship, in case of imminent danger, either from tempest or enemies, to lend their assistance for the general safety; and in the event of their declining, may be punished for disobedience. This principle has been recognised in several cases; but as the authority arises out of the necessity of the case, it must be exercised strictly within the limits of that necessity.—Boyce v. Badcliffe, 1 Camp. 58.

A passenger is not, however, bound to remain on board a ship in the hour of danger, but may quit it if he have an opportunity; and he is not required to take upon himself any responsibility as to the conduct of the ship; if he incur any responsibility, and perform extraordinary services, in relieving a vessel in distress, he is entitled to a corresponding reward. The goods of passengers contribute to general average.—Abbott on Shipping, p. 3, c. x. Amended by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 51.

Passengers' Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 119, and see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 84.

Passenger-ship, or Steamer, as to, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 303–325.

Passiagiarius, a ferry-man.

Passing-ticket, a kind of permit, being a note or check which the toll-clerks on some canals give to the boatmen, specifying the lading for which they have paid toll.

Passive debt, a debt upon which, by agreement between the debtor and creditor, no interest is payable, as distinguished from active debt, i. e. a debt upon which interest is payable. In this sense, the terms active and passive are applied to certain debts due from the Spanish Government.

Passive trust, a trust as to which the trustee has no active duty to perform. Passive uses were resorted to before the Statute of Uses, in order to escape from the trammels and hardships of the common law, the permanent division of property into legal and equitable interests being clearly an invention to lessen the force of some pre-existing law. For similar reasons, equitable interests were after that statute revived under the form of trusts. As such, they continued to flourish, notwithstanding the singular amelioration effected at a later period in the law of tenure, because the legal ownership was attended with some peculiar inconveniences. For, in order to guard against the forfeiture of a legal estate for life, passive trusts, by settlement, were resorted to, and hence, trusts to preserve contingent remainders; and passive trusts were and are created in order to prevent dower.

Where an active trust was created, without defining the quantity of the estate to be taken by the trustee, the courts endeavored to give by construction the quantity originally requisite to satisfy the trust in every event, but if a larger estate was expressly given, the courts could not reject the excess; and, although the estate taken, whether expressly or constructively, might not have exceeded the original scope of the trust, yet, if eventually no estate, or a less estate, were actually wanted, the legal ownership remained wholly or partially vested in the trustee as a merely passive trustee.—1 Hayes's Conv. 103.

Passive use, a permissive use, which see.

Passport, a license for the safe passage of any one from one place to another; a sea-brief, or letter.

The stamp-duty on passports is reduced from 5*s.* to 6*d.* by 21 Vict. c. 24.

Aliens by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 11, are required, on arrival in this country, to exhibit such passports as they have, and make a declaration of the time and place of their landing, their names, the country to which they belong, and the country from which they have come.

Pastitium, pasture land.—Domesday.

Pastor [fr. pasco, Lat., to feed], literally a shepherd, but generally applied to a minister of the Christian religion, who has charge of a congregation, correlatively called his flock.

Pasture, land on which cattle feed.

It is of two sorts: the one is low-meadow-land, which is often overflowed, and the other is upland, which lies high and dry. See COMMON.

Pastus, the procuration or provision which tenants were bound to make for their lords at certain times, or as often as they made a progress to their lands. It was often converted into money.

Patent ambiguity, a doubt that is apparent upon the face of an instrument. See AMBIGUITY.

Patent-letters. See LETTERS-PATENT.

Patent-right, the exclusive privilege granted by the Crown to the first inventor of a new manufacture of making articles according to his invention. See LETTERS-PATENT.

Patent-rolls, registers in which letters-patent are recorded.

Patentee, one who has a patent. The offices of patentee and deputy patentee of the Subpœna office are abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.—Co. Litt. 123.—(He is the father whom the nuptials indicate.)

Pater et mater et puer sunt una caro.—(The father, mother, and son are of one flesh.)

Paterfamilias, one who was sui juris and the head of a family.—Civ. Law; Sand. Just. 38, 107.

Paternity. It becomes a question, when a widow marries immediately after the death of her husband, and she is delivered of a child at the expiration of ten months from the death of the first husband, as to the paternity of the child.

Blackstone and Coke say, that if a man die, and his widow soon after marry again, and a child is born within such a time as that by the course of nature it might have been the child of either husband, in this case he is said to be more than ordinarily legitimate, for he may, when he arrives at years of discretion, choose which of the fathers he pleases. But Hargrave suggests, that the circumstances of the case, instead of the choice of the issue, should determine who is the father.

The Romans forbade a woman to marry until after the expiration of ten months from her husband's decease, which term was prolonged to twelve by Gratian and Valentinian. The French code has adopted the same rule, viz. after ten months. It was also established under the Saxon and Danish governments. It was the law in this country until the Conquest.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. 382.

Patibulary [fr. patibulum, Lat.], belonging to the gallows.

Patibulated, hanged on a gibbet.

Patrem sequitur sua proles.—(His own issue follows the father.)

Patria, the country; the men or jury of a neighbourhood.

Patria dicitur à patre, quia habet communem patrem, qui est pater patriæ.—7 Co. 13.—(Patria (country) is so called from pater, because it has a common parent who is father of the country.)

Patria laboribus et expensis non debet fatigari.—Jenk. Cent. 6.—(A jury ought not to be fatigued by labors and expenses.)

Patria potestas, paternal power.—Civ. Law. For the extent of this great power, see Sand. Just. 110. The modes in which the patria potestas was ended, were: (1) the death of the parent; (2) the parent or son suffering loss of freedom or of citizenship; (3) the son attaining certain dignities; (4) emancipation.

Patriarch, the chief bishop over several countries or provinces, as an archbishop is of several dioceses.—God. 20.

Patricide, one who has killed his father. As to its punishment by the Roman Law, see Sand. Just. 606.

Patricius, a title of the highest honor, conferred on those who enjoyed the chief place in the emperor's esteem.—Civ. Law.

Patrimony, an hereditary estate or right descended from ancestors.

Patrinus, a godfather.

Patritius, an honor conferred on men of the first quality in the time of the English Saxon kings.

Patron, one who has the disposition of an ecclesiastical benefice; also an advocate or defender. See CLIENT.

Patronage, the right of presenting to a benefice.

A disturbance of patronage is a hindrance or obstruction of a patron to present his clerk to a benefice, the remedy for which is the real action of quare impedit.

Patronatus, patronage.

Patronum faciunt dos, ædificatio, fundus.—Dod. Adv. 7.—(Endowment, building, and land make a patron.)

Patruelis, a cousin-german by the father's side; the son or daughter of a father's brother. Civ. Law.

Patruus, an uncle by the father's side, a father's brother.

Patruus magnus, a grandfather's brother, grand-uncle.

Patruus major, a great-grandfather's brother.

Patruus maximus, a great-grandfather's father's brother.

Pauper, a poor man. See POOR-LAWS and IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

Pauper Lunatic Asylums. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 110.

Pavage, money paid towards paving the streets or highways.

Paving Acts, 57 Geo. III. c. 29, commonly called Angelo Taylor's Act; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 34; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50.

Pawn, or Pledge [fr. pignus, Lat.], a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept till the debt is discharged.

A mortgage of goods is in the common law distinguishable from a mere pawn. By a mortgage the whole legal title passes conditionally to the mortgagee; and if the goods be not redeemed at the stipulated time, the title becomes absolute at law, although equity allows a redemption. But in a pledge, a special property only passes to the pledgee, the general property remaining in the pledger. Also, in the case of a pledge, the right of the pledgee is not consummated, except by possession; and, ordinarily, when that possession is relinquished, the right of the pledgee is extinguished or waived. But, in the case of a mortgage of personal property, the right of property passes by the conveyance to the mortgagee, and possession is not or may not be essential to create or support the title.

As to things which may be the subject of pawn. These are, ordinarily, goods and chattels; but money, debts, negotiable instruments, choses in action, and indeed any other valuable thing of a personal nature, such as patent-rights and manuscripts, may by the common law be delivered in pledge. It is not indispensable that the pledge should belong to the pledger; it is sufficient if it is pledged with the consent of the owner. By the pledge of a thing, not only the thing itself is pledged, but also as accessory, the natural increase thereof. If the pledger have only a limited title to the thing, as for life or for years, he may still pawn it to the extent of his title; but when that expires, the pledgee must surrender it to the person who succeeds to the ownership. See 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, and 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, enabling factors, in certain cases, to pledge the goods of their principals.

It is of the essence of the contract that there should be an actual delivery of the thing to the pledgee; for, until delivery, the whole contract is executory, however strong may be the engagement to deliver it, and the pledgee acquires no right of property in it. But there need not be an actual manual delivery, as it is sufficient if there are any of those acts or circumstances, which, in construction of law, are deemed sufficient to pass the possession of property, as the key of a warehouse. As possession is necessary to complete the title, so by the common law, the title determines if the pledgee lose the thing pledged or deliver it back to the pledger unless for a temporary or special purpose.

It is of the essence of the contract that the thing should be delivered as a security for some debt or engagement. It may be delivered as security for a future debt or engagement, as well as for a past debt; for one or for many debts and engagements; upon condition or absolutely; for a limited time or for an indefinite period. It may also be implied from circumstances, as well as arise by express agreement, and it matters not what is the nature of the debt or the engagement. The pledge is understood to be a security for the whole and for every part of the debt or engagement. It is indivisible; individua est pignoris causa.

As to the pledgee or pawnee's rights and duties. The pawnee acquires, in virtue of the pawn, a special property in the thing, and is entitled to the exclusive possession of it, during the time and for the objects for which it is pledged. In regard to the expenses which have been incurred by the pledgee about the pledge, if they are necessary, then the pledger is bound to reimburse them to the pledgee; but if they are merely useful then he is not bound to reimburse them unless incurred by his own express or implied authority. The pledgee has a right to sell the pledge, when the pledger fails to perform his engagement. He may file a bill in equity against the pawner for a foreclosure and sale, or he may proceed to sell ex mero motu, upon giving due notice of his intention to the pledger. If several things be pledged, each is deemed liable for the whole debt or engagement; and the pledgee may proceed to sell them from time to time, until the debt or other claim be completely discharged. The possession of the pawn does not suspend the right to sue for the whole debt or other engagement without selling the pawn, for it is only a collateral security. A pawnee cannot become the purchaser at the sale. A pledgee cannot alienate the property absolutely, nor beyond the title actually possessed by him, unless in special cases. He may deliver the pawn into the hands of a stranger for safe custody, without consideration; or he may sell or assign all his interest in the pawn, or he may convey the same interest conditionally, by way of pawn, to another person, without destroying or invalidating his security.

The following rules elucidate the principles as to the pawnee's title to use the pawn:—

(1) If the pawn is of such a nature that the due preservation of it requires some use, there such use is not only justifiable, but it is indispensable to the faithful discharge of the duty of the pawnee.

(2) If the pawn is of such a nature that it will be worse for the use, such, for instance, as clothes, the use is prohibited to the pawnee.

(3) If the pawn is of such a nature that the keeping is a charge to the pawnee, as a cow or a horse, there the pawnee may milk the cow and use the milk, and ride the horse by way of recompense for the keeping.

(4) If the use will be beneficial to the pawn, or it is indifferent, there it seems that the pawnee may use it.

(5) If the use will be without any injury, and yet the pawn will thereby be exposed to extraordinary perils, there the use is impliedly interdicted.

The pawnee is liable for ordinary neglect in keeping the pawn. He must return the pledge and its increments, if any, after the debt or other duty has been discharged. He must render a due account of all the income, profits and advantages derived by him from the pledge, in all cases where such an account is within the scope of the bailment.

As to the pledger's rights and duties:

If the pledge is conveyed by way of mortgage, so that the legal title passes, unless the pledge is redeemed at the stipulated time, the title of the pledgee becomes absolute at law; and the pledger has only an equitable right to redeem. If, however, it be a mere pledge, as the pledger has never parted with the general title, he may, at law, redeem, notwithstanding he has not strictly complied with the conditions of his contract. If, when the pledger applies to redeem, the pledge has been sold by the pledgee without any proper notice to the former, no tender of the debt due need be made before bringing an action therefor; for the party has incapacitated himself to comply with his contract to return the pawn. Subject to the pledgee's right, the owner has a right to sell or assign his property in the pawn. As the general property of goods pawned remains in the pawner, and the pawnee has a special property only, either may maintain an action against a stranger for any injury done to it, or for any conversion of it. Goods pawned are not liable to be taken in execution in an action against the pawner, at least not unless the bailment is terminated by payment of the debt, or by some other extinguishment of the pawnee's title, except in case of the Crown, and then subject to the pawnee's right. By the act of pawning, the pawner enters into an implied engagement or warranty that he is the owner of the property pawned. The pawner is responsible for all frauds, not only in the title but in the concoction of the contract. The pawner must reimburse to the pawnee all expenses and charges which have been necessarily incurred by the latter in the preservation of the pawn, even though by some subsequent accident these expenses and charges may not have secured any permanent benefit to the pawner.

The contract of pledge is put an end to or extinguished:—

(1) By the full payment of the debt, or the discharge of the other engagements for which the pledge was given;

(2) By the satisfaction of the debt in any other mode, either in fact or by operation of law; as, for instance, by receiving other goods in payment or discharge of the debt;

(3) By taking a higher or different security for the debt, without any agreement that the pledge shall be retained therefor (this is called a novation in the Roman Law);

(4) By extinguishing the debt, which also extinguishes the right of the pledge;

(5) By the debt being barred by prescription;

(6) By the thing perishing;

(7) By any act of the pledgee which amounts to a release or waiver of the pledge.—Story on Bailments, c. v.

Pawnage, or Pannage. See PANNAGE.

Pawnbroker, one who lends money on goods which he receives upon pledge.

By the Pawnbrokers' Act, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 99 (amended by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 98; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 27; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 14; and 23 Vict. c. 21), it is enacted (inter alia), that any person suspecting his goods to have been unlawfully pawned, and satisfying a justice of the peace that there is probable ground for that suspicion, may obtain a warrant for searching the house of the person supposed to have taken them in pawn, and if on such search they shall be found, and the property of the claimant proved he shall be entitled to have them restored. See 1 Jac. I. c. 21.

Pawnee, the person with whom a pawn is deposited. See PAWN.

Pawner, or Pawnor, the person depositing a pawn. See PAWN.

Pax regis, the king's peace or verge of the court.

Payee, one to whom a bill of exchange or promissory note is made payable.

Payment. The payment of money before the day appointed is in law payment at the day; for it cannot, in presumption of law, be any prejudice to him to whom the payment is made to have his money before the time; and it appears, by the party's receipt of it, that it is for his own advantage to receive it then, otherwise he would not do it.—5 Rep. 117.

For payment of rent there are said to be four times:—1st, a voluntary time, that is not satisfactory, and yet good to some purpose: as where a lessee pays his rent before the day, this gives seisin of the rent, and enables him to whom it is paid to bring his assize (now abolished) for it; 2nd, a time voluntary and satisfactory in some cases: when it is paid the morning of the last day, and the lessor dies before the end of the day, this is a good payment to bind the heir or executor, but not the Crown; 3rd, the legal, absolute, and satisfactory time, which is a convenient time before the last instant of the last day, and then it must be paid; 4th, satisfactory and not voluntary, but coercive when forced, and recovered by suit at law.—Co. Litt. 200.

Payment of money into court. When a person is satisfied that he is indebted to another, upon a claim for a sum certain, or capable of being ascertained by mere computation, but disputes the amount claimed of him, then, before action brought, he may tender to his creditor the sum which he admits he owes, and then plead the tender in bar of the action. Or, after action brought, the defendant may, even though the claim be for an unliquidated amount, apply to a judge to stay the proceedings, upon payment of the sum which he admits to be recoverable, and for a rule to show cause why, upon default of plaintiff's accepting it, he should not pay to defendant the costs subsequent to the application, if the plaintiff afterwards accept that sum in satisfaction. Or, after action brought, and after, or in some cases before, the declaration, he may pay that sum into court and plead the payment of it, and let the plaintiff afterwards proceed in the action at his peril.

By the C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 70, it shall be lawful for the defendant in all actions (except for assault and battery, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious arrest or prosecution, or debauching of the plaintiff's daughter or servant), and, by leave of the court or a judge, upon such terms as they or he may think fit, for one or more of several defendants to pay into court a sum of money by way of compensation or amends.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, enables money to be paid into court in actions of libel. See LIBEL.

In actions against mail-coach contractors, stage-coach proprietors, or common carriers, for the loss of or injury to goods, the defendants may pay money into court, as of course.—1 Wm. IV. c. 68; and so under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, with leave of a judge or the court.—R. 7, 31st January, 1855.

In actions against justices of the peace, or against officers of the excise or customs, for any thing done by them in the execution of their respective offices, if they have not made a tender, or if they conceive the amends tendered to be insufficient, they may pay into court such sum of money as they shall think fit.

If there be two or more counts in a declaration, the defendant may pay money into court upon one of them, and plead it as in other cases. Where there are several counts for several causes of action, or several breaches are assigned in covenant, the defendant may plead payment into court of one entire sum, in satisfaction of all the counts or breaches. If a defendant find that he has not paid in a sufficient sum, he will generally be allowed to amend his plea and pay in a further sum, on payment of costs and other reasonable terms.

No rule or judge's order to pay money into court shall be necessary, except in the case of one or more of several defendants, but the money shall be paid to the proper officer of each court, who shall give a receipt for the amount in the margin of the plea, and the said sum shall be paid out to the plaintiff or to his attorney, upon a written authority from the plaintiff, on demand.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 72.

When money is paid into court, such payment shall be pleaded in all cases, as near as may be, in the form given by the act, mutatis mutandis (s. 71).

The plaintiff after the delivery of a plea of payment of money into court, shall be at liberty to reply to the same by accepting the sum so paid into court in full satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action in respect of which it has been paid in, and he shall be at liberty in that case to tax his costs of suit, and in case of non-payment thereof in forty-eight hours, to sign judgment for his costs of suit so taxed; or the plaintiff may reply that the sum paid into court is not enough to satisfy the claim of the plaintiff in respect of the matter to which the plea is pleaded; and, in the event of an issue thereon being found for the defendant, the defendant shall be entitled to judgment and his costs of suit (s. 73).

No affidavit shall be necessary to verify the plaintiff's signature to the written authority to his attorney to take money out of court, unless specially required by the master.—R. 11, H. T. 1853.

When money is paid into court in respect of any particular sum or cause of action in the declaration, and the plaintiff accepts the same in satisfaction, the plaintiff, when the costs of the cause of action are taxed, shall be entitled to the costs of the cause in respect of that part of his claim so satisfied, up to the time the money is so paid in and taken out, whatever may be the result of any issue or issues in respect of other causes of action; and if the defendant succeeds in defeating the residue of the claim, he will be entitled to the costs of the cause in respect of such defence, commencing at 'Instructions for Plea,' and not before.—R. 12.

When money is paid into court in several actions which are consolidated, and the plaintiff, without taxing costs, proceeds to trial on one and fails, he shall be entitled to costs on the others up to the time of paying money into court.—R. 13.

By paying money into court on the whole of a special declaration, or on a special count, the defendant impliedly admits the contract so declared on, and all the breaches on which it is paid in, and the only remaining question to be determined is the amount of the damages. The money can never be taken out of court by the defendant or his representatives.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1351, et seq.

Peace, a quiet behaviour towards the queen and her subjects.

It is one of the prerogatives of the Crown to make war and peace.

Peace, Bill of. This equitable remedy seeks repose from perpetual and useless litigation, and protection from a multiplicity of suits, either by establishing and perpetuating a right which the plaintiff claims, and which, from its nature, may be controverted by different persons at different times and by different actions; or where separate attempts have already been unsuccessfully made to overthrow the same right, and justice requires that the plaintiff should be quieted in the right if it is already sufficiently established, or if it should be sufficiently established under the direction of the court.

This bill is usually filed where there is one general right to be established against a great number of persons; or where one person claims or defends a right against many; or where many claim or defend a right against one. Thus it is filed by a parson for tithes against his parishioners; by parishioners against a parson to establish a modus; by a lord of a manor against the tenants for an encroachment under color of a common right; or by the tenants against the lord for disturbance of a common right; by a party interested to establish a toll due by custom; for a right to the profits of a fair, there being several claimants; by a lord to establish an inclosure which he has approved under the statute of Merton (20 Hen. III. A.D. 1236), and which his tenants throw down, although sufficient common of pasture is left. Another class of cases to which this bill is now applicable is, where the plaintiff has, after repeated and satisfactory trials, established his right at law, and yet is in danger of further litigation and obstruction to his right from new attempts to controvert it. Under such circumstances courts of equity will interfere and grant a perpetual injunction to quiet the possession of the plaintiff, and to suppress future fruitless litigation.

This bill should not merely pray special relief, as that the plaintiff may be quieted in the possession till the right is tried at law, but should also pray relief in the premises, or a perpetual injunction.—Sto. Eq. Jur. c. xxii.; and 1 Madd. Ch. 231.

Peace, Breach of the, a violation of that quiet, peace and security which is guaranteed by the laws for the personal comfort of the subjects of this kingdom.

Peace, Clerk of the, an officer who acts as clerk to the court of quarter sessions, and records all their proceedings.—7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 83. As to their remuneration, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 9, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, s. 18.

Peace, Commission of the, a special commission under the Great Seal, appointing justices of the peace. It is one of the authorities, by virtue of which the judges sit upon circuit.—3 Bl. Com. 60. See ASSIZE and JUSTICES.

Peace of God and the Church [pax Dei et ecclesiæ, Lat.], that cessation which the king's subjects had from trouble and suit of law between the terms, and on Sundays and holidays.

Peace, Justices of. See JUSTICES.

Peace of the Queen [pax reginæ, Lat.], that security for life and goods which the Queen promises to all her subjects, or others taken into her protection.

Peccata contra naturam sunt gravissima.—3 Inst. 20.—(Crimes against nature are the most heinous.)

Peccatum peccato addit qui culpæ quam facit patrocinia defensionis adjungit.—5 Co. 49.—(He adds fault to fault who sets up a defence of a wrong committed by him.)

Pecia, a piece or small quantity of ground.—Paroch. Antiq. 240.

Peck, a measure of two gallons. Dry measure.

Peculator, a robber of the public.

Peculatus, embezzling public money.

Peculiar, a particular parish or church that has jurisdiction within itself, and exemption from that of the ordinary. There are several sorts:—

(1) Royal peculiars, which are the sovereign's free chapels, and are exempt from any jurisdiction but that of the sovereign.

(2) Peculiars of the archbishops, exclusive of the bishops and archdeacons, which arose from a privilege they had to enjoy jurisdiction in such places where their seats and possessions were.

(3) Peculiars of bishops, exclusive of the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese in which they are situate.

(4) Peculiars of bishops in their own dioceses, exclusive of archidiaconal jurisdiction.

(5) Peculiars of deans, deans and chapters, prebendaries, and the like, which are places wherein, by ancient compositions, the bishops have parted with their jurisdiction as ordinaries to these corporations.

Peculiars, Court of, a branch of, and annexed to the Court of Arches. It has a jurisdiction over all those parishes dispersed through the province of Canterbury in the midst of other dioceses, which are exempt from the ordinary's jurisdiction, and subject to the metropolitan only. All ecclesiastical causes arising within these peculiar or exempt jurisdictions are originally cognizable in this court, from which an appeal lies to the Court of Arches.—3 Step. Com. 441.

Peculium, the savings of a son or slave accumulated with the father or master's consent.—Civ. Law.

Pecunia [fr. pecus, Lat., cattle], properly money, but anciently cattle, and sometimes other goods as well as money.

Pecunia dicitur à pecus, omnes enim veterum divitiæ in animalibus consistebant.—Co. Litt. 207.—(Money (pecunia) is so called from cattle (pecus), because all the wealth of our ancestors consisted in cattle.)

Pecunia sepulchralis, money anciently paid to the priest at the opening of a grave, for the good of the deceased's soul. See MORTUARY.

Pecuniary, relating to money.

Pecuniary causes, such as arise either from the withholding of ecclesiastical dues, or the doing or neglecting to do some act relating to the church whereby damage accrues to the plaintiff, to obtain satisfaction for which he is permitted to institute a suit in the spiritual court.

Pecuniary legacy, a testamentary gift of money.

Pedage, money given for the passing of foot or horse through any country.—Spelm.

Pedigree [fr. per and degré, Fr.—Skinner], genealogy; lineage; account of descent.

Pedis abscissio, cutting off a foot; a punishment anciently inflicted instead of death.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xxxviii.

Pedis possessio, an actual possession or foothold.

Pedones, foot soldiers.

Peer, an equal; one of the same rank.

Peerage, the dignity of the lords, or peers of the realm. See LIFE PEERAGE.

Peeress. Women may acquire peerages by creation, descent, or marriage.

The 20 Hen. VI. c. 9, declares that peeresses, either in their own right or by marriage, shall be tried before the same judicature as peers of the realm. This statute is said to be remarkable, as being the only instance of a legislative explanation of any part of Magna Charta.

If a woman, noble in her own right, marry a commoner, she still remains noble, and shall be tried by her peers; but if she be only noble by marriage, then, by a second marriage with a commoner she loses her dignity: for as by marriage it is gained, so by marriage it is also lost. Yet, if a duchess-dowager marry a baron, she continues a duchess still: for all the nobility are pares, and therefore it is no degradation. A woman, noble in her own right, or by a first marriage, marrying a commoner, communicates no rank or title to her husband.—1 Inst. 326.

Peers of fees, vassals or tenants of the same lord, who were obliged to serve and attend him in his courts, being equal in function; these were termed peers of fees, because holding fees of the lord, or because their business in court was to sit and judge, under their lords, of disputes arising upon fees; but if there were too many in one lordship, the lord usually chose twelve, who had the title of peers, by way of distinction; whence, it is said, we derive our common juries and other peers.—Cowel.

Peers of the realm [proceres, Lat.], the nobility of the kingdom and lords of Parliament, who are divided into dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons. They are called peers, because, although there is a distinction of dignity among them, they are equal in all public actions, as in their votes of Parliament, and trial of any nobleman.—Selden's Titles of Honor.

Peers are created either by writ or by patent. The claim by prescription is founded upon the presumption that an ancestor of the claimant was created a peer by writ or patent, which has been lost. The creation by writ, or the Queen's letter, is a summons to attend the House of Lords, by the style and title of that barony which the Queen is pleased to confer. That by patent is a royal grant to a subject of any dignity or degree of peerage. The creation by writ is the more ancient way, but a man is not ennobled thereby, unless he actually take his seat in the House of Lords; and some are of opinion, that there must be at least two writs of summons and a sitting in two distinct Parliaments to evidence an hereditary barony; and therefore the most usual, because the surest way, is to grant the dignity by patent, which enures to a man and his descendants, according to the limitations thereof, though he never himself make use of it. The eldest son of a peer is frequently called up to the House of Lords by writ of summons, in the name of his father's barony, because in that case there is no danger of his children losing the nobility in case he never takes his seat, for they will succeed to their grandfather.

In cases of treason and felony, a nobleman is tried by his peers, but in mere misdemeanors he is tried, like a commoner, by jury. He cannot be arrested in civil cases, but he is not exempted from arrest in criminal matters. A peer loses his nobility by death or attainder.—1 Bl. Com. 227.

Peine forte et dure (the strong and hard pain), [peine (or penarce), probably a corrupted abbreviation of prisonæ.—3 Bl. Com. 325], a punishment, now happily abolished, by which a prisoner indicted for felony was compelled to put himself upon his trial. If, when arraigned, he stood mute, he was remanded to prison, and placed in a low dark chamber, and there laid on his back on the bare floor naked, unless where decency forbade; upon his body was placed as great a weight of iron as he could bear; on the first day he received no sustenance, save three morsels of the worst bread, and on the second day three draughts of standing water that should be nearest to the prison-door, and such was alternately his daily diet till he died or answered.—3 Bl. Com. 327; 2 Reeves, c. ix., p. 134.

Pela, a peal, pile, or fort.

Peles, issues arising from or out of a thing.

Pelfe and Pelfre, booty; also the personal effects of a felon convict.

Peliparius, a leatherseller or skinner.

Pellage, the custom or duty paid for skins of leather.

Pellicia, a pilch or surplice.—Spelm.

Pellota, the ball of a foot.

Pells, Clerk of the, an officer in the Exchequer, who enters every seller's bill on the parchment-rolls, the roll of receipts, and the roll of disbursements.

Pelt-wool, the wool pulled off the skin or pelt of dead sheep.

Pembrokeshire, originally a county palatine, but dispalatinated in the reign of Henry VIII.

Pen, a high mountain.

Penal laws, those laws which prohibit an act, and impose a penalty for the commission of it. They are of three kinds: pœna pecuniaria, pœna corporalis, and pœna exilii.—2 Cro. Jac. 415.

Penal servitude, a punishment which has superseded transportation. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 92, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3.

Penal statutes, those which impose penalties or punishments for an offence committed. As to the Crown's power of remitting these penalties, see 22 Vict. c. 32.

Penal statutes, Actions on. The penalties or forfeitures under these statutes are generally made recoverable by the Crown, or the party aggrieved, or a common informer, as the case may be.

This remedy is generally designated a penal action; or where one part of the forfeiture is given to the Crown and the other part to the informer, a popular or qui tam action.

Penalty, where a certain gross sum of money is reserved on an agreement to be paid in case of the non-performance of such agreement, it is generally to be considered as a penalty, the legal operation of which is, not to create a forfeiture of that entire sum, but only to cover the actual damages occasioned by the breach of contract. Wherever the payment of a small sum is secured by the payment of a much larger sum, it must be considered as a penalty, and calling a sum liquidated damages will not change its character as a penalty, if upon the true construction of the instrument, it must be deemed to be a penalty.

A general principle adopted in equity is, that wherever a penalty is inserted merely to secure the performance or enjoyment of a collateral object, the latter is considered as the principal intent of the instrument, and the penalty is deemed only as accessory; and therefore, as intended only to secure the due performance thereof, or the damage really incurred by the non-performance. In every such case, the true test by which to ascertain whether relief can or cannot be had in equity, is to consider whether compensation can be made or not. If it cannot be made, then the courts of equity will not interfere; if it can be made, then, if the penalty is to secure the mere payment of money, courts of equity will relieve the party upon paying the principal and interest. If it is to secure the performance of some collateral act or undertaking, then courts of equity will retain the bill, and will direct an issue quantum damnificatus; and when the amount of damages is ascertained by a jury upon the trial of such an issue, they will grant relief upon the payment of such damages. But see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27.

Courts of equity will not interfere in cases of liquidated damages, but will deem the parties entitled to fix their own measure of damages.

Courts of equity will decree to the obligee of a bond interest beyond the penalty, wherever the obligor has unreasonably deprived him of his power to enforce it until it is no longer adequate to secure his rights.—2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 497. See LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

Penance [fr. pœnitentia, Lat.], an ecclesiastical punishment used in the discipline of the church, which affects the body of the penitent, by which he is obliged to give a public satisfaction to the church for the scandal he has given by his evil example. So in the primitive times, he was to give testimony of his reformation before he was re-admitted into the Christian society. In the case of incontinence, the offender is usually enjoined to do a public penance in the parish church, bareheaded and barefooted, in a white sheet, and to make open profession of his crime in a prescribed form of words, which is augmented or moderated according to the quality of the offence and the discretion of the judge. So in smaller faults and scandals, a public satisfaction or penance, as the judge shall decree, is to be made before the minister, churchwardens, or some of the parishioners, respect being had to the quality of the offence and circumstances of the fact; as in case of defamation or laying violent hands on a clerk, or the like. And as these censures may be moderated by the judge's discretion, according to the nature of the offence, so also they may be totally altered by a commutation of penance; and this has been the ancient privilege of the ecclesiastical judge to admit that an oblation of a sum of money for pious uses shall be accepted in satisfaction of public penance. But penance must be first enjoined before there can be a commutation; or otherwise it is a commutation for nothing.—Godolph. Repert. Canon, app. 18.

Pendente lite (during litigation).

Administration pendente lite is sometimes granted when a suit is commenced in the Probate Court touching the validity of a will.

An injunction will be granted to restrain a party from making vexatious alienations of real property pendente lite.

Pendente lite, Alimony. See ALIMONY.

Pendente lite nihil innovetur.—Co. Litt. 344. (During a litigation nothing new should be introduced.)

Pendentes, ungathered fruits.—Civ. Law.

Penerarius, an ensign-bearer.

Penitentiary-houses, prisons where criminals are confined to hard labor.—19 Geo. III. c. 74.

Pennyweight, twenty-four grains.

Penon, a standard, banner, or ensign carried in war.

Pensam, the full weight of twelve ounces.

Pension, an allowance made to anyone without an equivalent. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2.

The duty upon offices and pensions is a branch of the Crown's extraordinary revenue. It consists in an annual payment (over and above all other duties) out of all salaries, fees, and perquisites of offices and pensions, payable by the Crown, exceeding the value of 100*l.* per annum.—31 Geo. II. c. 22; 49 Geo. III. c. 29; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2; and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 94.

By 6 Anne, c. 7, and 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 56, no person having a pension under the Crown during pleasure, or for any term of years, is capable of being elected or sitting in the House of Commons. But see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 5.

Taking a pension from any foreign prince, without the consent of the Crown, is an offence against the government, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Pension of churches, certain sums of money paid to clergymen in lieu of tithes.

A spiritual person may sue in the spiritual court for a pension originally granted and confirmed by the ordinary; but where it is granted by a temporal person to a clerk, he cannot; as if one grant an annuity to a parson, he must sue for it in the temporal courts.—Cro. Eliz. 675.

Pension of the Inns of Court, an annual payment made by each member to the houses. Also, that which in the two Temples is called a parliament, and in Lincoln's Inn a council, is, in Gray's Inn, termed a pension, being an assembly of the members, usually to consult upon the affairs of the society.

Pensioner, one who is supported by an allowance at the will of another; a dependant; he who receives an annuity from government without filling any office.

Also, a band of gentlemen who attend as a guard on the royal person. It was instituted A.D. 1539; each gentleman has an allowance of 150*l. per annum*, and two horses. This band is inow called the Honorable Body of Gentlemen-at-Arms.

Pension-writ, a process issued against a member of an inn of court, when he is in arrear for pensions, commons, or other duties, &c.

Pentecostals, pious oblations made at the feast of Pentecost by parishioners to their priests; and sometimes by inferior churches or parishes to the principal mother-church. They are also called Whitsun-farthings.

Pentonville Prison, a place which is provided for the confinement of male convicts under sentence or order of penal servitude, until they shall be otherwise disposed of. It is under the superintendence of 'The Directors of Convict Prisons;' and power is conferred on them to hold meetings, and make rules subject to the approbation of a principal secretary of state, and with the like approbation to appoint officers, consisting of a governor, chaplain, medical officer, and such others as may be found necessary. The directors must, from time to time, appoint one or more of themselves to visit the prison during the interval between their meetings, and, if they think fit, may delegate power to such visitors to make orders in cases of pressing emergency. They must make annual reports to the Secretary of State as to all matters relating to the prison, its discipline and management, which reports are laid before Parliament.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 29; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, s. 6; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 3.

Peon, a footman, a soldier, an inferior officer, a servant employed in the business of the revenue, police, or judicature.—Indian.

People [peuple, Fr.; popolo, It.; pueblo, Sp.; fr. populus, Lat.], the many, the multitude, the inhabitants of a nation, state, town, &c.; the commonalty or common folk, as distinguished from the higher classes; men; individuals.—Richard. Dict.

Per and Post. To come in the per is to claim by or through the person last entitled to an estate as the heirs or assigns of the grantee; to come in in the post is to claim by a paramount and prior title, as the lord by escheat.

Perambulation, a travelling through or over.

Perambulation of parishes is to be made by the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners, by going round them once a-year, in or about Ascension week; and the parishioners may well justify going over any man's land in their perambulation, according to usage, and it is said may abate all nuisances in their way.—Cro. Eliz. 441. Manors are also perambulated. Wheat. Com. Pr. 234.

Perambulatione faciendâ, a writ which lay where any encroachments had been made by a neighbouring lord, &c. to the sheriff to perambulate or settle the bounds. Equity grants commissions to perambulate.

Actions upon writs of perambulation were authorized in Scotland, by the Act 1597, c. 79, to settle the bounds of disputed properties adjoining each other.

Perangaria. See ANGARIA.

Perca, a perch of land, 16½ feet.

Per capita (through one's own right).

Percaptura, a place in a river properly banked for the better preserving and taking of fish.

Perch, a measure of land, consisting of five yards and a half of the standard measure.—5 Geo. IV. c. 74.

Per, Cui, and Post, writs of entry, which are abolished.

Perdings, men of no substance.

Perdonatio utlagariæ, a pardon for a man who, for contempt in not yielding obedience to the process of a court, is outlawed, and afterwards of his own accord surrenders.—Reg. Orig. 28.

Perduellio, treason.—Civ. Law.

Pereat unus ne pereant omnes.—(Let one perish lest all perish.)

Peregrini, foreigners commorant or sojourning in Rome.—Civ. Law.

Peremption, a nonsuit, also a quashing or killing.

Peremptory [fr. perimo, Lat., to cut off], final and determinate.

Peremptory challenge, an arbitrary species of challenge to a certain number of jurors, without showing any cause.

This privilege is granted to a prisoner in criminal cases, but denied to the Crown by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50. In treason a prisoner can challenge without cause thirty-five jurors, and in felony twenty.—7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 3.

Peremptory day, a precise time when certain business by rule of court ought to be spoken to; but if it cannot be spoken to, then the court, at the prayer of the party concerned, will give a further day without prejudice to him.

Peremptory mandamus, a second mandamus, which issues where the return which has been made to the first writ is found either insufficient in law or false in fact. To this writ no other return will be admitted but a certificate of perfect obedience and due execution. See MANDAMUS.

Peremptory order for time to plead. A further time to plead is after such an order usually refused. But see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 250.

Peremptory pleas, or Pleas in bar, those which are founded on some matter tending to impeach the right of action.

Peremptory rule. Formerly a defendant, if he wished a plaintiff to declare, obtained from one of the masters, upon counsel's signature, a peremptory rule to declare within a certain time, which rule was absolute in the first instance. It prevented a plaintiff from taking out more rules for time to declare. If the plaintiff did not declare within the time so limited, the defendant might, after a four-day written demand of declaration, have signed judgment of non pros.—R. H. 2 Wm. IV. c. 39. This is abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 53, and a four-day notice substituted.

Peremptory undertaking. The court, as a matter of indulgence, will, in some cases, set aside a judgment for not proceeding to trial, upon payment of costs, and a peremptory undertaking to try at the next sittings or assizes, especially where the plaintiff has been delayed on account of his witnesses, or the like.

Peremptory writ, a class of original writs.

Perfect trust, an executed trust. See EXECUTED TRUST.

Perfectum est cui nihil deest secundum suæ perfectionis vel naturæ modum.—Hob. 151.—(That is perfect which wants nothing, according to the measure of its perfection or nature.)

Periculosum est res novas inusitatas inducere. Co. Litt. 379.—(It is dangerous to introduce new and unusual things.)

Periculosum existimo quod bonorum virorum non comprobatur exemplo.—9 Co. 97.—(I think that dangerous which is not warranted by the example of good men.)

Periculum rei venditæ, nondum traditæ est emptoris.—(The risk of a thing sold, and not yet delivered, is the purchaser's.)

Perils of the Sea. They are strictly the natural accidents peculiar to the water, but the law has extended this phrase to comprehend events not attributable to natural causes, as captures by pirates, and losses by collision, where no blame is attachable to either ship, or at all events to the injured ship. The word peril, like periculum, Lat., from which it is derived, is in itself ambiguous, and sometimes denotes the risk of inevitable mischance, and sometimes the danger arising from the want of due circumspection.—Jones on Bailments, 98.

Perinde valere, a dispensation granted to a clerk, who, being defective in capacity for a benefice or other ecclesiastical function, is de facto admitted to it.—Gibs. 87.

Perindinare, to stay, remain, or abide in a place.

Periphrasis, circumlocution; use of many words to express the sense of one.

Perjuri sunt qui servatis verbis juramenti decipiunt aures eorum qui accipiunt.—3 Inst. 166.—(They are perjured, who, preserving the words of an oath, deceive the ears of those who receive it.)

Perjury, an offence against public justice, being a crime committed when a lawful oath is administered by any that has authority, to any person in any judicial proceeding, who swears absolutely and falsely in a matter material to the issue and cause in question; also a false oath taken in certain cases, although not in judicial proceedings, is deemed to amount to perjury, and is visited by the same penalties.

A mere voluntary oath, that is, an oath administered in a case for which the law has not provided, is not one on which perjury can be assigned; for as such a proceeding is not required, so neither is it protected by the law. But voluntary oaths are now prohibited by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 62, which provides that a certain form of declaration may be substituted for them, and that any party falsely making such declaration shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

It is necessary, in order to constitute the offence of perjury:—

(1) That the false oath be taken wilfully, i. e. with some degree of deliberation, and malo animo. It must also be positive and absolute, not merely owing to surprise or inadvertency, or a mistake of the true state of the question.

(2) The oath must be taken either in a judicial proceeding, or in some other public proceeding of the like nature, except in certain cases expressly provided for by statute.

(3) It must be taken before persons lawfully authorized to administer it.

(4) It must be taken by a person sworn to depose the truth.

(6) It must be taken absolutely and directly, therefore if a man only swears as he thinks, remembers, or believes, he is not guilty of perjury; but, if he swears that he believes a fact to be true, which he knows to be false, he is guilty of perjury.

(7) The thing sworn ought to be in some way material, for if it be wholly foreign to the purpose or immaterial, and neither pertinent to the matter in question nor tending to aggravate or extenuate the damages, nor likely to induce the jury to give credit to the substantial part of the evidence, it cannot amount to perjury, because it is wholly insignificant.

(8) It is not material whether the false oath were credited or not, or whether the party in whose prejudice it was taken was in the event damaged by it, for the prosecution is not grounded on the damage to the party, but on the abuse of public justice.

Subornation of perjury is the offence of procuring another to take such a false oath as constitutes perjury in the principal.

In prosecutions for perjury there can be no conviction except on the oath of two witnesses, though it will be sufficient that the perjury be directly proved by one witness, and corroborative evidence on some particular point be given by another; and where the alleged perjury consists in the defendant's having contradicted what he himself swore on a former occasion, the testimony of a single witness in support of the defendant's own original statement will support a conviction. By 23 Geo. II. c. 11, any judge of assize, while the court is sitting, or within twenty-four hours after, is empowered to direct a witness to be prosecuted for perjury; and it is provided that in an indictment for perjury or subornation, it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9.

Perjury and subornation of perjury are both misdemeanors, and their punishment at common law is by fine and imprisonment. But the following statutes have enacted additional punishments. By 5 Eliz. c. 9 (made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 5, s. 2, and 21 Jac. I. c. 28, s. 8), the offender, if indicted for perjury, may be imprisoned for six months and fined 20*l.*, and if indicted for subornation may be fined 40*l.*, and in default of payment imprisoned for six months. By 2 Geo. II. c. 25, s. 2, he may be sent to the house of correction with hard labor for seven years; or be sentenced to penal servitude for not more than seven, nor less than three years (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3). And by 3 Geo. IV. c. 114, the offender may be sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor, for any term for which he may be lawfully imprisoned, either in addition to or in lieu of any other punishment.

The following statutes relate to perjury in particular cases: government annuities, 48 Geo. III. c. 142, ss. 4, 26; 52 Geo. III. c. 129, ss. 2, 7; exchequer bills, 51 Geo. III. c. 15, ss. 9, 10; stamps, 55 Geo. III. c. 184, ss. 52, 53; customs, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 51, ss. 28, 29; excise, 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, ss. 29, 30, 31; naval stores, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 89, s. 36; quarantine, 6 Geo. IV. c. 78, s. 29; pilotage, 6 Geo. IV. c. 125, s. 80; vessels carrying passengers, 43 Geo. III. c. 56, s. 20; bankrupts, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 254; insolvents, 7 Geo. IV. c. 57, s. 71; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 100; registry acts, 2 & 3 Anne, c. 4, ss. 18, 19; inclosure act, 41 Geo. III. c. 109, s. 43; elections, 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 58; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 34; 26 Vict. c. 29, s. 7; naval and military pay, &c., 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 20, ss. 85, 86; 7 Geo. IV. c. 78, s. 29; slave trade, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 42, s. 7; oaths sworn abroad, 6 Geo. IV. c. 87; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 42; Court of Probate, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 27; and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, s. 34; Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 50; and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, s. 23; parliamentary committee, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 78, s. 3.

By the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, s. 1, no indictment for perjury, subornation of perjury, &c., is to be presented to or found by any grand jury, unless the person presenting it has been bound by recognizance to prosecute or give evidence against the accused, or unless the accused has been committed to or detained in custody, or bound by recognizance to appear and answer to the indictment, or unless the indictment be preferred by the direction or with the consent, in writing, of a judge of one of the superior courts, or of the attorney or solicitor-general, or by the direction of any court, judge, or public functionary authorized by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, so to direct.

If perjury be committed in a spiritual cause, the spiritual judge has authority to inflict canonical punishment, and prohibition will not go. But the judge cannot punish pro salute animæ; and the party grieved by such perjury must recover his damages at the common law.

In Scotland the punishment of perjury is directed by statute, the last of which, 1555, c. 47, declares perjury to be punishable by confiscation of movables, piercing the tongue, and infamy; to which the judge, in aggravated cases, may add any other penalty that the case seems to require. By the same act, subornation of perjury is punishable as perjury. See Rosc. Crim. Evid.

Perkins, the author of the profitable book on the learning of conveyancing; as valuable a performance as any, perhaps, of the reign of Henry VIII. This was first printed in 1532, with the following title: 'Incipit perutilis Tractatus Magistri Jo. Perkins Interioris Templi Socii, &c.' This book is in French.—4 Reeves, c. xxx., p. 120.

Permanent Building Society, a building society without limit as to the time within which the object for which it was formed is to be accomplished. Building societies were originally formed on what is called the terminating system, i. e. the members composing them made periodical payments, so as to insure the realisation within a given period of the shares of each of the members, and at the expiration of such period, the object of the society having been attained, it ceased to exist. In a terminating society, a member who joins it after its formation, in addition to payments falling due subsequently, is obliged to pay an amount equal to that which has been previously paid by each original member. In permanent societies an investor or borrower is able to enter at any time without any extra payment, and with the same advantages as original members. The most striking advantage of a permanent society over a terminating one, that which doubtless first gave rise to the change, is the total absence of any difficulty respecting the 'back payments.' Another important advantage which permanent societies possess is, that there is much less need in them to have the investors and borrowers at all times as nearly as possible balanced in amount, and the ballot rule is less likely to come into operation. Another advantage is, that investors and borrowers know the exact periods for which their subscriptions are to be paid; and investors may withdraw from time to time, with less probability of injury to the society; because the calculations on which it is founded are less likely to be interfered with. Then, again, the borrower has the privilege of choosing the period over which he will spread his repayments, or subscriptions; —either five, seven, ten, twelve, or fourteen years. He can, therefore, make his arrangements with much greater precision, according to his anticipated income, and various other circumstances, of which he alone can form a correct judgment. The Permanent Societies may adopt the system of borrowing money to lend again to their members to much greater advantage than those which are not permanent. A Permanent Society, as it grows older, year by year, will create increased confidence, if it be founded on correct and safe principles, and every year its members of both classes will be likely to increase.—Stone's Build. Soc. 14. See TERMINATING BUILDING SOCIETIES.

Permissions, negations of law, arising either from the law's silence, or its express declaration.—Ruth. Nat. Law, b. 1, c. i.

Permissive use, a passive use which was resorted to before the Statute of Uses, in order to avoid a harsh law, as that of mortmain or a feudal forfeiture; it was a mere invention in order to evade the law by secrecy, as a conveyance to A. to the use of B. A. simply held the possession, and B. enjoyed the profits of the estate.

Permissive waste, the neglect of necessary repairs. See Woodfall's Land. & Ten. 481.

Permit, a license or instrument granted by the officers of excise, certifying that the excise duties on certain goods have been paid, and permitting their removal from some specified place to another. The acts relative to permits were consolidated by the 2 Wm. IV. c. 16.

The commissioners of excise provide moulds or frames for making the paper used in the printing of permits, which has the water-mark, 'Excise Office,' visible in its substance; and the counterfeiting of such frames or paper, or the possession of the latter without being able satisfactorily to account for it, are felonies, punishable by transportation. Permits are not delivered except on the receipt of 'request-notes' specifying the places from and to which the goods are to be conveyed. A penalty of 500*l.* is imposed on all persons counterfeiting 'request-notes,' or fraudulently procuring or misapplying permits; and all goods for the removal of which permits are necessary, if they be removed without them, are to be forfeited, and the various parties engaged in their removal are each to be amerced in a penalty of 200*l.* It is needless to dwell on the extreme inconvenience that would result from such regulations were permits in extensive use. But such is not the case; and they are not wholly dispensed with, except in the case of a very few articles.—McCull. Comm. Dict. See CUSTOMS.

Permutatione, &c., a writ to an ordinary, commanding him to admit a clerk to a benefice upon exchange made with another.—Reg. Orig. 307.

Permutation or Barter, the exchange of one movable subject for another.

Per my et per tout (by the half and the whole).

Pernancy [fr. prendre, Fr., to take], the taking or receiving of anything.

Pernor, he who receives the profits of lands, &c.

Per pais (by the country, i. e. a jury).

Perpars, a part of the inheritance.

Perpetua lex est, nullam legem humanam ac positivam perpetuam esse; et clausula quæ abrogationem excludit, ab initio non valet.—Bacon. (It is an everlasting law, that no positive and human law shall be perpetual; and a clause which excludes abrogation is not good from its commencement.)

Perpetual curate, a minister in holy orders, who is charged with the permanent care of a parochial church, which, although an appropriation, has no endowed vicar. He is entitled to emolument for his services.

By 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 38, churches or chapels built and endowed by particular individuals, shall have districts assigned to them, and be deemed perpetual curacies, and the right of nomination thereto shall be vested in the person so building and endowing.

Perpetuating testimony. When evidence is likely to be irrecoverably lost, by reason of a witness being old, or infirm, or going abroad before the matter to which it relates can be judicially investigated, equity will, by anticipation, preserve and perpetuate such evidence in order to prevent a failure of justice. Also any person who would become entitled, upon the happening of any future event, to any honor, title, dignity, or office, or to any estate or interest in any property, real or personal, the right or claim to which cannot by him be brought to trial before the happening of such future event, may obtain the perpetuation of any testimony which may be material for establishing such claim or right; but the attorney-general must be joined should the Crown be interested (5 & 6 Vict. c. 69).

This jurisdiction emanates from the anxiety of equity to ward off litigation, where there is a chance of its being oppressively exercised; and it is administered by preserving the evidence either in maintenance of an unpossessed legal right, or where it is anticipated that an adversary with an apparent right is only postponing his attack against the lawful possessor, until the death of witnesses who can give material evidence in resistance to his colourable claim. A common case under this jurisdiction is that of a devisee establishing the will under which he claims, against the heir-at-law who is inclined to dispute its validity, by compelling him to litigate the question at once or not at all, and by perpetuating, at the same time, the evidence of the attesting witnesses in maintenance of the devise. It is not necessary that the devise should be coupled with a trust. Read Boyse v. Rossborough, 2 Eq. Rep. 675 (1854).

This object is accomplished by filing a bill, the nature of which is an original bill, not praying relief. The bill should set forth the matter and facts as to which the plaintiff is desirous of preserving evidence; his interest, which may be endangered should the testimony in support of it be lost; the defendant's title, or pretended title, or interest, by which he claims to contest the plaintiff's title in the subject of the proposed testimony; and the ground of necessity for perpetuating the testimony, as that the facts to which the testimony of the witnesses proposed to be examined relate, cannot yet be judicially investigated, or, if they can be so investigated, that the right of investigation belongs exclusively to the defendant; or, that the defendant has interposed some impediment (such as an injunction) to an immediate trial of the right in the action at law, so that, before the investigation can take place, the evidence of a material witness is likely to be lost by his death or absence abroad. In the former case, the bill should allege that the plaintiff is in possession of the property or the right, without any disturbance by the opposite party upon which an action-at-law can be founded. In the latter case, the bill must allege the specific facts upon which the plaintiff rests his case; and also that the witnesses are old, or infirm, or in ill health, and not likely to live; or that he has no present right to maintain an action, as if he have a title in remainder or reversion expectant on a present existing estate for life. Without such allegations the bill will be clearly demurrable; since, if the subject-matter be capable of being immediately investigated, there is no ground to perpetuate the testimony; as it will be laches or negligence not at once to try the right. The bill should pray leave to examine the witnesses touching the matter stated, to the end that their testimony may be preserved and perpetuated.

An affidavit of the materiality of the witnesses, and the circumstances by means of which the testimony may be lost, must be annexed to the bill.

The bill, not praying relief, is never brought to a hearing. If the defendant do not answer the bill, the court will order the witnesses to be examined; but if he do, then, after issue joined, an application is made to the court to grant the prayer of the bill, and the suit terminates with the examination of the witnesses. The defendant can also, in this suit, examine any of his own witnesses, whose testimony he is desirous of preserving.

The suit being ended, the defendant is entitled to his costs, which he may obtain by motion as of course, upon the simple allegation that he did not examine any witnesses, for his examination of witnesses will disentitle him to his costs. A defendant to a bill of discovery, and to perpetuate the testimony of witnesses, is entitled to his costs of the discovery, although he have examined witnesses in chief.—Skrine v. Powell, 15 Sim. 81 (1845).

Should the plaintiff, after the defendant's answer, neglect to proceed, the defendant may serve him with a notice that he intends to move the court that the plaintiff file a replication forthwith (should he not have already replied), and proceed to the examination of his witnesses, and procure such examination to be completed on or before a certain day; and that in default thereof, that he may pay to the defendant his taxed costs of the suit.

The court will not permit the depositions to be made use of in evidence, except to support a suit or action; and then only after the death of the witness, or in case he is sick, or incapable of travelling, or is prevented by accident from attending to be examined. The order of the court so to use the depositions, is obtained upon a special motion, supported by an affidavit of all the circumstances.

This jurisdiction of equity is fallen somewhat into desuetude, since the legislature, by several statutes, has given to the common law courts and to the judicial committee of the privy council, power to order the examination on oath, upon interrogatories or otherwise before the master of the court, or other person named in such order, any witness within the jurisdiction of the court, in which any action or other proceeding is pending, or to order a commission for the examination of witnesses out of their jurisdiction, in such manner and at such times and places as shall seem reasonable and just, and also to make orders for compelling the attendance of witnesses, and production of documents, but no such examination or deposition is to be read in evidence at any trial, without the consent of the party against whom the same is offered, unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the judge that the deponent is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or dead, or unable from permanent sickness or infirmity, to attend at the trial; in any of which cases, the deposition certified under the hand of the person taking the same, shall without proof of the signature to such certificate be received and read in evidence, saving all just exceptions, 13 Geo. III. c. 63, ss. 40, 44; 1 Wm. IV. c. 22; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 41, s. 14; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5, et seq. See Biddulph v. Camoys, 20 Bea. 402 (1856), showing that the 1 Wm. IV. c. 22, has not taken away the jurisdiction of equity in these matters.

An order for the examination of a plaintiff in a cause as a witness on his own behalf may be obtained under 1 Wm. IV. c. 22, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, before appearance, and on an affidavit simply stating that the party is a material and necessary witness, that he is about to leave the country on his usual business immediately, and that he is not likely to return until after the cause has been tried, provided no facts are stated by affidavit in answer, suggesting any suspicion of an improper object in the application.—Brown v. Mollett, 3 Com. L. Rep. 925 (1855). The rule appears to be different as to defendants.

Perpetuity, duration to all futurity; exemption from intermission or ceasing, where though all who have interest should join in a covenant, they could not bar or pass the estate. It is odious in law, destructive to the commonwealth, and an impediment to commerce, by preventing the wholesome circulation of property.

The rule against perpetuities, or the doctrine of remoteness, applies to the corpus of property, whether real or personal, and whether limited by deed or will, and may be thus stated: that the vesting of property cannot be postponed, or the alienation of it restricted, beyond any number of lives in being, whether interested or not is quite immaterial (Duke of Norfolk's case, 3 Cha. Ca. 1 (33 Car. II. called 'the Case of Perpetuities'), and Stephens v. Stephens, Ca. Tem. Talb. 228 (1736)), and twenty-one years from the death of the surviving life, absolutely and wholly independent of infancy (i. e. a gross term of twenty-one years), together with one or two periods of actually existing gestation (read the arguments in Bengough v. Edridge, 1 Sim. 173, et seq. (1827)), either at the commencement or at any intermediate part of the period of postponement, or at the both periods, should two gestations really occur (Cadell v. Palmer, 7 Bli. N.S. 202, an appeal from Bengough v. Edridge (1833)). This gestation (which is naturally 9 calendar months, 10 lunar months, 40 weeks or 280 days) may occur at the commencement thus:—A limitation to A., for life, remainder to such of his children as shall attain twenty-one, and A. dies leaving his widow enceinte, then the period of gestation is added to the minority. Two gestations may occur thus:—A limitation to A., a child en ventre sa mère, remainder to such of his children as shall attain twenty-one; and A. dies, leaving his widow enceinte, then two periods are added to the life and the minority.

Any word or phrase, however sounding in remoteness, will not of itself invalidate a limitation; there must exist an illegal remoteness in the contingency contemplated by the limitation, as also a possibility of such a contingency operating in fact remotely, in order to render a limitation void. For example, a limitation to A. on the death of B. without issue sounds invalid for remoteness, but if B. be already dead issueless, remoteness does not really exist, and the limitation to A. is valid. Thus remoteness in terms, without remoteness in reality, avails not.

The rule requires a limitation, whether of an absolute or partial interest, positively and necessarily to vest within the period prescribed, and not to depend upon a mere possibility.

If the rule be exceeded, the limitation is wholly void and cannot be validated by the happening of any event subsequently to its creation. When a limitation might have included objects too remote, it is invalid, notwithstanding the objects may actually be ascertained within the verge of the rule.

The period presented by the rule is to be computed from the date or delivery of the deed creating the limitations; or, from the testator's death, when given by will, that being the period at which a will takes effect.

The following limitations are exempt from the perpetuity rule:—

(1) A limitation expectant upon an entail, for it can be destroyed by barring the entail, but should the entail be preceded by a term for years, and its trusts be postponed until the failure of the issue in tail, they will be void, because limited to arise on an indefinite failure of issue.

(2) Limitations, the nature of whose subject-matter is such as to render it necessary for them to take effect, if at all, within the period prescribed by the perpetuity-rule.

(3) Limitations in mortmain, and to charitable uses. Church property is not embraced by the law of perpetuity.

(4) Perpetuities allowed or created by Act of Parliament, such as Blenheim, settled upon the renowned Duke of Marlborough and his posterity (3 & 4 Anne, c. 6; 4 Anne, c. 4; and 5 Anne, c. 3); and Strathfieldsaye on the great Duke of Wellington and his descendants (41 Geo. III. c. 59; 42 Geo. III. c. 113; and 54 Geo. III. c. 161). For the detailed learning of this abstruse doctrine, see Lewis on Perp., and Supp.; and Cattlin v. Brown, 1 Eq. Rep. 550 (1853).

Per quæ servitia, a judicial writ issuing from the note of a fine; it lay for cognisee of a manor, seigniory, chief rent, or other services, to compel him who was tenant of the land at the time of the note of the fine levied, to attorn unto him.—O. N. B. 155.

Perquisite, something gained by a place or office over and above the stated wages; anything gotten by industry or purchased with money different from that which descends from a father or ancestor; also, fines of copyholds, heriots, amerciaments, &c.

Perquisitor, a searcher.

Per quod (whereby), a phrase made use of by a plaintiff in a declaration, alleging special damage, without which an action would not have been maintainable.

Per quod consortium amisit [Lat.] (whereby he lost the benefit of her society).

Per quod servitium amisit [Lat.] (whereby he lost the benefit of her service).

Per rationes pervenitur ad legitimam rationem.—Litt. s. 386.—(By reasoning we come to legal reason.)

Person (fr. persona, Lat.), the individuality of a human being; individual character or station; bodily form or substance.—Rich. Dict.

Persons are divided into: (1) natural, such as God formed them; and (2) artificial, such as are created and devised by human laws for purposes of society and government, which are called corporations or bodies-politic.—1 Bl. Com. 123. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 1.

Person, indecent exposure of, an offence against the public economy, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, with hard labor, at the court's discretion.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29.

Persona, anybody capable of having and becoming subject to rights.—Civ. Law. See Sand. Just. 95.

Persona conjuncta æquiparatur interesse proprio.—Bacon.—(The interest of a man's kindred is equivalent to his own.)

Personâ regis, mergitur personâ ducis.—Jenk. Cent. 160.—(The person of duke merges in that of king.)

Personable, the being able to hold or maintain a plea in court; also, capacity to take anything granted or given.—Plowd. 27.

Personal, any movable thing, either living or dead.

Personal action, one brought for the specific recovery of goods and chattels, or for damages or other redress for breach of contract, or other injuries, of whatever description, the specific recovery of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, only excepted. See ACTIONS.

For the mode of proceeding in personal actions, see Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren.; or Lush's Prac. by Step.

Personal Acts of Parliament. Statutes confined to particular persons, e. g. authorizing a person to change his name, &c.

Personal chattels, goods, money, or movables.

Personal identity. See IDENTITY.

Personal property, chattels which include whatever wants either the duration or the immobility attending things real. They are distributed into chattels-real and chattels-personal. See CHATTELS.

Property in personalty is either in possession, which is absolute, where a person has such an exclusive right in the thing that it cannot cease to be his without his own act or default, or qualified, arising where the subject is incapable of absolute ownership, or from the peculiar circumstances of the owners; or, in action, where a man has not the actual occupation of the thing, but only a right to it, arising upon some contract, and recoverable by an action at law.

The property of chattels personal is liable to remainders, expectant on estates for life; to joint-tenancy, and to tenancy-in-common.

The title to things personal may be acquired or lost by occupancy, prerogative, forfeiture, custom, succession, marriage, judgment, gift, or grant, invention, contract, bankruptcy, insolvency, testament, and administration.—2 Bl. Com. 384.

Any person shall have power to assign personal property, now by law assignable, including chattels real, directly to himself and another person or other persons or corporation, by the like means as he might assign the same to another.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 1.

Personal representatives, executors or administrators.

Personal rights, the right of personal security, comprising those of life, limbs, body, health, reputation, and the right of personal liberty.

Personal tithes, those that are paid out of such profits as come by the labor of a man's person; as by buying and selling, gains of merchandise, handicrafts, &c.

Personality, said of an action when it is brought against the right person.

Personality of laws. All laws concerning the condition, state, and capacity of persons, as distinguished from the reality of laws which means all laws concerning property or things. Whenever foreign jurists wish to express that the operation of a law is universal, they compendiously announce that it is a personal statute; and whenever, on the other hand, they wish to express that its operation is confined to the country of its origin, they simply declare it to be a real statute.

Livermore uses the words personality and reality. Henry, the words personalty and realty. Story preferred the former, as least likely to lead to mistakes, as personalty in our law is confined to personal estate, and realty to real estate.—Conft. of Laws, 23.

Personalty, personal property, that which relates to the person.

Personation. See FALSE PERSONATION.

Perspicua vera non sunt probanda.—Co. Litt. 16.—(Plain truths need not be proved.)

Per stirpes (by the right of ancestry).

Perticata terræ, the fourth part of an acre.

Perticulas, a pittançe; a small portion of alms or victuals. Also, certain poor scholars of the Isle of Man.

Pertinents, appointments.—Scotch term.

Perturbatrix, a woman who breaks the peace.

Pervise, the palace-yard at Westminster.—Somn.

Per varios actus legem experientia fecit.—4 Inst. 50.—(By various acts experience framed the law.)

Pesa, a wey or weigh.

Pesage, a custom or duty paid for weighing merchandise or other goods.

Peshcush, a present, particularly to government, in consideration of an appointment, or as an acknowledgment of a tenure. Also tribute, fine, quit rent, or advance on stipulated revenues.—Indian.

Peshura, Paishura, guide, leader, the prime minister of the Mahratta government.—Ibid.

Pessona, mast of oaks, &c. or money taken for mast, or feeding hogs.

Pessurable, Pestarble, or Pestarable wares, merchandise which takes up a good deal of room in a ship.

Peter-pence, an ancient levy or tax of a penny on each house throughout England, paid to the pope. It was called Peter-pence, because collected on the day of St. Peter ad vincula; by the Saxons it was called Rome-feoh, Rome-scot, and Rome-pennying, because collected and sent to Rome; and lastly, it was called hearth-money, because every dwelling-house was liable to it, and every religious house, the Abbey of St. Alban's alone excepted.

It was not intended as a tribute to the pope, but chiefly for the support of the English school or college at Rome; the popes, however, shared it with the college, and at length found means to appropriate it to themselves.

At first it was only an occasional contribution, but it became at last a standing tax; being established by three laws of King Canute, Edward the Confessor, and the Conqueror. Edward III. first forbade the payment, but it soon after returned, and continued till the time of Henry VIII. when Polydore Vergil resided here as the pope's receiver-general. It was abolished under that prince, and restored again under Philip and Mary, but was finally prohibited under Queen Elizabeth. Chambers's Cyc.

Petitio, a count or declaration.—Glanv.

Petition, a supplication made by an inferior to a superior, and especially to one having jurisdiction.

The subject has a right to petition the Sovereign, or the two houses of Parliament, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal. But see TUMULTUOUS PETITIONING.

There are several regulations respecting petitions to Parliament, which, if neglected in any one particular, will prevent their reception. When intended for the House of Lords, a petition must be addressed 'To the Right Honorable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled;' when addressed to the House of Commons, it may be directed, 'To the Honorable the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled,' but it is more usually in this form, 'To the Honorable the Commons of the United Kingdom in Parliament assembled.' Its commencement must describe the petitioners thus: 'The Humble Petition of the Electors of the Parish of ——— showeth that,' &c.; or, in the case of an individual, his name and occupation must be stated thus, 'The Humble Petition of A. B. of &c. showeth that,' &c. The statement of grievance must then follow, and the whole must conclude with a specific prayer. The omission of a prayer has often proved fatal to the reception of a petition, for no mere remonstrance or detail of grievance will be received. The prayer must be thus introduced: 'Wherefore your Petitioners humbly pray that your Honorable House will be pleased to,' &c.; the particular relief expected being here stated. To the whole petition must be added the words, 'And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray;' and immediately thereupon must follow the signatures; of which one at least must be on the same sheet of paper, or skin of parchment, as the petition, not pasted or otherwise appended. The signatures or marks must be original, not copies nor signatures of agents on behalf of others; thus no chairman of a public meeting can sign for the whole meeting; by such an informality the petition becomes that of an individual. But the common seal of a corporation is received as the petition of the whole corporate body. A printed or lithographed petition will not be received; it must be in writing on parchment, or on paper, free from erasures or interlineations, and composed in English, or accompanied by a translation, which the presenting member certifies to be correct; but no letters, affidavits, or other documents can be annexed. Petitions are uniformly rejected, if not respectful and temperate in language, free from imputations upon the character and conduct of Parliament, the courts of justice, or other constituted authorities. No reference is permitted to any debates or to any motions supposed to be in preparation; while petitions for the remission (not abolition) of customs, stamps, or other duties, can only be received on the recommendation of the Crown. The presenting member is expected to examine whether these conditions have been complied with; and the committee on public petitions subsequently subject all those documents to a severe scrutiny. Petitions for presentation may be forwarded by post, free of charge to any member of either house, in parcels open at the ends, marked outside 'Parliamentary Petitions,' and not exceeding thirty-two ounces in weight.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

A petition in Chancery is a written document setting forth a series of facts, and containing a prayer for the direction or order of the judge to whom it is addressed. There are two classes of petitions:—(1) Original, which are framed under a particular Act of Parliament, or by virtue of a special authority giving jurisdiction to Chancery; and (2) Cause petitions, where a suit is pending. These are either: (a) for orders of course, or (b) for special orders not of course, or (c) for a rehearsal or appeal.

A petition should be brief and in the accustomed form. It is entitled in the court and cause or matter, and addressed to the House of Lords, to the Lord Chancellor, or to the Master of the Rolls. It sets forth the name and description of the petitioner, and states concisely the facts and circumstances, which are necessary in order that the court may be enabled to decide whether the prayer (which concludes the petition) should be granted or not.

A petition does not generally require a signature, except in certain charity cases, when it must bear the Attorney-General's signature, or for a rehearing or appeal, when it must be signed by counsel; or a pauper-petition, which must be signed by his solicitor or a clerk of records and writs.

A petition, being engrossed on plain paper, is presented to the judge, to whom it is addressed. If it be addressed to the Lord Chancellor, it should be left with his secretary, who obtains an answer to it by means of a memorandum written at its foot, signed by the Chancellor, directing all parties concerned to attend before him on the next day of petitions. A cause petition presented to the Chancellor is heard by the Vice-Chancellor, to whose court the cause is attached. A petition addressed to the Master of the Rolls must be left with his secretary, who, if it be not of course, obtains an answer to it in a manner similar to a petition addressed to the Chancellor. Petitions for matters of course are usually addressed to the Master of the Rolls, and orders then are forthwith granted by his secretary without being answered or any attendance of parties required.

A copy of the petition, unless it be for an order as of course, must be served upon the solicitors of the adverse parties or their town agents, showing the original petition and answer thereto, unless personal service on the parties themselves is requisite. Two clear judicial days must intervene between the service of, and the day appointed for hearing, the petition. If it is not intended to serve the petition, a note to that effect should be appended to it.

Petitions for special orders are set down in the paper of petitions appointed for the day, and called on in their order. A petition is heard by its being opened and argued by the petitioner's counsel; counsel are then heard for the respondents, and the senior counsel of the petitioner replies; whereupon the proper order is made. Should the petitioner not appear, his petition is dismissed with costs, on producing to the registrar in court an office-copy of an affidavit that the respondent has been served with a copy of the petition. Should the respondent not appear, the petitioner, upon an affidavit of service upon all necessary parties, is entitled to an order so far as the case made out by him will justify. Every party who is served with a copy of a petition is entitled to his costs of appearing upon it, whether he is interested in the matter or not.

The original petition having been filed with the clerk of reports, the order thereon is drawn up, passed, entered, and served in a manner similar to decrees or orders made upon a hearing. Such orders can only be altered, varied, or discharged by petition; and if new facts occur after a petition has been answered, a supplemental petition must be presented. See Smi. Ch. Pr. 149, et seq.

Petitions at common law are presented for various purposes, as for leave to sue or be sued by guardian, or to sue in formâ pauperis, or to the Lords of the Treasury, for the proceeds of an outlaw's goods, or to resist an extent.

In bankruptcy, proceedings are usually, but not always, commenced by one or more creditors of the debtor, or by the debtor himself filing a petition in the Court of Bankruptcy, praying that the debtor may be adjudged bankrupt. The petition must be on oath, and must state the trading of the debtor, where such trading is essential to the adjudication, and the amount of the debt or debts due to the petitioning creditor or creditors, if the petition be not presented by the debtor himself, and the act of bankruptcy. No petition is necessary in proceedings upon a judgment debtor summons under s. 83 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, or where a person in prison is adjudged bankrupt by the registrar under ss. 101, 102. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 86, et seq.; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 88, 89. A petition is also one of the modes of appealing in bankruptcy.

Divorce and matrimonial suits, and suits instituted under the Legitimacy Declaration Act are commenced by petition.

The mode of obtaining redress for an improper election of a Member of Parliament is by petition to the House of Commons.

Petitions, in this case, are either—

I. Original, which lie

(a) Against an undue election or return of a member.

(b) When no return has been made to any writ issued for the election of any member to serve in Parliament on or before the day on which such writ is made returnable.

(c) When a writ is issued during any session or prorogation of Parliament, and no return has been made to the same within fifty-two days after the day on which such writ bears date.

(d) When any return is not according to the requisition of a writ.

(e) When the special matters contained in the return are improper.

(f) Upon an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister: (1) where the name of any person who voted at the election was improperly inserted in the register; (2) where the name of any person who voted at the election was improperly retained in the register; (3)where the name of any person who tendered his vote at the election was improperly omitted from the register. An appeal from the barrister's decision is made to the Court of Common Pleas.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18.

II. Supplemental in aid of original; they are either—

(a) Quia timet, or

(b) From subsequent events, subdivided into

(1) Death.
(2) Elevation to the peerage.
(3) Member abandoning defence.
(4) Petitioners declining to proceed.
(5) Resolution of vacancy.
(6) Renewed petition.

The manner of proceeding upon such petitions is regulated by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98, the substance of which is as follows:—Any person who voted, or had a right to vote, at the election, or claiming to have had a right to be returned or elected, or alleging himself to have been a candidate thereat, may subscribe and present to the House of Commons a petition, complaining of an undue election or return, or that no return has been made according to the requisition of the writ; but it is required that some one or more of the petitioners should enter into a recognizance, with sureties, for payment of all costs and expenses; and the sitting member, and any other person who voted or had a right to vote at the election (or such persons without the sitting member, if he declines to be a party), are entitled to oppose the petition. The list of voters intended to be objected to, together with the heads of the objection to each, are then delivered by either party to the 'General Committee of Elections' appointed by the House for such business at the commencement of each session, and the petition is afterwards referred by the House to a select committee, consisting of a chairman and four other members of the House, the former of whom is chosen by, and from out of, a select body called the chairman's panel appointed to serve for that session by the general committee, and the latter by the general committee itself. This select committee, who are sworn well and truly to try the matter before them, and are required to examine all witnesses on oath, then proceed to try the merits of the return or election (admitting no evidence, however, against any voter or in support of any objection, not set forth in the list of voters, and objections which had before been delivered to the general committee), and by their decision —which is by the majority of voices where the committee consist for the time of more than one member—they determine whether the sitting members, or either of them, or any and what other persons, were duly returned or elected; or whether the election be void; or whether a new writ ought to issue; and such determination is final between the parties to all intents and purposes, and is reported to the House at large, and entered in their journals. It is also to be observed that, if the select committee report the petition, or the opposition to it, to be frivolous or vexatious, the party in whose favor such report is made is entitled to recover from the other his full costs and expenses incurred in that behalf; that if they report any ground of objection stated against any voter, to be of that character, the opposite party shall be entitled to costs in like manner against the party on whose behalf the objection was made; and that, as to all specific allegations with regard to the conduct of either party or his agents, which shall appear to the select committee to have been advanced without reasonable or probable ground, the party making the allegation becomes liable to such order as to the costs thereby incurred as to the select committee may seem fit.

If any candidate at an election for any county, city, or borough, shall be declared by any election committee guilty, by himself or his agents, of bribery, treating, or undue influence at such election, such candidate shall be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough, during the Parliament then in existence.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 36; continued and amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, and 26 Vict. c. 29; 2 Step. Com. 393.

Petition de droit (petition of right), one of the common law methods of obtaining possession or restitution from the Crown of either real or personal property. It is said to owe its origin to Edward I. It may be preferred or prosecuted either on the common law side of the Court of Chancery, or in the Exchequer. It is of use when the Crown is in full possession of any hereditaments or chattels, and the petitioner suggests such a right as controverts the title of the Crown, grounded on facts disclosed in the petition; the petitioner must be careful to state truly the whole title of the Crown, otherwise the petition will abate; upon the answer being endorsed or underwritten by the Crown, soit droit fait al partie (let right be done to the party), a commission shall issue to inquire into the truth of the suggestion, after the return to which the Queen's attorney is at liberty to plead in bar, and the merits are determined upon issue or demurrer, as in suits between subject and subject. If the right be determined against the Crown, the judgment is that of ouster le main, or amoveas manus.—Chitty's Prerog. of the Crown, 345.

By the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 34, a petition of right may, if the suppliant think fit, be instituted in any one of the superior courts of law or equity in which the subject matter of the petition would have been cognizable if it had been in dispute between subject and subject; and such petition shall be left with the Secretary of State for the Home Department for her Majesty's consideration, who, if she shall think fit, may grant her fiat that right be done, whereupon after service of the fiat on the Solicitor to the Treasury, an answer, plea, or demurrer, shall be made on behalf of the Crown, and the subsequent proceedings assimilated as far as practicable to the course of an ordinary action or suit. A judgment that the suppliant is entitled to the whole or some portion of the relief sought by his petition, or to such other relief, and in such terms and conditions as the court may think right, shall have the same effect as a judgment of amoveas manus. Costs are made payable both to and by the Crown, and nothing in the Act is to prevent any suppliant from proceeding as he might have done before the Act passed.

Petition of Right, 3 Car. I. c. 1, a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people, assented to by Charles I. in the beginning of his reign.

In the first parliament of Charles I. which met in 1626, the Commons refused to grant supplies until certain rights and privileges of the subject, which they alleged had been violated, should have been solemnly recognised by a legislative enactment. With this view they framed a petition to the king, in which, after reciting various statutes by which their rights and privileges were recognised, they prayed the king 'that no man be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such-like charge, without common consent by Act of Parliament; that none be called upon to make answer so to do; that freemen be imprisoned or detained only by the law of the land, or by due process of law, and not by the king's special command, without any charge; that persons be not compelled to receive soldiers and mariners into their houses against the laws and customs of the realm; that commissions for proceeding by martial law be revoked: all which they pray as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of the realm.'

To this petition the king at first sent an evasive answer: 'The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrongs and oppressions contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself in conscience obliged as of his own prerogative.' This answer being rejected as unsatisfactory, the king at last pronounced the formal words of unqualified assent, Soit droit fait comme est desiré, 'Let right be done as it is desired' (3 Car. I. c. 1). Notwithstanding this, however, the ministers of the Crown caused the petition to be printed and circulated with the first insufficient answer.

Petitioning Creditor, one who applies for an adjudication in bankruptcy against his trading debtor.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, it is enacted, that the amount of the debt of any creditor, petitioning for adjudication of bankruptcy, against a debtor, whether a trader or not, shall be as follows: that is to say, the single debt of such creditor, or of two or more persons being partners so petitioning, shall amount to 50*l.* or upwards, and the debt of two creditors shall amount to 70*l.* or upwards, and the debt of three or more creditors shall amount to 100*l.* or upwards. Every person who has given credit to any debtor, upon valuable consideration for any sum payable at a certain time, which time shall not have arrived when such debtor committed an act of bankruptcy, may so petition or join in petitioning, whether he shall have any security in writing for such sum or not (s. 89). The debt of the petitioning creditor of any debtor not being a trader, and not being at the time a prisoner, against whom such creditor would have been entitled to obtain a vesting order in insolvency, if this Act had not passed, must be a debt contracted after the passing of this Act, and the judgment debtor summons must be a summons in respect of a debt contracted or of a liability incurred after the passing of this Act (s. 90). If the debt stated by the petitioning creditor in his affidavit or in his petition for adjudication to be due to him from any debtor, shall not be really due, or if after a petition for adjudication filed, it shall not have been proved that the person against whom such petition has been filed was liable to an adjudication at time of the filing of such petition, and it shall also appear that such petition was filed fraudulently or maliciously, the Court shall and may, upon petition of any person aggrieved by such petition, examine into the same, and order satisfaction to be made to him for the damages by him sustained (s. 91). It must, however, be a debt for which, if payable at the time, an action at law could be maintained by and in the name of the petitioning creditor. An equitable debt is not sufficient. Interest, even on a bill of exchange, cannot be the subject of a petitioning creditor's debt, unless expressed to be payable on the face of the instrument; for otherwise it is merely damages to be recovered in an action, and not a debt in law. The personal attendance of the petitioning creditor, and of the witness or witnesses to prove the trading and act of bankruptcy, upon the adjudication, shall in no case be dispensed with, except upon special cause, proved to the satisfaction of the commissioner.

Petitio principii, begging the question, which is the taking of a thing for true or for granted, and drawing conclusions from it as such, when it is really dubious, perhaps false, or at least wants to be proved, before any inferences ought to be drawn from it. For a discussion on the question, 'Is the syllogism a petitio principii?' see 1 Mill's Log. b. 2, c. iii., s. 1, p. 206.

Petit jury, a jury in criminal cases who try the bills found by the grand jury.

Petit larceny, stealing of goods to the value of a shilling or under. The distinction between grand and petit larceny was abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 2. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 2.

Petit serjeanty, holding lands of the Crown by the service of rendering annually some small implement of war, as a bow, a sword, a lance, an arrow, or the like. See TENURE.

Petit treason, treason of a lessor kind, as if a servant killed his master, a wife her husband, a secular or religious man his prelate. But by the 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 2, every offence which, before the passing of the Act, would have amounted to petit treason, shall be deemed murder only. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 8.

Petra, a stone-weight.—Cowel.

Petroleum. For its statutory definition and safe keeping, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 66.

Pettifogger [fr. petit, Fr., little, and voqueur, a rower], a lawyer in a mean way of business; a pretender to law, without knowledge or honesty.—Cant term.

Petty-bag-office, an office belonging to the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, for suits for and against solicitors and officers of that court, and for process and proceedings by extents on statutes, recognizances, ad quod damnum, scire facias, to repeal letters-patent, &c.—Termes de la Ley. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 94; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 109; and Orders of 26th Dec. 1848, and 3rd August, 1849.

Petty constables, inferior officers in every town and parish, subordinate to the high constable of the hundred. See CONSTABLE.

Petty sessions, sittings of one or two justices of the peace, who are empowered by statute to try in a summary way, and without jury, certain minor offences. See 10 & 11 Vict. c. 82; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 37; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 126. As to Ireland, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 100; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 96.

Pew [fr. puye, Dut.; appui, Fr.], an enclosed seat in a church. It is somewhat in the nature of an heir-loom, and may descend by immemorial custom, without any ecclesiastical concurrence, from an ancestor to his heir.

The right to sit in a particular pew in the church arises either from prescription as appurtenant to a messuage, or from a faculty or grant from the ordinary, for he has the disposition of all pews which are not claimed by prescription. All other pews and seats in the body of a church are the property of the parish; and the churchwardens, as the officers of the ordinary, and subject to his control, have authority to place the parishioners therein. See 3 Step. Com. 42, 69, 449; 3 Hagg. Ec. Rep. 733; 1 Phil. Rep. 324.

Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, as to examinations by, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 56.

Pharos, a watch-tower or sea-mark, which cannot be erected without lawful warrant and authority.—3 Inst. 204.

Phatuk, a gaol or prison.—Indian.

Pheasant, a fowl of warren.

Phylasist [fr. φυλάσσω, Gk., to keep], a jailor.

Physician, one who professes the art of healing.

The necessity of placing under supervision the practitioners of physic and surgery appears from our statute-book to have been early acknowledged, for we find in the third year of Henry VIII. a statute intituled 'An Act for the appointing of Physicians and Surgeons,' in which, after reciting the inconveniences, and grievous hurt, damage, and destruction of many of the king's liege people, forasmuch as common artificers, as smiths, weavers, and women, boldly take upon them great cures, in which they partly use sorcery and witchcraft, it is enacted, that no person within London or seven miles thereof, shall practice as a physician or surgeon without examination and license of the Bishop of London or Dean of St. Paul's (duly assisted by the faculty); or beyond these limits without license from the bishop of the diocese or his vicar-general similarly assisted. There is a saving, however, of the privileges of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford. The superintendence of the bishops was taken away by a royal charter, dated 23rd Sept., 10 Hen. VIII. which incorporated the physicians.

By 14 & 15 Hen. VIII. c. 5, this charter was confirmed, and in virtue of such act and charter, a perpetual college of physicians was established, with a constitution of eight elects, to be renewed as need should require, of whom was to be annually elected a president; and it was ordained that this college should choose four physicians quarterly, to supervise all others within London and seven miles thereof, as also their medicines and receipts, so that such as offended should be punished with fines, imprisonment, and other means, and that no person should be at liberty to practise within that circle, except by the license of the college, under a penalty of 5*l.* per month. All persons were likewise forbidden to practise even beyond that circle, unless they should have been first examined and approved by the president, and three elects; or should be graduates of Cambridge or Oxford. They were also allowed to practise surgery as part of the general science of physic by 32 Hen. VIII., c. 40.

The charter of the college was subsequently confirmed and enlarged by 1st Mar. sess. 2, c. 9, and by certain other charters of later dates, viz. 8th Oct. 15 Jac. I., and 26th Mar. 15 Car. II., by which many important privileges and immunities are further secured to that body. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 114.

At common law, a physician could not maintain an action for his fees.—4 T. R. 317; 3 Q. B. 928. But by the Medical Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, a physician who is registered under the Act may do so if not precluded by any bye-law of the College of Physicians. That college has passed a bye-law prohibiting fellows of the college from suing, but does not apply to members.—Gibbon v. Budd, 32, L. J. (Excheq.) 182. See MEDICAL ACT.

The stamp-duty on licenses to practise as a physician is repealed by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 36, s. 2.

Piacle, an enormous crime. Obsolete.

Picaroon [fr. picare, Ital.], a robber; a plunderer.

Pick of land, a narrow strip of land running into a corner.

Pickage [fr. picagium, low Lat.], money paid at fairs for breaking ground for booths.

Pick-lock, an instrument by which locks are opened without a key.

Pick-pocket, or Pick-purse, a thief who steals by putting his hand privately into the pocket or purse of another.

Pickery, petty theft, or stealing things of small value.—Scotch word.

Pickle, Pycle, or Pightel [fr. piccolo, Ital.], a small parcel of land enclosed with a hedge, which in some countries is called a pingle.—Encyc. Lond.

Piedpoudre, Court of [curia pedis pulverizati, Lat., so called, either from the dusty feet of the suitors, or because justice is there done as speedily as dust can fall from the foot, or derived fr. pied puldreaux, old Fr., a pedlar or petty chapman, such as resorts to fairs or markets], a court of record incident to every fair and market, though fallen into disuse, and now in a manner forgotten; of which the steward of him who owns, or has the toll of the market, is the judge; its jurisdiction extends to administer justice for all commercial injuries done in that very fair or market, and not in any preceding one; so that the injury must be done, complained of, heard and determined, within the compass of one and the same day, unless the fair continue longer. The court has cognizance of all matters of contract that can possibly arise within the precinct of that fair or market, and the plaintiff must make oath that the cause of action arose there. A writ of error lies in the nature of an appeal to the courts at Westminster. 3 Reeves, c. xx., p. 293.

Pierage, the duty for maintaining piers and harbors.

Piers and Harbours. As to the formation, management, and maintenance of piers and harbours in Great Britain and Ireland, see The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 45. See also 26 & 27 Vict. c. 104.

Pietantia, a pittance, a portion of victuals distributed to the members of a college.—Encyc. Lond.

Pietantiarius, the officer in a college who distributed the pietantia.

Pightel, a little enclosure.

Pignoration [fr. pignus, Lat.], the act of pledging.

Pignorative, Pignorary, pledging; pawning.

Pignus, a pledge or security for a debt or demand, is derived, says Gaius (Dig. 50, tit. 16, s. 238), fr. pugnus, 'quia quæ pignori dantur, manu traduntur.' This is one of several instances of the failure of the Roman jurists when they attempted etymological explanation of words. The element of pignus (pig) is contained in the word pa(n)go and its cognate forms. A pledge was called pignus when the possession of the thing was transferred to the pledgee, and hypotheca, when the pledger retained it in his possession.—See Sand. Just. 227.

Pigott's Act, 14 Geo. II. c. 20, relating to recoveries which are abolished.

Pila, that side of money which was called pile, because it was the side on which there was an impression of a church built on piles.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xxxix.

Pilettus [fr. pila, Lat., a ball], in our ancient forest-laws, an arrow which had a round knob a little above the head, to hinder it from going far into the mark.

Pileus supportationis (the cap of maintenance).—Cowel.

Pilferer, one who steals petty things.

Pillery, rapine; robbery. Obsolete.

Pillory [the etymology of this word has been variously assigned by different writers; Spelman derives it fr. the French, pilleur, a thief; Cowel fr. πύλη, a door, and ὁράω, I look through; Du Cange, fr. pila, a pillar], a frame erected on a pillar, and made with holes and movable boards, through which the heads and hands of criminals were put.

The punishment of the pillory, which had been abolished in all other cases, by 56 Geo. III. c. 138, was retained for the punishment of perjury and subornation; but it is now altogether abolished by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 23.

Pilot, a particular officer serving on board a ship during the course of a voyage, and having the charge of the helm and the ship's route; or a person taken on board at any particular place for the purpose of conducting a ship through a river, road, or channel, or from or into a port. It is to the latter description of persons that the term pilot is now usually applied, and pilots of this sort are established in various parts of the country, by ancient charters of incorporation or by particular statutes. The most important of these incorporations are those of the Trinity House, Deptford, Stroud, the fellowship of the Pilots of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet, commonly called the Cinque Port Pilots, and the Trinity Houses of Hull and Newcastle. The 5 Geo. IV. c. 73, established a corporation for the regulation and licensing of pilots in Liverpool. The statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 125, consolidated the laws with respect to the licensing, employment, &c., of pilots. See the Merchants' Shipping Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 330–388, pt. v. 'Pilotage;' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 39–42; and Maude and Pollock on Shipping.

Pilotage, the compensation of a pilot.

Pimp-tenure, a very odious and singular kind of tenure mentioned by our old writers, 'Wilhelmus Hoppeshort tenet dimidiam virgatam terræ, per servitium custodiendi sex damisellas, scil. meretrices, ad usum domini regis.'—12 Ed. I.

Pin money, an annual sum settled on a wife to defray her personal expenses, in dress and pocket-money.

Courts of equity refuse to call upon a husband to pay beyond the arrears of a year, although stipulated for by a marriage settlement, for the money is meant to dress the wife during the year, so as to keep up the dignity of the husband, and not for the accumulation of the fund. The personal representatives of the wife are not allowed to make any claim for the arrears of pin-money, not even for arrears of a year. If, however, the wife live separate, and have no allowance, an account of the arrears of pin-money will be decreed.—Aston v. Aston, 1 Ves. 269; Spect. No. 295; Jodrell v. Jodrell, 9 Beav. 45.

There is a very ancient tax in France for providing the Queen with pins.

Pinnage [fr. pin or pen], poundage of cattle.

Pinner, a pounder of cattle, a pound-keeper.

Pint, a measure of half a quart, or the eighth part of a gallon.

Pipe, a roll in the Exchequer; otherwise called the Great Roll. The Pipe-office was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99.

Piracy [fr. pirata, Lat.], the commission of those acts of robbery and violence upon the sea, which if committed upon land would amount to felony. Pirates hold no commission or delegated authority from any sovereign or state empowering them to attack others. They can, therefore, be only regarded in the light of robbers or assassins. They are, as Cicero has truly stated, the common enemies of all (communes hostes omnium); and the law of nations gives to everyone the right to pursue and exterminate them without any previous declaration of war; but it is not allowed to kill them without trial, except in battle. Those who surrender or are taken prisoners must be brought before the proper magistrates, and dealt with according to law. By the ancient common law of England, piracy, if committed by a subject, was held to be a species of treason, being contrary to his natural allegiance; if by an alien, to be felony only; but since the statute of treason, 25 Edw. III. c. 2, it is held to be only felony in a subject. Formerly this offence was only cognisable by the Admiralty courts, which proceed by the rules of the civil law, but it being inconsistent with the liberties of the nation that any man's life should be taken away, unless by the judgment of his peers, the statute 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, established a new jurisdiction for this purpose, which proceeds according to the course of the common law. Piracy was almost universally practised in the heroic ages. Instead of being esteemed infamous, it was supposed to be honorable.—Latrocinium maris gloriæ habebatur.—Justin, lib. x. l. 3, c. iii. Menelaus, in the Odyssey, does not hesitate to inform his guests, who admired his riches, that they were the fruits of his piratical expeditions, lib. iv. v. 90; and such indeed was the way in which most of the Greek princes amassed great wealth.—Goguet, Origin of Laws, v. i., p. 383; Eng. Laws. See 4 Step. Com. 299.

Piracy of works, literary theft.

The remedies for piracy are, an action at law for damages, and an injunction to restrain its continuance. See INJUNCTION.

Pirata est hostis humani generis.—3 Inst. 113. (A pirate is an enemy of the human race.)

Piscary, Common of, a right or liberty of fishing in the waters of another person. See FISHERY.

Pit, a hole wherein the Scots used to drown women-thieves.—Skene.

Pitching-pence, money; commonly a penny, paid for pitching or setting down every bag of corn or pack of goods in a fair or market.

Pittance, a slight repast or refection of fish or flesh more than the common allowance; and the pittancer was the officer who distributed this at certain appointed festivals.

Pitt Press, the University Press at Cambridge.

Pixing the Coin, ascertaining whether coin is of the proper standard. The trial of the pix takes place before a jury of members of the Goldsmiths' Company.

Placard, or Placart [fr. plakaert, Dut.; placard, Fr.; fr. plaque, a flat piece of metal, stone, or wood; πλάξ, Gk.], an edict, a declaration, a manifesto; also an advertisement or public notification.

Placeman, one who exercises a public employment, or fills a public station.

Places of amusement. It is provided by 25 Geo. II. c. 36, s. 2, made perpetual by 28 Geo. III. c. 19, s. 1, that every house, room, garden, or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind in London and Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof, without a license from the quarter sessions, shall be deemed a disorderly house, and the keeper thereof shall forfeit the sum of 100*l.*, and be otherwise punishable as the law directs in the case of disorderly houses. And it is further enacted, that over the door or entrance of all such licensed places there shall be affixed and kept up the words, 'Licensed, pursuant to Act of Parliament of the twenty-fifth of Geo. II.' and that no house of this description is to be opened for the purpose of amusement before five o'clock in the afternoon.

But this Act has no application to the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, the Opera House in Covent Garden, or the Italian Opera in the Haymarket; nor to any patent theatre licensed by the Crown or the Lord Chamberlain of the Household.

Placit, or Placitum, decree, determination.

Placita, the public assemblies of all degrees of men where the sovereign presided, who usually consulted upon the great affairs of the kingdom. Also, pleas, pleadings, or debates, and trials at law; sometimes penalties, fines, mulcts, or emendations; also, the style of the court at the beginning of the record at nisi prius; but this is now omitted.—Cowel.

Placita concernentia chartas, seu scripta liberum tenementum tangentia, in aliquibus curiis quæ recordum non habent secundum legum et consuetudinem regni Angliæ, sine brevi regis placitari non debent.—2 Inst. 311.—(Pleas relating to charters or writings touching freehold ought not to be pleaded in courts not of record, by the law and custom of England, without the king's writ.)

Placita de catallis, debitis, &c., quæ summam 40*s. attingunt, vel eam excedunt secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ sine brevi regis placitari non debent.*—2 Inst. 312.—(Pleas of chattels, debts, &c., which amount to 40*s.* or exceed it, by the law and custom of England, ought not to be pleaded without the king's writ.)

Placita de transgressione contra pacem regis, in regno Angliæ vi et armis facta, secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ sine brevi regis placitari non debent.—2 Inst. 311.—(Pleas of trespass against the peace of the king in the kingdom of England, made with force and arms, ought not, by the law and custom of England, to be pleaded without the king's writ.)

Placitare, to plead.

Placitator, a pleader.

Placitory, relating to pleas or pleading.

Placitum nominatum, the day appointed for a criminal to appear and plead and make his defence.—Leg. H. 1, c. xxix. Placitum pactum, when the day is past.

Placitum aliud personale, aliud reale, aliud mixtum.—Co. Litt. 284.—(Pleas are personal, real, and mixed.)

Plaga, a wound.

Plagiarist, or Plagiary, a thief in literature; one who publishes the thoughts and writings of another as his own.

Plagiarius, one who knowingly kept in irons, or confined, sold, gave, or bought a citizen (whether freeborn or a freedman), or the slave of another; the offence being called plagium.—Civ. Law.

Plagiary [fr. plagiarius, Lat.], a man-stealer.

Plagii crimen, or Plagium, the stealing and retaining the children of freemen and slaves.—Civ. Law.

Plague [fr. πληγή, Gk., a wound], pestilence; a contagious and malignant fever.

By 1 Jac. I. c. 31, if any person infected with the plague, or dwelling in any infected house, should be commanded by the mayor or constable, or other head officer of his town or place, to keep his house, and should wilfully and contemptuously disobey such direction, he should be enforced with violence, by the watchmen appointed to obey such necessary command; and if any hurt ensued by such enforcement, the watchmen were not to be impeached. And further, if such person so commanded to confine himself went abroad and conversed in company, if he had any infectious sore upon him uncured he should suffer death as a felon; but if no such sore should be found upon him, he should be punished as a vagabond, and moreover bound to his good behaviour. This Act was abolished, however, by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 4. See QUARANTINE.

Plaideur, an attorney who pleaded the cause of his client; an advocate. Obsolete.

Plainant, a plaintiff.

Plaint [fr. plainte, Fr.; querela, Lat.], the statement in writing of a cause of action. It is the first process in an inferior court, in the nature of an original writ, because therein is briefly set forth the plaintiff's cause of action; and the judge is bound, of common right, to administer justice therein without a special mandate from the Crown.

Plaintiff [abbrev. plt., or plff., fr. plaintif, Fr.], he who commences a suit in law or equity against another, who is called defendant.

Plant, the fixtures, tools, machinery, and apparatus which are necessary to carry on a trade or business.—Ogil. Imp. Tech. Dict.

Plantation, a colony.

With respect to their internal policy, our colonies are of three sorts: (1) provincial establishments; (2) proprietary governments; (3) charter governments.—1 Step. Com. 103.

Play-debt, debt contracted by gaming.

Play-grounds, to facilitate grants of land for, see 22 Vict. c. 27; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 30.

Plea [fr. plée, Fr.], a defendant's answer of fact to a plaintiff's declaration; anciently a suit or action.

Pleas are divided into common pleas, relating to civil causes, and pleas of the Crown, relating to criminal prosecutions.

At common law pleas are divided into—

(1) Dilatory; which are subdivided into—
- (a) To the jurisdiction of the court.
- (b) In suspension of the action.
- (c) In abatement of the writ or declaration, and—

(2) Peremptory, i. e. in bar of the action.

The distinction between these two classes of pleas is, that the dilatory show some ground for quashing the declaration, the peremptory, for defeating the action.

The invariable order of pleading is as follows:—

(1) To the jurisdiction of the court.
(2) To the disability of the person
- (a) Of plaintiff.
- (b) Of defendant.

(3) To the count or declaration.
(4) To the writ.
(5) To the action itself in bar thereof.

In equity, a plea is resorted to by a defendant when an objection is not apparent on the bill itself, or, as the technical phrase is, where it arises from matter dehors the bill. If the defendant means to take advantage of it, he ought to show the matter which creates the objection to the court, either by plea or by answer. A plea is a special answer, showing or relying upon one or more things, as a cause why the suit should either be dismissed, delayed, or debarred. Pleas are divided into two sorts: (1) pure pleas, which rely wholly on matter dehors the bill, such as a release or a settled account; and, (2) anomalous or negative pleas, which consist mainly of denials of the substantial matters set forth in the bill.

(1) To original bills praying relief, the appropriate defences by pleas may be thus divided:—
- (a) To the jurisdiction.
- (b) To the person.
- (c) To the frame or form of the bill.
- (d) In bar to the bill.

(a) Pleas to the jurisdiction are either—

(1) That the subject of the bill is not within the cognizance of any municipal court of justice.

(2) That it is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

(3) That some other court of equity is invested with the proper jurisdiction.

(4) That some court other than a court of equity possesses the proper jurisdiction.

(b) Pleas to the person are either—

(1) To the person of the plaintiff, as
- (α) Outlawry.
- (β) Excommunication.
- (γ) Popish-recusant-convict.
- (δ) Attainder.
- (ε) Alienage.
- (ζ) Infancy.
- (η) Coverture.
- (ϑ) Idiocy or lunacy.
- (ι) Bankruptcy or insolvency.
- (κ) Want of the character in which the plaintiff sues.

(2) To the person of the defendant, as that he does not possess the character in which he is sued.

(c) Pleas to the bill are either—
- (1) The pendency of another suit.
- (2) Proper parties.
- (3) Multiplicity.
- (4) Multifariousness.

(d) Pleas in bar are either—

(A) Founded on some bar created by statute, as—
- (α) A statute of limitation.
- (β) The Statute of Frauds.
- (γ) Any other public or private statute.
- (δ) The plea of a statute, fine, and non-claim.

(B) Founded on matter of record, or as of record in some court, as—
- (α) A common recovery
- (β) Judgment at law in a court of record. } of record.
- (γ) The sentence or judgment of a foreign tribunal (which is deemed to be a court not of record) upon the same matter put in controversy by the bill } as of record.
- (δ) A decree in a court of equity

(C) Of matter purely in pais, i. e. upon matter of fact, not of record, as—
- (α) Release.
- (β) Stated account.
- (γ) Settled account.
- (δ) Award.
- (ε) Purchase for valuable consideration.
- (ζ) Title in the defendant, generally founded on a will, conveyance, or long peaceable and adverse possession.

(2) To bills of discovery, the most usual pleas are:—
- (a) That the discovery may subject the defendant to pains or penalties, or a criminal prosecution.
- (b) That it will subject him to a forfeiture, or something in the nature of a forfeiture.
- (c) That it will betray the confidence reposed in him as counsel, attorney, solicitor, or arbitrator.
- (d) That he is a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the plaintiff's title.

(3) To bills not original, a plea must be resorted to, when the objection is not on the face of the bill; or the want of proper parties or a statute of limitations may be pleaded.

(a) To cross bills, the same pleas are applicable as to original bills.

(b) To bills of review, and bills in the nature of bills of review, a plea of the decree may be resorted to. And where any matter beyond the decree, as length of time, a purchase for a valuable consideration, or any other matter, is to be offered against opening the enrolment, it must be pleaded.

(c) The proper defence to a bill seeking to impeach a decree on the ground of fraud, is a plea of the decree, denying the fraud, supported by an answer also, meeting the charges of fraud.

(d) To bills to carry decrees into execution, the defendant may plead no right or interest, if the matter be not apparent on the bill, so as to admit of a demurrer.—Story's Eq. Plead. 492, and Smi. Ch. Pr. 300.

The defendant's pleas in ecclesiastical causes are called allegations.

The order of a prisoner's pleas in criminal law is as follows:—

(1) To the jurisdiction.
(2) In abatement.
(3) Special pleas in bar, as (a) Auterfois acquit.
  (b) Auterfois convict.
  (c) Auterfois attaint.
  (d) Pardon.
(4) General issue of not guilty.

Plead, to make an allegation in a cause; also to argue a cause in court.

Pleadable briefs, precepts directed to the sheriffs, who thereupon cite parties, and hear and determine.—Scotch phrase.

Pleader [fr. narrator, Lat.], one who draws pleadings.

Pleading, in its general sense, the proceedings from the declaration to issue joined, i. e. the adverse statements of the parties; in its specific sense, a defendant's answer to a plaintiff's declaration.

The science of pleading was no doubt derived from Normandy. The use of stated forms of pleading is not to be traced among the Anglo-Saxons. Pleading was cultivated as a science in the reign of Edward I. The object of pleading is to ascertain, by the production of an issue, the subject for decision.

I. The rules which tend simply to the production of an issue are—

(a) That after declaration, the parties must at each stage demur, or plead, either by way of traverse, or by way of confession and avoidance; and as to the nature and property of pleadings in general, without reference to their being by traverse or by confession and avoidance, the properties are:—

(a) That every pleading must be an answer to the whole of what is adversely alleged.

(β) That every pleading is taken to confess such traversable matters alleged on the other side as it does not traverse, but dilatory pleas and pleas by estoppel are exceptions, as also a new assignment.

(b) That upon a traverse issue must be tendered.

(c) That an issue well tendered must be accepted.

II. The rule which tends to secure the materiality of the issue is—

(a) That all pleadings must contain matter pertinent and material; for a traverse must not be taken of an immaterial point, and a traverse must be neither too large nor too narrow.

III. The rules which tend to produce singleness or unity in the issue are—

(a) That pleadings must not be double.

(b) But it is allowable both to plead and to demur to the same matter by leave of the courts or a judge.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 80.

IV. The rules which tend to produce certainty or particularity in the issue are—

(a) That the pleadings must have certainty of place.

(b) That the pleadings must have certainty of time.

(c) That the pleadings must specify quality, quantity, and value.

(d) That the pleadings must specify the names of persons, whether parties to the suit, or parties of whom mention is made in the pleading.

(e) That the pleadings must show title.

(f) That the pleadings must show authority.

(g) That in general whatever is alleged in pleading must be alleged with certainty.

The rules which tend to certainty are limited and restricted by the following subordinate rules:—

(a) It is not necessary in pleading to state that which is merely matter of evidence.

(β) It is not necessary to state matter of which the court takes notice ex officio.

(γ) It is not necessary to state matter which would come more properly from the other side.

(δ) It is not necessary to allege circumstances necessarily implied.

(ε) It is not necessary to allege what the law will presume.

(ζ) A general mode of pleading is allowed where great prolixity is thereby avoided.

(η) A general mode of pleading is often sufficient, where the allegation on the other side must reduce the matter to certainty.

(θ) No greater particularity is required than the nature of the thing pleaded will conveniently admit.

(ι) Less particularity is required when the facts lie more in the knowledge of the opposite party than of the party pleading.

(κ) Less particularity is necessary in the statement of matters of inducement or aggravation than in the main allegations.

(λ) With respect to acts valid at common law, but regulated as to the mode of performance by statute, it is sufficient to use such certainty of allegation as was sufficient before the statute.

V. The rules which tend to prevent obscurity and confusion in pleading are—

(a) That the pleadings must not be insensible or repugnant.

(b) That the pleadings must not be ambiguous or doubtful in meaning; and when two different meanings present themselves, that construction shall be adopted which is the more unfavorable to the party pleading.

(c) That the pleadings must not be argumentative.

(d) That the pleadings must not be hypothetical or in the alternative.

(e) That the pleadings must not be by way of recital, but must be positive in their form.

(f) That things are to be pleaded according to their legal effect or operation.

(g) That the pleading should observe the ancient and known forms of expression as contained in approved precedents.

(h) But formal commencements and conclusions are dispensed with.

(i) That a pleading which is bad in part is bad altogether.

VI. The rules which tend to prevent prolixity and delay in pleading are—

(a) That there must be no departure in pleading.

(b) That where a plea amounts to the general issue it should be so pleaded.

(c) That surplusage is to be avoided.

VII. The other miscellaneous rules are—

(a) That the declaration must be conformable to the writ.

(b) That the declaration shall have its proper commencement, and should in conclusion lay damages and allege production of suit.

(c) That pleas must be pleaded in due order. See PLEA.

(d) That pleas in abatement must give the plaintiff a better writ or declaration.

(e) That dilatory pleas must be pleaded at a preliminary stage of the suit.

(f) But pleadings do no longer conclude to the country or with a verification.

(g) And profert of a deed is dispensed with.

h) That all pleadings must be properly entitled.

(i) That all pleadings ought to be true.—Step. Plead. 148–490.

The order of the pleadings at common law in all actions (except replevin) is as follows:—

(1) Declaration.
(2) Plea.
(3) Replication.
(4) Rejoinder.
(5) Surrejoinder.
(6) Rebutter.
(7) Surrebutter; after which the pleadings have no distinctive names, for beyond this stage they are very seldom found to extend.

The pleadings numbered 1, 3, 5, 7, emanate from the plaintiff, the remainder from the defendant. See DEMURRER and NEW ASSIGNMENT.

The pleadings in replevin are as follow:—

(1) Plaint or declaration.
(2) Avowry, cognizance, or plea of non cepit.
(3) Plea in bar.
(4) Replication, &c., the ordinary name of each pleading being postponed by one step. See REPLEVIN.

The pleadings in equity are thus arranged:—

(1) Bill or information.
(2) Answer, plea, demurrer, or disclaimer.
(3) Replication.

The pleadings in criminal law are—

(1) Indictment or information.
(2) Plea or demurrer.
(3) Similiter or joinder.

The pleadings in ecclesiastical causes are—

I. In criminal causes:
(a) The articles.
II. In plenary causes, not criminal:
(a) The libel.

The pleadings in testamentary causes are—

(1) Declaration.
(2) Plea.
(3) Replication.
(4) Rejoinder.
(5) Surrejoinder.
(6) Rebutter.
(7) Surrebutter, &c. Also demurrer.

The pleadings in divorce and matrimonial causes are—

(1) Petition.
(2) Answer.
(3) Replication.
(4) Rejoinder.
(5) Surrejoinder.
(6) Rebutter.
(7) Surrebutter, &c. Also demurrer.

Pleas of the Crown, the criminal law department of our jurisprudence; so called, because the Sovereign, in whom centres the majesty of the whole community, is supposed by the law to be the person injured by every wrong done to that community, and is, therefore, in all cases the proper prosecutor for every such offence.

Pleasure grounds. As to those on Kennington Common, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 29.

Plebania, a mother-church.—Old Record.

Plebanus, a rural dean.

Plebeity, or Plebity, the common or meaner sort of people; the plebeians.

Plebiscite, or Plebiscitum, among the Romans, a law enacted by the common people, at the request of the tribune or some other plebeian magistrate, without the intervention of the senate; more particularly applied to the law which the people made, when, upon some misunderstanding with the senate they retired to the Aventine mount.

Pledge, anything put to pawn or given by way of warrant or security; also a surety, bail, or hostage. See PAWN.

There are two kinds of estate held in pledge, vifgage and mortgage.

Pledgee, one who pledges; a pawnee.

Pledger, one who offers a pledge, a pawner.

Pledgery, suretyship, or an undertaking or answering for another.

Plegiis acquietandis, a writ that anciently lay for a surety against him for whom he was surety, if he paid not the money at the day.—F. N. B. 137.

Plegii de prosequendo, pledges to prosecute with effect an action of replevin.

Plegii de retorno habendo, pledges to return the subject of distress, should the right be determined against the party bringing the action of replevin.

Plena forisfactura, a forfeiture of all that one possesses.

Plena probatio, testimony by two witnesses. Civ. Law.

Plena et celeris justitia fiat partibus.—4 Inst. 67.—(Let full and speedy justice be done to the parties.)

Plenarty, said of a benefice when full or possessed by an incumbent, opposed to vacancy.

Plenary, full, complete; an ordinary proceeding through all its gradations and formal steps, opposed to summary.

Plenary causes in the ecclesiastical courts are reduced to the following:—

(1) Suits for ecclesiastical dilapidations.

(2) Suits relating to seats or sitting-places in churches.

(3) Suits for tithes.

Plene administravit (he has fully administered). If an executor or administrator plead that he has fully administered all the assets that have come to his hands, the plaintiff, if he cannot dispute the plea, and there are other assets to be received, should sign judgment of assets quando acciderint, and then, when assets afterwards come to the executor's hands, the plaintiff should sue out a scire facias, or writ of revivor against the executor, and proceed to realize the judgment.—C. L. P. A. 1854, s. 91. See Williams on Executors, 1767.

Plene administravit præter (he has fully administered, except). When an executor or administrator pleads that he has fully administered the assets that have come to his hands, except, &c., the plaintiff, if he cannot dispute the plea, should sign judgment presently of the assets acknowledged to be in the defendant's hands, and of assets in futuro for the residue. See Williams on Executors, 1770.

Plene computavit (he has fully accounted).

Plenipotentiary, a person who has full power and commission to do anything.

Plenum dominium, a title combining the right and the corporal possession of property, which possession could not be acquired without both an actual intention to possess, and an actual seisin or entry into the premises, or part of them, in the name of the whole.—Civ. Law.

Plevin [fr. plevina, low Lat.], a warrant or assurance.

Plight, signifieth an estate, with the habit and quality of the land; it extends to a rent-charge and to a possibility of dower.—Co. Litt. 221 b.

Plok-penin, a kind of earnest used in public sales at Amsterdam.

Plough-alms [eleemosynæ aratrales, Lat.], the ancient payment of a penny to the church from every plough-land.

Plough-bote, a tenant's right to take wood for the repairs of ploughs, carts, and harrows, and for making rakes, forks, &c.

Plough-land, a hide of land, a carucate, which see.—Co. Litt. 69 a; 86 b.

Plough-Monday, the Monday after Twelfth-Day.

Plough-silver, money formerly paid by some tenants, in lieu of service to plough the lord's lands.

Plowden's (Edm.) Commentaries or Reports, first published in 1571. They contain cases from 4 Edw. VI. to 20 Eliz. The manner in which Plowden has reported the decisions of courts is peculiarly his own, no one having either set him a model or attempted to rival him. After having stated, in a clear manner, the case and matters of doubt to be resolved, he gives the arguments of the counsel on both sides at length, always following the course of reasoning precisely, with the topics and precedents quoted by each, in the exact style of a formal debate. In reporting the judgment of the court, he gives severally the opinions of the judges at length. A case discussed in this ample way, with all the argument of each side considered, distinguished, and commented on by the experience and learning of the bench, must be so thoroughly sifted as to make it impossible for the reader not to discern the true points involved in it, and the ground upon which it was determined. Most of the cases in this book are upon demurrers or special verdicts, and there are generally the pleadings annexed. Whether all arguments and opinions were delivered in court precisely in the detail in which we have found them in Plowden; or whether the reporter, who says that his practice was to make himself master of the case in all its points, before he heard it argued, re-touched them according to his own fancy afterwards, it is certain that the principles and great leading rules of law are opened and explained with an acuteness rarely discovered in other books; and points are maintained and canvassed with a certain wary closeness of reasoning peculiar to this writer, so that altogether it is one of the most instructive and most entertaining books in the law.—5 Reeves, c. xxxv., p. 241.

Plunderage, embezzling goods on shipboard. Mar. Law.

Pluralist, one that holds more than one ecclesiastical benefice, with cure of souls.

Pluralis numerus est duobus contentus.—1 Rol. Rep. 476.—(The plural number is contained in two.)

Pluralitas idem sentientium semper superat, quia facilius invenitur quod à pluribus quæritur. (A multitude of persons thinking the same always prevails, because that which is sought by many is more easily found out.)

Plurality, two or more benefices.

By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106 (repealing the former statute against pluralities, 21 Hen. VIII. c. 13), and by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 98, it is enacted, that in future (and subject to exception in the case of rights already vested) no spiritual person shall take and hold together any two benefices, except in the case of two benefices the churches of which are within three miles of one another by the nearest road, and the annual value of one of which does not exceed 100*l.*; that no spiritual person holding a benefice, with cure of souls, with a population of more than 3,000, shall take to hold therewith any other, having a population of more than 500, nor vice versâ; that no spiritual person holding more than one benefice, with cure of souls, shall take to hold therewith any other or any cathedral preferment; and that upon every admission to a new benefice or preferment contrary to the acts, every benefice previously held shall be void ipso facto. These prohibitions, however, in respect of population and yearly value, are subject to a provision enabling the Archbishop of Canterbury to grant a dispensation therefrom in certain cases, on recommendation of the bishop of the diocese. And see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127.

Pluries (as often), a writ that issues in the third instance after the first and the alias have been ineffectual.)

Plus exempla quam peccata nocent.—(Examples hurt more than crimes.)

Plus peccat auctor quam actor.—5 Co. 99.—(The causer offends more than the performer.)

Plus-petitio, or Pluris-petitio, when a demandant includes in his demand (in the intentio of the formula) more than his due. It happens in four ways. See Com. C. L., p. 347; Sand. Just. 551.

Plus valet unus oculatus testis quam auriti decem.—4 Inst. 279.—(One eye witness is better than ten ear witnesses.)

Plus valet quod agitur quam quod simulatè concipitur.—(What is done more avails than what is feignedly conceived.)

Plus valet vulgaris consuetudo quam regalis concessio.—Co. Cop. s. 31.—(Common custom is better than royal grant.)

Plus vident oculi quam oculus.—4 Inst. 160. (Eyes see more than one eye.)

Poach [fr. pocher, Fr., to thrust or dig, to poch into or encroach upon another man's employment, practice, or trade.—Cot. To thrust into, scil. another man's ground, another man's property, and hence to purloin, to steal, to plunder. Rich. Dict.], to steal game on a man's land.

Poacher, one who poaches.

Poaching, stealing game.

By 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, s. 1, extended by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 29, it is provided, that if any person shall by night unlawfully take or destroy any game or rabbits in any land (whether open or enclosed), or on any public road, highway, or path, or the sides thereof, or at the openings, outlets, or gates from any such lands into such roads, or shall, by night, be in such places with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument, for the purpose of taking or destroying game, he shall be liable to imprisonment, for the first offence, for any period not exceeding three months, with hard labor, and at the expiration of such period to be bound over to his good behaviour by sureties for a year, or in default thereof, to be further imprisoned for six months, or until such sureties are found. For a second offence he shall be liable to imprisonment for six months, and then to be bound in sureties for two years; and in default thereof to be further imprisoned for one year, or until such sureties are found. And if such person shall offend a third time, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to penal servitude for not more than seven nor less than three years, or imprisoned with hard labor, for any time not exceeding two years. It is moreover provided that when any person shall be found committing such offence, it shall be lawful for the owner or occupier of the land, or for any person having a right of free warren or free chase therein, or for the lord of the manor, or for the gamekeeper or servant of such persons, or their assistants, to seize and apprehend such persons so offending; and in case such offender shall assault or offer any violence with any offensive weapon whatsoever towards such person so authorized to apprehend him, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to penal servitude for not more than seven nor less than three years, or imprisoned with hard labor for any term not exceeding two years.

It is also enacted (s. 9), that if any persons, to the number of three or more, shall by night unlawfully enter such lands or roads, for the purpose of taking or destroying any game or rabbits (any of them being armed with any gun or other offensive weapon), each of such persons shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to penal servitude for any term not more than fourteen years nor less than seven years, or imprisonment with hard labor for not more than three years.

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, 'An Act for the Prevention of Poaching,' power is given to any constable or police officer, in any highway, street, or public place, to search any person whom he may have good cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, or any person aiding and abetting such person, and having in his possession any game unlawfully obtained, or any gun, part of gun, or nets or engines used for the killing or taking game, and also to stop and search any cart or other conveyance in or upon which such constable or peace officer shall have good cause to suspect that any such game, or any such article or thing is being carried by any such person, and should there be found any game, or any such article or thing as aforesaid, upon such person, cart, or other conveyance, to seize and detain such game, article, or thing; and such constable or police officer shall in such case apply to some justice for a summons, citing such person to appear before two justices in England and Ireland, and before a sheriff or two justices in Scotland; and if such person shall have obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or shall have used any such article or thing as aforesaid for unlawfully killing or taking game, or shall have been accessory thereto, such person shall, on being convicted thereof, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l*., and shall forfeit such game, guns, parts of guns, nets, and engines (s. 2). An appeal against a summary conviction is given to the quarter-sessions (s. 6). The word 'game' includes hares, pheasants, partridges, eggs of pheasants and partridges, woodcocks, snipes, rabbits, grouse, black or moor game, and eggs of grouse, black or moor game (s. 1).

Pocket-judgment, a statute-merchant which is enforceable at any time after non-payment on the day assigned, without further proceedings.

Pocket-Sheriff, when the sovereign appoints a person sheriff who is not one of the three nominated in the Exchequer, he is called a pocket-sheriff.—1 Bl. Com. 342.

Poinding, the Scotch term for taking goods, &c., in execution, or by way of distress. It is defined to be 'the diligence (process) which the law has devised for transferring the property of the debtor to the creditor in payment of his debt.' It is either real or personal; not that any inheritance is conveyed by poinding, but real poinding is a power of carrying off the effects on the land in payment of such debts as are debita fundi, or heritable; personal poinding is the poinding of movables for debt or for rent, &c. There is also a species of poinding by attaching cattle trespassing.—33 Geo. III. c. 74, s. 5.

Poison [poison, Fr.; ponzoña, Sp.; fr. potio, Lat., a drink, applied originally to a medicated drink or draught; a drink in which some venomous morsel or deadly ingredient is mixed; and now to any venomous morsel or deadly ingredient. See Rich. Dict.], a substance which, on being applied to the human body, internally or externally, is capable of destroying the action of the vital functions, or of placing the solids and fluids in such a state as to prevent the continuance of life.

The means of ascertaining the traces of poison, either on the living or dead body, is one of the most important subjects in legal medicine, and its importance is only equalled by its difficulty.

Poisons may be introduced into the system in various ways; through the nose, in the form of odours; through the lungs, by inspiration by the mouth and œsophagus; in the form of food; by the rectum, in the form of injection; through the skin, in some instances, by absorption.

The rapidity of the action of poisons varies considerably. Concentrated hydrocyanic acid destroys an adult man almost in an instant, while other poisons take away life within an hour, a few hours, a day, or a longer period. Some prove fatal after months, or a year.

It is deemed murder, if the person poisoned die within the year; but, in Scotland, a person may be punished, although death take place at a period indefinitely remote, provided the operation of the poison can be distinctly traced as causing it.

Professor Christison considers poisons under the three grand classes of

(A) Irritants,

(B) Narcotics, and

(C) Narcotico-acrids, or nicotico-irritants.

There is a fourth class, viz. Septics, consisting of animal poisons, such as the bites of rabid animals and snakes, stings of insects, and the effects of pestilential carbuncle. For another classification of poisons, see Dung. 732–740, and Wharton's Articled Clerks' Manual, p. 606, 8th edit.

(1) Signs of poison on the living body.

A person is supposed to be poisoned, if, being in perfect health, he is attacked, after having taken some food or drink, with violent pain, cramp in the stomach, nausea, vomiting, convulsive action, and a sense of suffocation; or if he be seized, under the same circumstances, with vertigo, giddiness, delirium, or unusual drowsiness.

The class of irritant poisons comprehends both those symptoms which have a purely local irritating action, and likewise many which also act remotely, but whose most prominent feature of action still is the inflammation they excite wherever they are applied.

A narcotic poison produces the following effects: stupor, numbness, a great inclination to sleep, coldness, and stiffness of the extremities, a cold sweat of a fœtid or greasy nature, swelling of the neck and face, protrusion of the eye, with a haggard cast of countenance, thickening of the tongue, frequent vertigo, weakened eyesight, or objects presented to it in a fantastic manner, coma, delirium, general debility, palpitation of the heart, the pulse at first full and strong, but afterwards unequal and intermittent, paralysis of the lower extremities, retraction of the lips, general swelling of the body, and dilatation of the anus.

The narcotico-acrid poisons are distinguished by a combination of several of the above symptoms: they are agitation, pain, acute cries, sometimes stupor and convulsive motions of the muscles of the face, jaws, and extremities; vertigo, and occasionally extreme stiffness of the limbs and contraction of the muscles of the thorax; the eyes red and starting from their sockets, the pupils frequently dilated, insensibility to external impressions, mouth full of foam, tongue and gums hard, nausea, vomiting, frequent stools; often these symptoms attack in paroxysms.

It is a very difficult question to determine whether poisoning is the result of suicide or homicide. An opinion can only be formed from moral consideration, and a notice of the following is recommended by Foderé. The previous state of the mind of the deceased—whether he has been subject to delirium, also if he have not met with losses—have been disappointed in his hopes, or suffering under disgrace. Also, whether any of the persons with whom he lived or associated had any interest in his death. The season of the year also deserves consideration, for suicides are most frequent during the period of the solstices and the equinoxes. It should be ascertained whether the patient, instead of complaining, remains quiet, seeks solitude, and refuses the aid of medical men, &c. Any kind of writing left by the individual to express his last wishes, as it is the most common, so it is also the most certain proof of self-destruction. But finding a part of the poison in the room or in his pockets, is evidently a very equivocal proof, since it may quite as easily be put there by others as by himself.

(2) Signs of poisons on the dead body.

The irritant poisons generally produce inflammation of the first passages, and occasionally constrictions of the intestinal canal, perforations or preternatural softness of the interior coats, and sometimes, though rarely, gangrene and sphacelus. The inflammation varies as to extent and intensity.

The effects of narcotic poisons are far from being marked or even peculiar. Dr. Christison observes, that the morbid appearances left by them on the dead body are commonly insignificant. Sometimes, however, the veins of the brain are much gorged with blood, and the ventricles and membranes contain serosity. The blood appears to be sometimes altered in its nature, but these changes are by no means invariable, and are sometimes not remarked at all.

Some of the narcotico-acrid poisons are capable of exciting severe inflammation, accompanied occasionally with ulceration, whilst others do not inflame. The lungs, blood, brain, and other organs, present, in general, the same alterations as are induced by the narcotics.

A poisonous substance is sometimes introduced after death, with a view of accusing an innocent person of the crime. Orfila ascertained that when poisons were introduced into the alimentary canal twenty-four hours after death, they did not excite redness or inflammation, because life is entirely destroyed in the capillary vessels. It is only when they are employed an hour or two after death that the inflammatory phenomena, accompanied with the line of demarcation, are capable of occurring.

(A) Irritant poisons have been divided into seven orders or groups:—

(α) The acids and their bases, as sulphuric acid, nitric acid, muriatic acid, acetic acid, oxalic acid, phosphorus, iodine, hydriodate of potash, bromine, hydrobromate of potash.

(β) The alkalies and their salts, as potash, sub-carbonate of potash, nitrate of potash, soda, ammonia, muriate of ammonia, quicklime, oxy-muriate of lime, chloride of soda, liver of sulphur, sulphuret of soda. The alkalies and their salts should be placed amongst the metallics according to strict chemistry.

Dr. Tartra arranges the cases of poisoning by nitric acid into four classes:—1st, when the death is speedy, for it is never sudden, it commonly takes place from the primary effects in about twenty-four hours, varying from six to forty-eight hours; 2nd, when it proves fatal from its secondary effects, at various distances of time, from fifteen days to some years; 3rd, when death does not take place, but the recovery is imperfect; 4th, when a perfect cure is sooner or later obtained.

(γ) The metallic compounds, as arsenic, mercury, the most important compound of which, in its relation to legal medicine, is corrosive sublimate, antimony, copper, zinc, tin, silver, gold, platina, bismuth, iron, lead, chrome, barytes, and its salts.

(δ) The vegetable acrids or irritants, of which the following is a botanical arrangement:—

Cucurbitaceæ.—Bryonia, Momordica, Cucumis.

Euphorbiaceæ.—Euphorbia, Ricinus, Jatropha, Hippomane, Croton.

Ranunculaceæ.—Ranunculus, Anemone, Caltha, Delphinium, Clematis.

Papaveraceæ.—Chelidonium.

Thymelææ.—Daphne.

Convolvulaceæ.—Convolvulus.

Amaryllidæ.—Narcissus.

Scrophularineæ.—Pedicularis, Gratiola.

Guttiferæ.—Stalagmites.

Coniferæ.—Juniperus.

Anacardiaceæ.—Rhus.

Ficoideæ.—Sedum.

Ericeæ.—Rhododendron.

Primulaceæ.—Cyclamen.

Plumbagineæ.—Plumbago.

Lobeliaceæ.—Lobelia.

Umbelliferæ.—Pastinaca, Hydrocotyle.

Phytolacceæ.—Phytolacca.

Aroideæ.—Calla, Arum.

Caprifoliaceæ.—Sambucus.

(ε) Animal irritants, as cantharides, lytta vittata. Poisonous serpents, as the viper, rattlesnake, scorpion, tarantula, spider, bee, wasp, hornet. Poisonous fishes, as the mussel, oyster, crab, lobster, mackerel, at certain seasons of the year; and several in the Indies.

(ζ) Mechanical irritants, as glass and enamel in powder.

(η) Irritant gases, as chlorine, nitrous acid vapour, muriatic acid gas, sulphurous acid gas, seleniuretted hydrogen gas.

(B) Narcotic poisons, defined by Orfila to be those which produce stupor, drowsiness, paralysis, or apoplexy, and convulsions. 'The term narcotism,' says Dr. Christison, 'has been used by different writers with different significations, but is now generally understood to denote the effects of such poisons as bring on a state of the system like that caused by apoplexy, epilepsy, or other disorders commonly called nervous. Narcotic poisons, therefore, are such as produce chiefly or solely symptoms of a disorder of the nervous system.' Under this division the following substances are commonly arranged:—

VEGETABLE NARCOTICS.

Papaveraceæ.—Papaver, Morphine, Narcotine.

Solaneæ.—Hyoscyamus, Solanum, Physalis.

Compositæ.—Lactuca.

Coniferæ.—Taxus.

Smilaceæ.—Paris.

Ranunculaceæ.—Actæa.

Rutaceæ.—Peganum.

Ericeæ.—Azalea.

Amygdaleæ.—Prunus, Cerasus, Amygdalus Persica.

Pomaceæ.—Sorbus.

PRUSSIC ACID (hydrocyanic acid).

CARBAZOTIC ACID.

NARCOTIC GASES.—Nitrogen, carbonic oxide, carburetted hydrogen, nitrous oxide, cyanogen gas, oxygen gas, hydrogen, sulphuretted hydrogen, carbonic acid gas.

(C) Narcotico-acrid poisons include those which possess a double action, the one local and irritating, like that of the irritants, the other remote, and consisting of an impression on the nervous system. Sometimes they cause narcotism, which is generally of a comatose nature, often attended with delirium; but in one very singular group there is neither insensibility nor delirium, but merely violent spasms. At other times they excite inflammation where they are applied; this effect, however, is by no means constant. Those which inflame the tissues where they are applied, rarely occasion death in this manner. Some of them may produce very violent local symptoms, but they generally prove fatal through their operation on the nervous system.

Orfila divides this class of poisons into six groups, which may be thus stated, although it must be added, that they pass insensibly into each other, and therefore cannot sometimes be well distinguished.

(1) Those whose principal symptom is delirium, as atropa, datura, stramonium, &c.

(2) Those whose principal symptom is tetanus, as nux vomica, strychnine, &c.

(3) Those which also excite convulsions, but at the same time cause impaired sensibility and sleep, as cocculus indicus, camphor, upas antiar.

(4) Poisonous mushrooms.

(5) Poisonous grain.

(6) Alcohol, ether, and empyreumatic oils. Beck's Med. Jurisp.; Taylor's Med. Jur.; and Christison on Poisons.

As to the administering or causing to be administered poison or other destructive thing, if the offence is committed with intent to commit murder, it is a felony, punishable with penal servitude for life or any term not exceeding three years, or with imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 11), and so is the attempt to administer with a like intent, whether any bodily injury be effected or not (s. 14).

The unlawful and malicious administering, or causing to be administered, any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, so as thereby to endanger life or to inflict grievous bodily harm, is a felony punishable by penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten nor less than three years, or imprisonment (s. 23).

The unlawful and malicious administering, or causing to be administered, any poison or other destructive or noxious thing with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy, is a misdemeanor, punishable by penal servitude for three years, or imprisonment (s. 24).

If the jury be satisfied that a person charged with felony under the 23rd sec. is guilty of misdemeanor under the 24th sec., but not guilty of felony, he may be found guilty of misdemeanor accordingly (s. 25).

Sec. 22 enacts that whosoever shall administer to or cause to be taken by, or attempt to apply or administer to, or attempt to cause to be administered to or taken by any person any chloroform, laudanum, or other stupefying or overpowering drug, matter, or thing, with intent thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit, or to assist any other person in committing, any indictable offence, shall be guilty of felony, and on conviction shall be liable to penal servitude for life, or any term not less than three years, or to imprisonment.

As to the taking or administering poison or other noxious thing, with intent to procure miscarriage, see s. 58, and ABORTION.

By 14 & 15 Vict. s. 13, certain restrictions are placed upon the sale of arsenic.

Poisoned Grain or Seed. The Poisoned Grain Prohibition Act (26 & 27 Vict. c. 113) imposes penalties upon persons selling or exposing for sale, and upon persons sowing or causing to be sown, poisoned grain, seed or meal (ss. 2 & 3), but solutions, or infusions, or materials for preparing any grain or seed for bonâ fide use in agriculture are not within the Act (s. 4).

Pole, a measure of five and a half yards.

Police [fr. πόλις, Gk., a city]. The regulation and government of a country or city, so far as regards its inhabitants. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 65; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 87; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 32; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 101. See METROPOLITAN POLICE ACTS.

Police office, a metropolitan court, where the stipendiary magistrates, who are chosen from barristers of a certain standing, sit from day to day for the despatch of business. Their general duties and powers are precisely the same as those pertaining to the unpaid magistracy, except that one of them may sometimes act in cases which would require to be heard before two other justices.

There are several police offices in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, severally situated in Bow Street, Covent Garden; Queen Street, Westminster; Great Marlborough Street; Clerkenwell; Worship Street, Shoreditch; Lambeth; High Street, Marylebone; Southwark; Stepney; Greenwich and Woolwich; Hammersmith and Wandsworth; and Metropolitan Police-office, Whitehall.

Policies of insurance, Court of. It was erected in pursuance of 43 Eliz. c. 12, which recites the immemorial usage of policies of assurance, 'by means whereof it cometh to pass, upon the loss or perishing of any ship, there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loss lighteth rather easily upon many than heavy upon few, and rather upon them that adventure not than upon those that do adventure; whereby all merchants, especially those of the younger sort, are allured to venture more willingly and more freely, and that heretofore such assurers had used to stand so justly and precisely upon their credits, as few or no controversies had arisen thereupon; and if any had grown, the same had from time to time been ended and ordered by certain grave and discreet merchants, appointed by the Lord Mayor of the city of London, as men by reason of their experience fittest to understand and speedily decide those causes;' but that of late years divers persons had withdrawn themselves from that cause of arbitration, and had driven the assured to bring separate actions at law against the assurer; it therefore enables the Lord Chancellor yearly to grant a standing commission to the Judge of the Admiralty, the Recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight merchants; any three of whom, one being a civilian or a barrister, are thereby, and by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 23, empowered to determine in a summary way all causes concerning policies of assurance in London, with an appeal by way of bill to the Court of Chancery; but the jurisdiction being somewhat defective, as extending only to London, and to no other assurances but those on merchandise, and to suits brought by the assured only, and not by the insurers, such commissions have been long wholly disused; and insurance-causes are now usually determined by the verdict of a jury of merchants, and the opinion of judges in case of any legal doubts; whereby the decision is more speedy, satisfactory, and final.—3 Bl. Com. 74.

Policy, the general principles by which a government is guided in its management of public affairs.

Policy of insurance, a contract between A. and B., that upon A.'s paying a premium equivalent to the hazard run, B. will indemnify or insure him against a particular event.

Upon a policy of marine or fire-insurance, the remedy of the assured in case of breach of contract by the insurer, is by covenant, where the policy is under seal; by assumpsit, where it is not. On a policy of life-insurance under seal, the remedy is by debt or covenant; on one not under seal, debt or indebitatus assumpsit. See INSURANCE.

Politicæ legibus non leges politiis adaptandæ. Hob. 154.—(Politics are to be adapted to the laws, and not the laws to politics.)

Political arithmetic, the art of making calculations on matters relating to a nation; the revenues, the value of land and effects, the produce of lands or manufactures, the population, and the general statistics of a country.

Political economy, the science which treats of the administration of the revenues of a nation; or the management and regulation of its resources, and productive property and labor. See Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and Mill's Pol. Eco.

Political, or Civil liberty, natural liberty, restrained by human law so far as is necessary and expedient for the public advantage.

Politics [fr. πολιτική, Gk.], the science of government; the art or practice of administering public affairs.

Polity [fr. πολιτεία, Gk., the government of a city], a form of government; civil constitution.

Poll [fr. polle, pol, Dut., the top; fr. the Su. Goth, bollur, a globe], the head; a catalogue or list of persons; a register of heads. Also the art of registering votes at an election. See DEED POLL.

Pollah, a Government lease granted to a cultivator, either written on paper or engraved with a style on a leaf of the Fan-palmyra tree. Indian.

Pollards, or Pollengers, trees which have been lopped, distinguished from timber-trees. Plowd. 469.

Pollicitation, an unaccepted promise.—Civil Law.

Polligar, Polygar, the head of a village or district; also a military chieftain in the peninsula answering to a hill zemindar in the northern Circars.—Indian.

Polling places. As to these, for the election of Members of Parliament, see 2 Wm. IV. c. 45; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 102; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 68; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 95.

Poll-money, Poll-silver, Poll-tax, a capitation-tax. It was formerly assessed by the head on every subject according to rank.

Polls, Challenge to the. See CHALLENGE.

Polyandry, the state of a woman who has several husbands.

Polygamia est plurium simul virorum uxorumve connubium.—3 Inst. 88.—(Polygamy is the marriage with many husbands or wives at one time.)

Polygamy [fr. πολὺς, Gk., many, and γάμος, marriage], plurality of wives or husbands. See BIGAMY.

It is prohibited by the Christian religion, but it is permitted by some others.

Polygamy was condemned by that primæval institution which, in order to secure the propagation of the species, joined in marriage one man and one woman.—Gen. i. 27. The old and pious patriarchs religiously observed this institution. But before the time of Moses, morals had become very much corrupted, and the prostitution not only of females but of boys was very common among many nations, and was even made a part of divine worship. To prevent these evils, to which the Greek and Roman philosophers refused, in progress of time, to oppose any decided resistance, Moses made many regulations, which may be found in several parts throughout the Pentateuch. Lameck is the first mentioned as having two wives, and the example which he set found no lack of imitation. After the deluge, the example of Noah and his sons was a good one, but it was not followed. Polygamy very much prevailed in the time of Moses, as we may gather from the fact, that the first born of 603,550 men, above twenty years of age, amounted merely to the number of 22,373.—Numb. iii. 42; Jahn's Bib. Antiq. pt. 1, c. x., ss. 150, 151.

Polygarchy [fr. πολύς, Gk., many, and ἀρχή, government], that kind of government which is in the hands of many.

Pondus, poundage, i. e. a duty paid to the Crown according to the weight of merchandise.

Pondus regis, the standard weight appointed by our ancient kings.—Cowel.

Pone. If goods had been replevied by virtue of a replegiari facias (which was rarely if ever the case) the plaint in a county-court was removed by writ of pone. It was an original writ obtained from the cursitor, bearing teste after the entry of the plaint in the county-court, and returnable on a general day in term, wheresoever, &c. It was also the proper writ to remove all suits which were before the sheriff by writ of justicies. Obsolete.

Pone per vadium, an obsolete writ to the sheriff to summon the defendant to appear and answer the plaintiff's suit, on his putting in sureties to prosecute: it was so called from the words of the writ, pone per vadium et salvos plegios—'put by gage and safe pledges, A. B., the defendant.' It issued out of the Common Pleas, being grounded on the non-appearance of the defendant, at the return of the original writ; and thereby the sheriff was commanded to attach him by taking gage, i. e. certain of his goods which he should forfeit if he did not appear; or by making him find safe pledges or sureties, who should be amerced in case of his non-appearance.—3 Bl. Com. 210.

Previous to the Uniformity of Process Act (2 Wm. IV. c. 39), it was also the first and immediate process, without any previous summons upon actions of trespass, vi et armis, or for other injuries which, though not forcible, were yet trespasses against the peace, as deceit and conspiracy, where the violence of the wrong required a more speedy remedy; and therefore the original writ commanded the defendant to be at once attached without any precedent warning. These actions are now commenced by a writ of summons.—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

Ponendis in assisis, an abolished writ to empannel juries.

Ponendum in ballium, a writ commanding that a prisoner be bailed in cases bailable.—Reg. Orig. 133.

Ponendum sigillum ad exceptionem, a writ by which justices are required to put their seals to exceptions exhibited by a defendant against a plaintiff's evidence, verdict, or other proceedings before them, according to the Stat. West. 2, 13 Ed. I. st. 1, c. 31. See BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Pontage [fr. pons, Lat., a bridge], duty paid for the reparation of bridges; also, a due to the lord of the fee for persons or merchandises that pass over rivers, bridges, &c.

Pontibus reparandis, a writ directed to the sheriff, &c., requiring him to charge one or more to repair a bridge.—Reg. Orig. 153.

Pool, a small lake of standing water. By the grant of a pool, both the land and water will pass.—Co. Litt. 5.

Poor Law Amendment Act, 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76.

Poor Laws. The poor of England, till the time of Henry VIII., subsisted entirely upon private benevolence, and the charity of well-disposed Christians. See 5 Reeves, 18.

The poor in Ireland had, till of late years, no relief but from private charity. But by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, intituled 'An Act for the more effectual Relief of the destitute Poor in Ireland,' the authority of the poor law commissioners was extended to that part of the realm. There is now an Irish board of commissioners. This Act has been amended by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 1; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 41; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 92; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 31, 90; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 25; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 68; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 37. As to the relief of the poor in Scotland, see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 83; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86, s. 6; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 117.

By 43 Eliz. c. 2, which is generally considered as the foundation of the modern poor law, overseers of the poor were appointed in every parish. It is provided by this statute, that the churchwardens of every parish shall be overseers of the poor; and that, besides these, there shall be appointed, as overseers in each parish, two, three, or four, but not more, of the inhabitants, such last-mentioned overseers to be substantial householders, and to be nominated yearly on the 25th March, or within 14 days after, by two justices dwelling near the parish.—54 Geo. III. c. 91.

Their office and duty, according to the same statute, were principally these: 1st, to provide work for all persons who had no means to maintain themselves, and used no ordinary trade; and 2ndly, to raise competent sums for the necessary relief of the lame, impotent, old, blind, and such others being poor, and not able to work. For these joint purposes they were empowered to make and levy rates upon the several inhabitants of the parish.

By 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76 (the Poor Law Amendment Act), the administration of the parochial funds, and the management of the poor throughout the country, were placed, for a period of five years, under the superintendence and control of a central board of three persons (the Crown being empowered to appoint a fourth, by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, s. 119), called 'The Poor Law Commissioners,' who had power to make such regulations as they thought proper, for guidance of the parochial authorities (whether consisting of guardians, select vestries, or overseers), and who were aided in their operations by a certain number of assistant commissioners.

This commission was subsequently extended to the year 1847, and was then superseded. But in lieu thereof a new board of Commissioners was established (for five years), by 10

& 11 Vict. c. 109, under the style of 'Commissioners for administering the Laws for the Relief of the Poor in England,' to consist of the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the time being, in virtue of their offices, and of such other persons as her Majesty by letters-patent or commission shall appoint; and to this board (which has since received the appellation of the 'Poor Law Board,' (12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 21), and been continued for further periods (17 & 18 Vict. c. 41; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 101; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 55), all the powers and duties of the former poor law commissioners are transferred. The person first named in such letters-patent or commission is 'President;' and all general rules—a term which for the purposes of this Act is declared to extend to all rules directed to affect more than one union—promulgated by this commission, must be under the seal of the body, and under the hands of a quorum, of whom the president must be one, and any such rule may be disallowed by her Majesty in council. They are, moreover, directed once in every year, to submit to both houses of Parliament a general report of their proceedings. By the Poor Law Amendment Act in connection with the new Act of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 109, the commissioners are empowered, when they think it desirable, to direct that the relief of the poor in any parish shall be administered by a board of guardians, to be elected by the owners of property and rate-payers in such parish, in such manner as in the Acts particularised. And they are directed to appoint a certain number of Inspectors, for the purpose of exercising a visitorial power over workhouses, and of being present at meetings of guardians, or other local meetings held for the relief of the poor. They are also entrusted by the legislature with the important power of consolidating at their own discretion, so far as the relief and management of the poor is concerned, several parishes into one united body or union, under the government of a single board of guardians, to be elected by the owners and rate-payers of the component parishes; and the united parishes are to have a common workhouse provided and maintained at their common expense, though each is to remain separately chargeable with the expense of its own poor, whether relieved in or out of such workhouse. The principle of consolidation may indeed be carried further, if such a measure shall appear expedient to those who represent the different parochial interests; for by consent of the guardians in any union (whether under the Act, or previously existing), the component parishes may (under sanction of the commissioners) be united for the purpose of settlement and of rating, as well as that of relief and management. On the other hand, however, it is provided that no union shall in future take place under Gilbert's Act, without the previous consent of the commissioners. The following statutes have been passed since the 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, for the continuation and amendment of the modern poor-law system: 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 69; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 107; 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 50; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 25 & 56; 2 & 3 Vict. cc. 83 & 84; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 42; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 57; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 109; 11 & 12 Vict. cc. 81, 82, 110 & 111; 12 & 13 Vict. cc. 13 & 103; 13 & 14 Vict. cc. 11 & 101; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105; 15 & 16 Vict. cc. 14 & 59; 20 Vict. c. 13, which expired in 1860.

According to the present law, a settlement is acquired by the following methods:—1st, By birth; for wherever a child is first known to be, that is always primâ facie, and until some other can be shown, the place of its settlement. But if its parents can be proved to have acquired a settlement, either by birth or otherwise in another parish, then the primâ facie settlement of the child will be superseded by a derivative one, viz. the settlement by parentage. 2nd, By parentage; for all legitimate children take the last settlement of the father, and after his death, of the mother, till they are emancipated from parental authority by marriage, or by attaining the age of twenty-one, and living permanently separate from the parent, or contracting some relation inconsistent with domestic subjection. And when emancipated, they retain the parental settlement last acquired before that event took place. A bastard child, on the other hand, having in the eye of the law no parent, was formerly held incompetent to claim a derivative settlement. By a provision, however, in the Poor Law Amendment Act, an illegitimate child, born since the Act passed, is now to follow the settlement of his mother until he attains the age of sixteen, or gains another for himself. But besides those of birth or parentage, there are also settlements acquired by the party's own act. For a female gains a derivative settlement, 3rd, by marriage, i. e., she may claim the settlement which belongs to her husband, and she retains that after his death. If the man have no settlement, being born abroad, and having acquired none, or his settlement is unknown, she retains that which belonged to her before marriage. But she cannot in any case acquire one in her own right during the marriage. A settlement may also be acquired, 4th, by renting a tenement coupled with residence in the same parish for forty days. For this purpose, however, it is requisite that the party should have bonâ fide rented a tenement, consisting of a separate or distinct dwelling-house, or building, or of land, or of both, for the sum of 10*l.* a year, at the least for the term of one whole year; and that he should have occupied the same under such hiring, and actually paid the rent, to the amount of 10*l.*, for the term of one whole year at the least, and that for the same period he should have been assessed to and paid the poor rate in respect thereof. 5th. A settlement may also be gained by being bound apprentice, under indenture or other deed, and inhabiting for forty days under such binding, either in the same parish where the service takes place, or a different one. But no settlement can be acquired by being apprenticed in the sea-service, or to a householder exercising the trade of the seas, as a fisherman or otherwise. The deed must in all cases be executed by the apprentice, except in the case of parish apprentices. 6th. A settlement is gained of a temporary kind in any parish, by having an estate of one's own there, of whatever value, and whether the interest be legal or equitable. This particular species of settlement is founded on the principle of the common law, that a man shall not be removed from his own property. It is provided, however, that no person shall retain a settlement gained by virtue of any estate or interest in a parish for any longer time than he shall inhabit within ten miles thereof; and in case he shall cease to inhabit within that distance, and shall afterwards become chargeable, he shall be liable to be removed to the parish in which he was settled previously to such inhabitancy, or if he have gained a settlement in some other parish since the inhabitancy, then to such other parish. Lastly, a settlement may be gained by being charged to and paying the public taxes and levies of the parish, excepting those for scavengers and highways, and the duties on houses. But it is provided, by 35 Geo. III. c. 101, s. 4, that no person shall gain a settlement on this ground in respect of any tenement or tenements not being of the yearly value of 10*l.*; and by 6 Geo. IV. c. 57, that a settlement shall not be acquired by paying parochial rates for any tenement, not being the person's own property, unless it consists of a separate and distinct dwelling-house, or building, or land, or both, bonâ fide rented by him for 10*l.* a year, at the least, for a whole year, and be occupied under such hiring for a year at least. This title to a settlement is, therefore, nearly merged in that of renting a tenement.

The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 113; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 89; amend the laws relating to the removal of the poor. By the temporary Act of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 110, continued by 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 4 & 91, the guardians of certain unions in the counties where great distress is existing, in consequence of the failure in the cotton supply, are enabled, in certain cases, to throw a portion of the rates of a particular parish upon the Union in which it is situated; and power is given to the Poor Law Board to authorize the borrowing of a sum of money on the credit of the common fund of the union; or to call on the several unions in the county for contributions. See also 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 70 & 81.

The duty of making and levying the poor-rate or parochial fund, out of which the relief is to be afforded, still belongs, as before the late changes in the law of relief, to the churchwardens and overseers; and the concurrence of the inhabitants is not necessary. But for the better execution of these duties, the recent Acts relating to the amendment of the poor law authorize the appointment of collectors and assistant overseers. The rate is raised prospectively for some given portion of the year, and upon a scale adapted to the probable exigencies of the parish; and the Act of Elizabeth directs that it should be raised by 'taxation of every inhabitant, parson, vicar, and other, and of every occupier of lands, houses, tithes impropriate, propriations of tithes, coal mines, or saleable underwoods in the parish.' As an occupier, a man is rateable for all lands which he occupies in the parish, whether he is resident or not; but the tenant and not the landlord is considered as the occupier within this statute. As an inhabitant, a man was formerly liable to be rated according to his apparent ability, that is, according to the value of the local and visible personal property he had within the parish, and of which he made profit; but by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 89; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 42; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 44; the liability to taxation, in regard to inhabitancy, was suspended until October 1862, and thence to the end of the next session. These Acts were not renewed in 1863.

By 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 1, no rate can be deemed valid unless it be allowed by two justices, and by 17 Geo. II. c. 3, public notice thereof is to be given at the parish church on the Sunday next after the same has been allowed. The allowance by the justices is a mere matter of form; but after allowance and publication, any person aggrieved by the rate, and having reasonable objection to it, as irregular or unequal, may appeal against it to the next practicable quarter sessions of the county, riding, or division, or, in some cases, of the corporation or franchise in which the parish is situate. As to the recovery of poor rates, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 82.—3 Step. Com. 165.

Pope [anciently pape, fr. πάππας, Gk., father], the bishop of Rome and supreme head of the Roman Catholic Church. He is also sovereign of the Papal States.

Pope Nicholas's taxation, the first fruits (primitiæ or annates) were the first year's profits of all the spiritual preferments in the kingdom according to a rate made by Walter, Bishop of Norwich, in the time of Pope Innocent II. and afterwards advanced in value in the time of Pope Nicholas IV. This last valuation was begun A.D. 1288, and finished 1292, and is still preserved in the Exchequer. The taxes were regulated by it till the survey made in the 26th year of Henry VIII.

Popery, the religious doctrines and practises adopted and maintained by the Church of Rome. See CORONATION OATH.

Populace or Populacy [fr. populus, Lat.], the vulgar; the multitude.

Popular action, brought by one of the public to recover some penalty given by statute to anyone who chooses to sue for it. See QUI TAM ACTION.

Populous parishes, for their spiritual improvement, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104.

Porrecting, producing for examination or taxation, as porrecting a bill of costs, by a proctor.

Portatica, port-duties charged on ships.

Porter, an officer who carries a white or silver rod before the justices in eyre, so called à portando virgum; also, a person employed to carry messages, parcels, &c. Porters in the City of London are regulated by the corporation.

Porterage, a kind of duty formerly paid at the custom-house to those who attended the water-side, and belonged to the package-office; but it is now abolished; also, the charge made for sending parcels.

Portgreve, or Portreeve, a magistrate in certain sea-coast towns.

Portion, that part of a person's estate which is given or left to a child.

There are two ways of raising portions, one by sale or mortgage, the other by perception of profits. Interest is payable on portions from the time they become due.

Portioner, a minister, who serves a benefice, together with others, so called, because he has only a portion of the tithes or profits of the living; also, an allowance which a vicar commonly has out of a rectory or impropriation.

Portmen, the burgesses of Ipswich and of the Cinque Ports.—Camden.

Portmote, a court held in haven towns or ports, and sometimes in inland counties.

Portoria, duties paid in ports on merchandise. Civil Law.

Ports, harbours; safe stations for ships.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. See HAVENS.

Portsale, a public sale of goods to the highest bidder.

Portsoka or Portsoken, the suburbs of a city, or any place within its jurisdiction.

Portuas, a breviary.—Cowel.

Portus est locus in quo exportantur et importantur merces.—2 Inst. 148.—(A port is a place where goods are exported or imported.)

Positive evidence, proof of the very fact.

Posito uno oppositorum negatur alterum.—3 Rol. Rep. 422.—(One of two opposite positions being affirmed, the other is denied.)

Posse, a possibility. A thing is said to be in posse when it may possibly be; in esse when it actually is.

Posse comitâtus, the power of a county, including the aid and attendance of all knights and other men above the age of fifteen within the county; but ecclesiastical persons, peers, and such as labor under any infirmity, are not compellable to attend. It is called out when a riot is committed, a possession is kept on a forcible entry, or any force is used or rescue made contrary to the commandment of the Queen's writ, or in opposition to the execution of justice.

Possessio. Paulus (Dig. 41, tit. 2, s. 1) observes, 'Possessio appellata est, ut et Labeo ait, à pedibus, quasi positio; quia naturaliter tenetur ab eo qui insistit.' The absurdity of the etymology and of the reason are equal. The elements of possidere are either pot (pot-is) and sedere; or the first part of the word is related to apud, and the cognate Greek form of ποτί (πρός).

Possessio, in its primary sense, is the condition or power by virtue of which a man has such a mastery over a corporeal thing as to deal with it at his pleasure, and to exclude other persons from meddling with it. This condition or power is detention; and it lies at the bottom of all legal senses of the word possession. This possession is no legal state or condition, but it may be the source of rights, and it then becomes possessio in a juristical or legal sense. Still, even in this sense, it is not in any way to be confounded with property (proprietas). A man may have the juristical possession of a thing without being the proprietor, and a man may be the proprietor of a thing without having the juristical possession of it, and consequently without having the detention of it (Dig. 41, tit. 2, s. 12). Ownership is the legal capacity to operate on a thing according to a man's pleasure, and to exclude everybody else from doing so. Possession, in the sense of detention, is the actual exercise of such a power as the owner has a right to exercise. The term possessio occurs in the Roman jurists in various senses. There is possessio generally, and possessio civilis, and possessio naturalis.

Possessio denoted, originally, bare detention; but this detention, under certain conditions, becomes a legal state, inasmuch as it leads to ownership through usucapio. Accordingly, the word possessio, which required no qualification so long as there was no other notion attached to possessio, requires such qualification when detention becomes a legal state. This detention, then, when it has the conditions necessary to usucapio, is called possessio civilis, and all other possessio as opposed to civilis is naturalis.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.; Sand. Just. 274.

Possessio est quasi pedis positio.—3 Co. 42. (Possession is, as it were, the position of the foot.)

Possessio fratris, a seisin to turn the descent away from the brother of the half-blood to the sister of the whole-blood; thus, if a father had two sons, A. and B., by different wives, these two brethren were not brethren of the whole-blood, and therefore could never inherit to each other, but the estate rather escheated to the lord. Nay, even if the father died, and his lands descended to his eldest son A., who entered thereon, and died seised without issue, still B. could not be heir to this estate, because he was only of the half-blood to A., the person last seised; but it descended to a sister (if any) of the whole-blood to A.; for in such cases the maxim was, that the seisin, or possessio fratris, made the sister the heiress. Yet, had A. died without entry, then B. might have inherited, not as heir to A., his half-brother, but as heir to their common father, who was the person last actually seised. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106.

Possessio fratris de feodo simplici facit sororem esse hæredem.—3 Co. 42.—(Possession of the brother in fee-simple makes the sister to be heir.)

The possessio fratris was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106.

Possessio pacifica pour ans 60 facit jus.—Jenk. Cent. 26.—(Peaceable possession for sixty years gives a right.)

Possession, the state of owning or having a thing in one's own hands or power; the thing possessed.

It is either actual, where a person enters into lands or tenements descended or conveyed to him; apparent, which is a species of presumptive title where land descended to the heir of an abator, intruder, or disseisor, who died seised; in law, when lands, &c., have descended to a man, and he has not actually entered into them; or naked, that is, mere possession, without color of right.

Possession, Writ of, the process of execution in an action of ejectment. See EJECTMENT; HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM.

Possessory action, the action of trespass, the gist of which is the injury to the possession; a plaintiff, therefore, cannot maintain it, unless at the moment of the injury he was in actual or constructive, immediate and exclusive possession.

Possibilitas post dissolutionem executionis nunquam reviviscatur.—1 Rol. Rep. 321.—(Possibility is never revived after the dissolution of the execution.)

Possibilitas, an act wilfully done, as impossibilitas is a thing done against the will.

Possibility, expectation, an uncertain thing, which may or may not happen.

It is either near, or ordinary, as where an estate is limited to one after the death of another; or remote, or extraordinary, as where it is limited to a man, provided he marries a certain woman, and that she shall die and he shall marry another.

Possibility on a possibility, a remote possibility, as if a remainder be limited in particular to A.'s son John, or Edward, it is bad if he have no son of that name, for it is too remote a possibility that he should not only have a son, but a son of that particular name.—Cholmley's case, 2 Rep. 51.

Post, a conveyance for letters or dispatches. The word is derived from positi, the horses carrying the letters or despatches being kept or placed at fixed stations. The word is also applied to the person who conveys the letters to the houses where he takes up and lays down his charge, and to the stages or distances between house and house. Hence the phrases post-boy, post-horse, post-house, &c.

Post, suborned, hired to do an improper action. See KNIGHTS OF THE POST.

Post, Writ of entry in, an abolished writ given by statute of Marlbridge, 52 Hen. III. c. 30, which provided, that when the number of alienations or descents exceeded the usual degrees, a new writ should be allowed, without any mention of degrees at all.

Postage, the duty or charge imposed on letters or parcels conveyed by post. See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 85. As to the postage on letters to seamen and soldiers whilst on active service, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 65. See POST-OFFICE.

Post and Per. See PER AND POST.

Post Conquestum (after the Conquest).

Post-date, to date later than the real date. A penalty of 100*l.* is imposed by s. 12 of the 55 Geo. III. c. 184, for post-dating bills, notes, &c., on stamps which do not cover the real term for which they were drawn. Bankers' checks must not be post-dated without being on a bill stamp, under a penalty of 100*l.*—9 Geo. IV. c. 49. See BANKERS' CHECKS.

Post Diem (after the day).

Post-Disseisin, a writ that lay for him who, having recovered lands or tenements by force of novel disseisin, was again disseised by the former disseisor.

Postea (afterwards), the return of the judge before whom a cause was tried, after a verdict, of what was done in the cause. It is endorsed on the nisi prius record by the associate.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 467.

Post entry. When goods are weighed or measured, and the merchant has got an account thereof at the Custom-House, and finds his entry already made too small, he must make a post or additional entry for the surplusage, in the same manner as the first was done. As a merchant is always in time, prior to the clearing of the vessel, to make his post, he should take care not to over-enter, to avoid as well the advance as the trouble of getting back the overplus. However, if this be the case, and an over-entry has been made, and more paid or bonded for customs than the goods really landed amount to, the land-waiter and surveyor must signify the same upon oath made and subscribed by the person so over-entered, that neither he nor any other person, to his knowledge, had any of the said goods over-entered on board the said ship, or anywhere landed the same without payment of custom; which oath must be attested by the collector or comptroller, or their deputies, who then compute the duties, and set down on the back of the certificate, first in words at length, and then in figures, the several sums to be paid.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Posteriora derogant prioribus.—(Things subsequent supersede things prior.)

Posteriority, coming after, the correlative of priority.

Posterity, succeeding generations, descendants, opposed to ancestry.

Post executionem statûs lex non patitur possibilitatem.—3 Buls. 108.—(After the execution of the estate, the law suffers not a possibility.)

Post-fine, a duty formerly paid to the king for a fine acknowledged in his court; it was paid by the cognisee after the fine was fully passed. See FINE.

Posthumous child, a child born after its father's death; or taken out of the body of a dead mother. See 10 & 11 Wm. III. c. 16.

Posting, registering methodically; transcribing from one book to another, and especially carrying accounts from the waste-book or journal to the ledger.

Postliminium, the return of a person to his own country, after having sojourned abroad. The right of Postliminy is that by virtue of which persons and things taken by an enemy in war are restored to their former state, upon coming again under the power of the nation to which they belonged.—Internation. Law.

Post litem motam, depositions. Where they relate to the subject of suit, they are not admissible when made after the litigation has commenced.—1 Stark. Evid. 319.

Postman, a barrister in the Court of Exchequer, who has precedence in motions; also, a letter-carrier.—3 Bl. Com. 28.

Post-Master, one who has charge of the conveyance of letters at a certain place; also, a portionist.

Post-Master-General, he who is at the head and has the chief control of the Post-office. He is usually one of the Ministry. There were two before 1822, when one was abolished.

Post mortem (after death), as a post mortem, or necroscopic examination.

Postnate, subsequent.

Post-natus, the second son, or one born afterwards.

Post-note, a bank-note, intended to be transmitted to a distant place by the public mail, and made payable to order; differing in this from a common bank-note, which is payable to the bearer.

Post nuptial settlement, a settlement made after marriage; it is generally deemed voluntary unless made pursuant to written articles entered into before the marriage. See FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

Post-obit bond. A bond, conditioned to be void on the payment by the obligor of a sum of money upon the death of another person. In most cases the person upon whose death it is so payable is one from whom the obligor expects to derive some property. Post-obit bonds, and other securities of a like nature, are set aside, when made by heirs and expectants, as frauds upon the parents and other ancestors, unless the obligee or person dealing with such heir can prove satisfactorily that the stipulated payment is not more than a just indemnity for the hazard. Even the sale of a post-obit bond at public auction will not necessarily give it validity, or free it from the imputation of being obtained under the pressure of necessity. See BOND.

Post-office. The post-office, or duty of carrying letters, owes its establishment to the Parliament of 1643. There existed postmasters in much earlier times, but their business was confined to the furnishing of post-horses to persons who were desirous to travel expeditiously, and to the despatching of extraordinary packets upon special occasions. King James I. originally erected a post-office under the control of one Mathew de Quester, or de l'Equester, for the conveyance of letters to and from foreign parts, which office was afterwards claimed by Lord Stanhope, but was confirmed and continued to William Frizell and Thomas Witherings by King Charles I., A.D. 1632, for the better accommodation of the English merchants. In 1635 the same prince erected a letter office for England and Scotland, under the same direction of Thomas Witherings, and settled certain rates of postage, but this extended only to a few of the principal roads. The times of carriage were uncertain, and the postmasters on each road were required to furnish the mail with horses at the rate of two and a half per mile. Witherings was superseded for abuses in the execution of both his offices, in 1640, and they were sequestered into the hands of Philip Burlamachy, to be exercised under the care and oversight of the King's principal Secretary of State. On the breaking out of the civil war, great confusions and interruptions were necessarily occasioned in the conduct of the letter office, and about that time the outline of the present more extended and regular plan seems to have been conceived by Prideaux, who was appointed Attorney-General to the commonwealth after the murder of King Charles. He was chairman of a committee in 1643 for considering what rates should be set upon inland letters, and afterwards appointed postmaster by an ordinance of both the Houses, in the execution of which office he established a weekly conveyance of letters into all parts of the nation, thereby saving to the public the charge of maintaining postmasters, and his own emoluments being probably very considerable, the Common Council of London endeavoured to erect another post-office in opposition to his, till checked by a resolution of the House of Commons, declaring that the office of postmaster is and ought to be in the sole power and disposal of the Parliament. This office was afterwards farmed by one Manly, in 1654, but in 1657 a regular post-office was erected by the authority of the Protector and his Parliament, upon nearly the same model as has been ever since adopted, and with the same rates of postage as continued till the reign of Queen Anne. After the restoration a similar office, with some improvements, was established by statute 12 Car. II. c. 35, but, by subsequent statutes, the rates of letters were altered, and some farther regulations added, and penalties were enacted in order to confine the carriage of letters to the public office only, except in some few cases.—1 Bl. Com. 321. The more recent statutes relating to the Post-office are 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 97 & 98; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 52; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96 (the Penny Postage Act); 7 & 8 Vict. c. 49 (as to Colonial posts); 10 & 11 Vict. c. 85; 11 & 12 Vict. cc. 88, 117; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 66 (enabling Colonial legislature to establish inland posts); 18 & 19 Vict. c. 27; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 65. As to offences relating to the Post-office, see LARCENY.

Post-office Lands Act, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 43. This Act enables the Postmaster-General to sell or otherwise dispose of land.

Post-office Savings Banks Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 14, amended by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 14. See SAVINGS BANKS.

Postponement of trial. It is ground for a new trial if a common law judge improperly refuse to put off a trial.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1508.

No person prosecuted shall be entitled to traverse or postpone the trial of any indictment found against him at any session of the peace, session of oyer and terminer, or session of gaol delivery; provided always, that if the court, upon the application of the person so indicted, or otherwise, shall be of opinion that he ought to be allowed a further time, either to prepare for his defence or otherwise, such court may adjourn the trial of such person to the next subsequent session, upon such terms as to bail or otherwise as to such court shall seem meet, and may respite the recognizances of the prosecutor and witnesses accordingly; in which case the prosecutor and witnesses shall be bound to attend to prosecute and give evidence at such subsequent session without entering into any fresh recognizance for that purpose.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

Postremo-geniture, Borough-English, which see.

Post terminum (after the term).

Postulation, a petition.

Postulatio, the first act in a criminal proceeding.—Civ. Law.

Post-vene, to come after.

Potentia propinqua (common possibility).

Potentia debet sequi justitiam, non antecedere. 3 Buls. 199.—(Power ought to follow, not precede, justice.)

Potentia est duplex, remota et propinqua; et potentia remotissima et vana est quæ nunquam venit in actum.—11 Co. 51.—(Possibility is of two kinds, remote and near; that which never comes into action is a power the most remote and vain.)

Potentia inutilis frustra est.—Office of Exec. 220.—(Useless power is vain.)

Potestas regis est facere justitiam.—2 Inst. 374.—(The power of the king is to execute justice.)

Potestas regis juris est, non injuriæ.—3 Inst. 236.—(The king's power is of right, not of injury.)

Potestas strictè interpretatur.—Jenk. Cent. 17.—(A power is strictly interpreted.)

Potestas suprema seipsum dissolvere potest, ligare non potest.—Bacon.—(Supreme power can dissolve, but cannot bind itself.)

Potior est conditio defendentis.—(The condition of a defendant is the better.)

Potior est conditio possidentis.—(The condition of one possessing is the better.—2 Wms. Exors. 836.

Potwallers, or Potwallopers, persons who cooked their own food, and were on that account in some boroughs entitled to vote for Members of Parliament.—See 3 Step. Com. 376.

Pound [fr. pund, Sax.; pondo, Lat.] a certain weight, consisting, in troy weight, of 12, in avoirdupois, of 16 ounces; the sum of 20*s.*, which formerly weighed a pound.

Pound [fr. pindan, Sax.], a penfold, an enclosure, a prison in which beasts are enclosed, for any damage or trespass done by them, until they are replevied or redeemed. It is either overt, i. e. open over-head; or covert, i. e. close. A pound-keeper is bound to receive everything offered to his custody, and is not answerable if the thing be illegally impounded.—1 T. R. 62. See 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 12; 11 Geo. II. c. 19; and as to feeding cattle impounded, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, ss.5 & 6.

Pound of land, an uncertain quantity of land, said to be about 52 acres.

Poundage, a certain sum deducted from a pound. Sheriff's poundage on writs of ca. sa. is abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, s. 3. The amount of their poundage upon a fi. fa. is 1*s.* for every 20*s.* if the sum levied does not exceed 100*l.*, and 6*d.* for every 20*s.* over and above that sum. The penalty is 40*l.* if more is exacted.—28 Eliz. c. 4; 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 55.

Pound-breach, breaking open a pound in order to take cattle; it is an indictable offence, because the cattle are deemed to be in the possession of the law.

Pour faire proclaimer, an ancient writ addressed to the mayor or bailiff of a city or town, requiring him to make proclamation concerning nuisances, &c. — Fitzherbert's Nat. Brev. 176.

Pourparty, to divide the lands which fall to parceners.—O. N. B. 11.

Pourpresture [fr. pourpris, Fr., an enclosure], anything done to the nuisance or hurt of the Queen's demesnes, or the highways, &c., by enclosure or building, endeavouring to make that private which ought to be public.

The difference between a pourpresture and a public nuisance is that pourpresture is an invasion of the jus privatum of the Crown; but where the jus publicum is violated, it is a nuisance.

Skene makes three sorts of this offence: (1) against the Crown; (2) against the lord of the fee; (3) against a neighbor.—2 Inst. 38; 1 Reeves, 156.

Pour seisir terres, an ancient writ whereby the Crown seised the land which the wife of its deceased tenant, who held in capite, had for her dower, if she married without leave; it was grounded on the statute De Prærogativâ Regis, 7.—17 Edw. II. st. 1, c. 4. It is abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Poursuivant, a king's messenger; those employed in martial causes are called Poursuivant-at-Arms.

There are at present, in the Herald's Office, four pursuivants, distinguished by the names following:—

(1) Rouge Croix, instituted at an uncertain period, but generally considered to be the most ancient. The title was doubtless derived from the cross of St George.

(2) Blue Mantle. An office instituted by Edward III. or Henry V., and named either in allusion to the color of the arms of France, or to that of the robes of the Order of the Garter.

(3) Rouge Dragon. This poursuivancy was founded by Henry VII. on the day before his coronation, the name being derived from the ensign of his ancestor, Cadwaladyr. He also assumed a red dragon as the dexter supporter of his arms.

(4) Portcullis. This office was instituted by the same monarch, from one of whose badges the title was derived.

Pourveyance, or Purveyance, the providing necessaries for the sovereign, by buying them at an appraised valuation in preference to all others, and even without the owner's consent. Indeed it was a royal right of spoil, and was long since abolished.—12 Car. II. c. 24; 3 Hall. M. A. c. viii., part 3, p. 148; and 1 Hall. Cons. Hist. c. vi., p. 304.

Pourveyor, or Purveyor, a buyer; one who provided for the royal household.

Powdikes. Destroying them in the fens of Norfolk and Ely is felony, by 22 Hen. VIII. c. 11.

Power, an authority which one person gives to another to act for him, or to do certain acts, as to make leases, raise portions, or the like; also to modify the uses of an estate, of which he has the disposal; it is an authority enabling one person to dispose of an interest which is vested in another.—2 Lill. Abr. 339.

Powers are either common-law authorities, declarations, or directions, operating only on the conscience of the persons in whom the legal interest is vested, or declarations or directions deriving their effect from the Statute of Uses. A power given by a will to A., an executor, to sell an estate, to whom no estate is devised, and a power given by an Act of Parliament to sell estates, as in the instance of the Land Tax Redemption Acts, are both common-law authorities. The estate passes by force of the will or Act of Parliament, and the person who executes the power merely nominates the party to take the estate. A power of attorney is also a common-law authority. A power to dispose of an estate or sum of money of which the legal estate is vested in another, is a power of the second sort. The legal interest is not divested by the execution of the power, but equity will compel the person seised of it to clothe the estate created with the legal right. Powers deriving their effect from the Statute of Uses are either given to a person who has an estate limited to him by the deed creating the power, or who had an estate in the land at the time of the execution of the deed, or to a stranger, to whom no estate is given, but the power is to be exercised for his own benefit, or to a mere stranger to whom no estate is given, and the power is for the benefit of others.

Powers are either—

(1) Collateral, which are given to strangers, i. e. to persons who have neither a present nor future estate or interest in the land. These are also called simply collateral, or powers not coupled with an interest, or powers not being interests. These terms have been adopted to obviate the confusion arising from the circumstance that powers in gross have been by many called powers collateral.—Savile v. Blacket, 1 P. Wms. 777.

(2) Relating to the land, which are either—

(a) Appendant or appurtenant, because they strictly depend upon the estate limited to the person to whom they are given. Thus, where an estate for life is limited to a man, with a power to grant leases in possession, a lease granted under the power may operate wholly out of the life-estate of the party executing it, and must in every case have its operation out of his estate during his life. Such an estate must be created, which will attach on an interest actually vested in himself; or,

(β) In gross, which are given to a person who had an interest in the estate at the time of the execution of the deed creating the power, or to whom an estate is given by the deed, but which enable him to create such estates only as will not attach on the interest limited to him. Of necessity, therefore, where a man seised in fee settles his estate on others, reserving to himself only a particular power, the power is in gross. A power to a tenant for life to appoint the estate after his death amongst his children, a power to jointure a wife after his death, a power to raise a term of years to commence from his death, for securing younger children's portions, are all powers in gross.

A power may, with reference to the particular estates in the land over which it extends, have different aspects; it may, in regard to one, be a power appendant, in respect to the other, a power in gross. Thus where an estate is settled to A. for life, remainder to B. in tail, remainder to A. in fee, and A. has a power to jointure his wife after his death, this power is in gross as to the estate for life, but appendant or appurtenant as to the remainder in fee. It may affect the latter, but never can attach on the former.

An important distinction is established between general and particular powers. By a general power, we understand a right to appoint to whomsoever the donee pleases. By a particular power, it is meant that the donee is restricted to some objects designated in the deed creating the power, as to his own children.

A power shall be expounded strictly; therefore, if a [illegible] have power to make leases generally, this extends to make leases in possession only, and not in reversion.

Powers appendant may be destroyed by release, bargain and sale, or feoffment; powers in gross, by feoffment or release; but powers simply collateral, cannot be destroyed by the act of the person to whom they are given. As the appointor is merely an instrument, the appointee shall be in by the original deed.

Appointments by will are to be executed like other wills, and to be valid, although other required solemnities are not observed.—7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 10.

A deed hereafter executed in the presence of and attested by two or more witnesses in the manner in which deeds are ordinarily executed and attested shall, so far as respects the execution and attestation thereof, be a valid execution of a power of appointment by deed or by any instrument in writing not testamentary, notwithstanding it shall have been expressly required that a deed or instrument in writing made in exercise of such power should be executed or attested with some additional or other form of execution, or attestation, or solemnity. Provided always, that this provision shall not operate to defeat any direction in the instrument creating the power that the consent of any particular person shall be necessary to a valid execution, or that any act shall be performed in order to give validity to any appointment, having no relation to the mode of executing and attesting the instrument, and nothing herein contained shall prevent the donee of a power from executing it conformably to the power by writing or otherwise than by an instrument executed and attested as an ordinary deed, and to any such execution of a power this provision shall not extend.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 12.

Where under a power of sale a bonâ fide sale shall be made of an estate with the timber thereon, or any other articles attached thereto, and the tenant for life or any other party to the transaction shall by mistake be allowed to receive for his own benefit a portion of the purchase-money as the value of the timber or other articles, it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery, upon any bill or claim or application, in a summary way, as the case may require or permit, to declare that upon payment by the purchaser, or the claimant under him, of the full value of the timber and articles at the time of sale, with such interest thereon as the Court shall direct, and the settlement of the said principal moneys and interest under the direction of the Court upon such parties as in the opinion of the Court shall be entitled thereto, the said sale ought to be established; and upon such payment and settlement being made accordingly the Court may declare that the said sale is valid, and thereupon the legal estate shall vest and go in like manner as if the power had been duly executed, and the costs of the said application as between solicitor and client shall be paid by the purchaser or the claimant under him (s. 13).

Where by any will which shall come into operation after the passing of this Act the testator shall have charged his real estate or any specific portion thereof with the payment of his debts, or with the payment of any legacy or other specific sum of money, and shall have devised the estate so charged to any trustee or trustees for the whole of his estate or interest therein, and shall not have made any express provision for the raising of such debt, legacy, or sum of money out of such estate, it shall be lawful for the said devisee or devisees in trust, notwithstanding any trusts actually declared by the testator, to raise such debts, legacy, or money as aforesaid, by a sale and absolute disposition by public auction or private contract of the said hereditaments or any part thereof, or by a mortgage of the same, or partly in one mode and partly in the other, and any deed or deeds of mortgage so executed may reserve such rate of interest and fix such period or periods of repayment as the person or persons executing the same shall think proper (s. 14).

The powers conferred by the last section shall extend to all and every person or persons in whom the estate devised shall for the time being be vested by survivorship, descent, or devise, or to any person or persons who may be appointed under any power in the will, or by the Court of Chancery, to succeed to the trusteeship vested in such devisee or devisees in trust as aforesaid (s. 15).

If any testator who shall have created such a charge as is described in the fourteenth section shall not have devised the hereditaments charged as aforesaid in such terms as that his whole estate and interest therein shall become vested in any trustee or trustees, the executor or executors for the time being named in such will (if any) shall have the same or the like power of raising the said moneys as is hereinbefore vested in the devisee or devisees in trust of the said hereditaments, and such power shall from time to time devolve to and become vested in the person or persons (if any) in whom the executorship shall for the time being be vested; but any sale or mortgage under this Act shall operate only on the estate and interest whether legal or equitable, of the testator, and shall not render it unnecessary to get in any outstanding subsisting legal estate (s. 16).

Purchasers or mortgagees shall not be bound to inquire whether the powers conferred by sections 14, 15, and 16 of this Act, or either of them, shall have been duly and correctly exercised by the person or persons acting in virtue thereof (s. 17).

The provisions contained in sections 14, 15, and 16, shall not in any way prejudice or affect any sale or mortgage already made or hereafter to be made, under or in pursuance of any will coming into operation before the passing of this Act, 13th August, 1859, but the validity of any such sale or mortgage shall be ascertained and determined in all respects as if this Act had not passed; and the said several sections shall not extend to a devise to any person or persons in fee or in tail, or for the testator's whole estate and interest charged with debts or legacies, nor shall they affect the power of any such devisee or devisees to sell or mortgage as he or they may by law now do (s. 18).

Power of Attorney. See LETTER OF ATTORNEY.

Poynding. See POINDING.

Poyning's Law, or STATUTE OF DROGHEDA, an Act of Parliament made in Ireland, 10 Hen. VII. c. 22, A.D. 1495; so called, because Sir Edward Poyning was lieutenant there when it was made, whereby all general statutes before then made in England were declared of force in Ireland, which, before that time, they were not.—12 Rep. 109; 3 Hall. Cons. Hist. c. xviii., p. 361.

Practice, the form and manner of conducting and carrying on suits, actions, or prosecutions at law or in equity, civil or criminal, through their various stages, from the commencement to final judgment and execution, according to the principles and the rules laid down by the several courts.

As to the practice of the Courts of Common Law, see Chitty's Archbold by Prentice; of Courts of Equity, Daniel and Smith.

Practice Court. See BAIL COURT, and QUEEN'S BENCH.

Practitioner, he who is engaged in the exercise or employment of any art or profession.

Præbenda dicitur à præbendo, quia præberet auxilium episcopo.—3 Rep. 75.—(A prebendary is called from præbendo, because he should give assistance to the bishop.)

Præceptores, a kind of benefices, so called because they were possessed by the more eminent Templars, whom the chief master by his authority created and called Præceptores Templi.—Mon. Angl. ii. 543.

Præcipe (command), a slip of paper upon which the particulars of a writ are written; it is lodged in the office out of which the required writ is to be issued.

Also, an original writ, commanding the defendant, in the alternative, to do the thing required, or show the reason why he has not done it; and the writ is drawn up in the form of a præcipe or command, to do something, or show cause to the contrary, giving the defendant his choice to redress the injury or stand the suit.—3 Bl. Com. 273. It is abolished.

Præcipe in capite, a writ out of Chancery for a tenant holding of the Crown in capite, viz. in chief.—Mag. Chart. c. 24.

Præcipe quod reddat, the form of a writ which extended as well to a writ of right as to other writs of entry or possession, beginning 'Præcipe, A. quod reddat, B. unum messagium,' &c.—O. N. B. 13. Abolished.

Præcipe quod teneat conventionem, the writ which commenced the action of covenant in fines, which are abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Præcipe, Tenant to the, a person having an estate of freehold in possession, against whom the præcipe was brought by a tenant in tail, seeking to bar his estate by a recovery. If the latter was tenant in tail in possession, it was usual for him to convey a freehold estate to any indifferent person against whom the præcipe was brought. See RECOVERY.

Præcipitium, the punishment of casting headlong from some high place.

Præcognita, things to be previously known, in order to the understanding of something which follows.

Prædia bella, booty, property seized in war.

Prædia stipendiaria, provincial lands belonging to the people.—Civ. Law.

Prædia tributaria, provincial lands belonging to the emperor.—Ibid.

Prædia volantia. In the duchy of Brabant, certain things movable, such as beds, tables, and other heavy articles of furniture, are ranked amongst immovables, and are called prædia volantia, or volatile estates.—2 Bl. Com. 428.

Prædial tithes [fr. prædium, Lat., ground], such as arise merely and immediately from the ground; as grain of all sorts, hops, hay, wood, fruit, herbs.—2 Bl. Com. 23.

Prædict (aforesaid).—Hob. 6.

Prædium domini regis est directum dominium, cujus nullus auctor est nisi Deus.—Co. Litt. 1. (The estate of our lord the king is a direct dominion derived from God.)

Prædium dominans, an estate to which a servitude is due; the ruling estate.—Civ. Law.

Prædium rusticum, heritage which is not destined for the use of man's habitation; such, for example, as lands, meadows, orchards, gardens, woods, even though they should be within the boundaries of a city.—Ibid.

Prædium serviens, an estate which suffers or yields a service to another estate.—Ibid.

Prædium urbanum, a building or edifice intended for the habitation and use of man, whether built in cities, or in the country.—Civ. Law.

Præfectus Urbi, he was, from the time of Augustus, an officer who had the superintendence of the city and its police, with jurisdiction extending one hundred miles from the city, and power to decide both civil and criminal cases. As he was considered the direct representative of the emperor, much that previously belonged to the prætor urbanus fell gradually into his hands.—Ibid.

Præfectus vigilum, the chief officer of the night watch. His jurisdiction extended to certain offences affecting the public peace, and even to larcenies. But he could inflict only slight punishments.—Ibid.

Præfectus villæ (the mayor of a town).

Præfine, the fee paid on suing out the writ of covenant, on levying fines, before the fine was passed.—2 Bl. Com. 350.

Præmium pudicitiæ, the consideration given by the seducer of a chaste woman for her defilement.—2 P. Wms. 452.

Præmunire [a barbarous word for præmoneri, Lat., to be forewarned]. It is an offence so called from the words of the writ preparatory to the prosecution thereof: præmunire facias A. B. (cause A. B. to be forewarned) that he appear before us to answer the contempt wherewith he stands charged; which contempt is particularly recited in the preamble to the writ.

The statutes of præmunire were framed to encounter papal usurpation. The first of them was made in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of Edward III. (Barr. on Stat. 279) and was the foundation of all the subsequent statutes of præmunire. Subsequently several very severe Acts of Parliament were passed upon the subject, which is an offence immediately against the sovereign, because every encouragement of the papal power is a diminution of the authority of the Crown.

The original meaning of the offence is, then, introducing a foreign power into this land, and creating imperium in imperio, by paying that obedience to papal process which constitutionally belonged to the sovereign alone long before the Reformation. At that time the penalties of præmunire were indeed extended to more papal abuses than before, as the kingdom then entirely renounced the authority of the see of Rome, though not all the corrupted doctrines of the Church of Rome.

The penalties of præmunire were subsequently applied to other heinous offences:

(1) By 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 8, to molest the possessors of abbey lands, granted by Parliament to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. was a præmunire.

(2) To obtain any stay of proceedings, other than by arrest of judgment or error, in any suit for a monopoly, is likewise a præmunire, by 21 Jac. I. c. 3.

(3) To attempt to restrain the importation or making of gunpowder is also a præmunire, by 16 Car. I. c. 21.

(4) On the abolition by 12 Car. II. c. 24, of purveyance and the prerogative of pre-emption, or taking any victuals, beasts, or goods for the king's use, at a stated price, without the consent of the proprietor, the exercise of any such power for the future was declared to be indictable; and in any suit thereon to obtain any stay of proceedings, other than by arrest of judgment or error, is made a præmunire.

(5) To assert maliciously and advisedly by speaking or writing, that both or either house of Parliament have or has a legislative authority without the sovereign, is declared a præmunire by 13 Car. II. c. 1.

(6) By the Habeas Corpus Act, it is a præmunire, and incapable of the royal pardon, besides other heavy penalties, to send any subject of this realm a prisoner, under certain exceptions in the Act specified, into parts beyond the seas.

(7) By 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 24, serjeants, counsellors, proctors, attorneys, and all officers of courts practising, without having taken the proper oaths, are guilty of a præmunire. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48.

(8) By 6 Anne, c. 7, to assert maliciously and directly, by preaching, teaching, or advised speaking, that any person, other than according to the acts of settlement and union, has any right to the throne of these kingdoms, or that the sovereign and Parliament cannot make laws to limit the descent of the Crown, is a præmunire, as writing, printing or publishing the same doctrines amounts to treason.

(9) By 6 Anne, c. 83, if the assembly of peers in Scotland, convened to elect their sixteen representatives in the British Parliament, shall presume to treat of any other matter save only the election, they incur the penalties of a præmunire.

(10) The 12 Geo. III. c. 11, subjects to the penalties of præmunire all such as knowingly or wilfully solemnise, assist, or are present at any forbidden marriage of such of the descendants of King George II. as are by that Act prohibited to contract matrimony without the consent of the Crown.

The punishment of the offence is, that, from the conviction, the defendant is out of the Crown's protection, and his lands and tenements, goods and chattels, are forfeited to the Crown; and that his body shall remain in prison during the royal pleasure, or, as some authorities have it, during life. It is not lawful, however, to kill any person attainted in a præmunire.—5 Eliz. c. 1; 4 Step. Com. 252, et seq.

Præmuniti, i. e. prænoniti.—Co. Litt. 129. (Forearmed, that is, forewarned.)

Prænomen, the name of an individual.—Civ. Law.

Præpositus, an officer next in authority to the alderman of a hundred, called præpositus regius; or a steward or bailiff of an estate, answering to the wicnere.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Also the person from whom descents are traced under the old canons.

Præpositus ecclesiæ, a church-reeve or churchwarden.

Præpositus villæ, a constable of a town, or petty constable.

Præpropera consilia rarò sunt prospera.—4 Inst. 57.—(Overhasty counsels are seldom good.)

Præscriptio est titulus ex usu et tempore substantiam capiens ab auctoritate legis.—Co. Litt. 113.—(Prescription is a title by authority of law, deriving its force from use and time.)

Præscriptio in feodo non acquirit jus.—Doct. and Stud.—(Prescription in fee acquires not a right.)

Præsentare nihil aliud est quam præsto dare seu offerre.—Co. Litt. 120.—(To present, is no more than to give or offer on the spot.)

Præsentia corporis tollit errorem nominis : et veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis. Bac. Max. 224.—(The presence of the body cures error in the name : the truth of the name cures an error of description.)

Præstat cautela quam medela.—Co. Litt. 304.—(Caution is better than cure.)

Præsumitur pro negante.—(It is presumed for the negative.) The rule of the House of Lords when the numbers are equal on a motion.

Præsumitur rex habere omnia jura in scrinio pectoris sui.—Co. Litt. 99.—(The sovereign is presumed to have all the laws in the casket of his own bosom.)

Præsumptio, intrusion, or the unlawful taking of anything.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 11.

Præsumptio violenta, plena probatio.—(Strong presumption is full proof.)

Præsumptio violenta valet in lege.—Jenk. Cent. 56.—(Strong presumption avails in law.)

Prætextu liciti non debet admitti illicitum.—10 Co. 88.—(Under pretext of legality, what is illegal ought not to be permitted.)

Prætor Fidei Commissarius, the judge at Rome, who enforced the performance of all fiduciary obligations and confidences.

Pragmatic sanction, a rescript or answer of the sovereign, delivered by advice of his council to some college, order, or body of people, who consult him in relation to the affairs of the community. A similar answer given to an individual is simply called a rescript.—Civ. Law.

Pratique [fr. pratica, Ital.], a license for the master of a ship to traffic in the ports of Italy upon a certificate that the place whence he came is not annoyed with any infectious disease.—Encyc. Lond.

Pratum bovis, or carucæ, a meadow for oxen employed in tillage.

Praxis, use, practice.

Praxis judicum est interpres legum.—Hob. 96.—(The practice of the judges is the interpreter of the laws.)

Pray in aid, a petition made in a court of justice for the calling in of help from another that has an interest in the cause in question.

Preamble, introduction, preface; also, the beginning of an Act of Parliament, &c. serving to portray the intents of its framers, and the mischiefs to be remedied.

Preaudience, the right of one to be heard before another.

The preaudience of the bar is as follows:

(1) The Queen's attorney-general.
(2) The Queen's solicitor-general.
(3) The Queen's premier-serjeant (so constituted by special patent).
(4) The Queen's ancient serjeant or the eldest amongst the Queen's serjeants.
(5) The Queen's advocate-general.
(6) The Queen's serjeants.
(7) The Queen's counsel, and those who have patents of precedence from the Crown, with a Queen consort's attorney and solicitor.
(8) Serjeants-at-law.
(9) The recorder of London.
(10) Advocates of the civil law.
(11) Barristers.

It was by a Royal Warrant issued on the 14th day of December, 1814, that the attorney-general and solicitor-general acquired precedency and priority of rank over the premier and ancient serjeants. See 2 Man. and Sel. 254. Before the appointment of the present Queen's advocate (Sir R. J. Phillimore), in 1862, the Queen's advocate always retained his precedency before the attorney and solicitor-general, since this warrant as well as before it. He was invariably addressed first when the Secretaries of State, the Lord President of the Council, and other public functionaries communicated with the three law officers; he always signed all cases and reports first; he requested the assistance of the attorney and solicitor-general whenever he thought fit; they never refused to attend consultations at his chambers; and he often appeared with them for the Crown in various courts, and constantly led one or both of them since 1814, as well as before that date. But on the appointment of the present Queen's advocate, the Crown directed that for the future the attorney-general and solicitor-general should have precedency over the Queen's advocate.

Consult the copy of the correspondence relating to the precedence of the law officers of the Crown presented to the library of Lincoln's Inn, in 1857, by Sir F. D. Harding, the then Queen's advocate.

Prebend, a stipend granted in cathedral churches; also, but improperly, a prebendary.

A simple prebend is merely a revenue; a prebend, with dignity, has some jurisdiction attached to it.

The term prebend is generally confounded with canonicate; but there is a difference between them. The former is the stipend granted to an ecclesiastic in consideration of his officiating and serving in the church; whereas the canonicate is a mere title or spiritual quality which may exist independently of any stipend.

Prebenda, or Probanda, provisions, provender.

Prebendary, a stipendiary of a cathedral.

Precariæ, or Preces, day-works, which the tenants of certain manors are bound to give their lords in harvest time. Magna precaria was a great or general reaping day.

Precarious, a kind of trade carried on between two nations at war, by the intervention of a third at peace with them.

Precarious jurisprudence, applied to a fund or stock, of which a person has not the full property, whereof he cannot dispose absolutely, and which is most of it borrowed.—Encyc. Lond.

Precarious loan [fr. precarium, Lat.], a bailment at will.

Precarium, a contract by which the owner of a thing, at another's request, gives him the thing to use as long as the owner shall please. Civ. Law.

Precatory words, expressions in a will, praying or recommending that a thing be done.

Prece partium, the continuance of a suit by consent of both parties.

Precedence, or Precedency, the act or state of going before; adjustment of place.

The rules of precedence may be reduced to the following list, in which those marked * are entitled to the rank here allotted them by 31 Hen. VIII. c. 10; marked † by 1 W. & M. c. 1; marked ‖ by letters-patent, 9, 10, & 14 Jac. I. which see in *Seld. Married women and widows are entitled to the same rank among each other as their husbands would respectively have borne between themselves, except such rank is merely professional or official; and unmarried women to the same rank as their eldest brothers would bear among men during the lives of their fathers.—2 Step. Com. 636.

Precedence, Patent of, a grant from the Crown to such barristers as it thinks proper to honor with that mark of distinction, whereby they are entitled to such rank and pre-audience as are assigned in their respective patents.

Precedent condition, such as must happen or be performed before an estate can vest or be enlarged.

Precedents, authorities or examples to be followed by courts of justice; also, forms of proceeding to be followed in similar cases.

Precedents sub silentio. Silent uniform course of practice, uninterrupted though not supported by legal decisions.—Eunomus Dial. iii.

Precept, a rule authoritatively given; a mandate; a command in writing by a justice of the peace or other officer, for bringing a person or record before him; the direction of a sheriff to the proper officer to proceed to the election of members of Parliament; a command to a sheriff to empanel a jury; also, a provocation whereby one incites another to commit a felony.—Cowel.

Preces primariæ, or Primæ, a right of the Crown to name to the first prebend that becomes vacant after the accession of the sovereign, in every church of the empire. This right was exercised by the Crown of England in the reign of Edward I.

Precinct, a constable's district.

Precipe. See PRÆCIPE.

Precludi non (not to be barred), the technical name of the commencement of a replication to a plea in bar (1 Chit. Pl. 627, 752), abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 66.

Precognition, the examination of witnesses who were present at the commission of a criminal act, upon the special circumstances attending it, in order to know whether there is ground for a trial, and to serve for direction to the prosecutor. But the persons examined may insist on having their declarations cancelled before they give testimony at the trial.—Scotch law.

Preconizaton [fr. præconium, Lat., the office of a cryer], proclamation.

Pre-contract. Where one of the parties to a marriage was under a prior agreement to marry a third person, such prior agreement was called a pre-contract. It was a canonical impediment to the marriage of either party to the agreement except with the other party. The ecclesiastical courts would formerly enforce this agreement, by compelling the parties to it to enter into a public marriage, and if one of them had already married another, such prior marriage would thereby be rendered void ab initio; but until thus avoided it was good.—Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, s. 53.

Predecessor, one who has preceded another. Burt Comp. pl. (378).

Predial. See PRÆDIAL.

Pre-emption, the first buying of a thing; it was a privilege formerly allowed to the royal purveyor, but abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Prefer, to apply; to move for; as, 'to prefer for costs,' is a phrase to apply for costs.

Preferential shares, new shares in a company, created as a means of raising money, and which have priority as to payment of dividends over the original shares.

Pregnancy, Plea of, when a woman is capitally convicted, and pleads her pregnancy, execution will be respited until she be delivered. See JURY-WOMEN.

Pregnancy, an important question in legal medicine, since on its proper decision may depend the property, the honor, or the life of a woman.

In the ordinary practice of medicine, little difficulty occurs in ascertaining the presence of pregnancy. A woman when she consults a physician is frank in her avowal of the symptoms present; and from her narrative an opinion sufficiently accurate can generally be formed. The reverse, however, takes place in legal medicine. Here pregnancy may be concealed by unmarried women and even by married women, under certain circumstances, to avoid disgrace, and to enable them to destroy their offspring in its mature or immature state. It may be pretended to gratify the wishes of relatives, to deprive the legal successor of his just claims, to extort money, or to delay the execution of punishment.

Mahon has suggested a useful division of the signs of pregnancy, viz. those which affect the system generally, and those which affect the uterus.

The changes observed in the system, from conception and pregnancy, are principally the following:—Increased irritability of temper; melancholy; a languid cast of countenance; nausea; heartburn; loathing of food; vomiting in the morning, and increased salivary discharge; feverish heat, with emaciation and costiveness; occasional depravity of appetite; a congestion in the head, which gives rise to spots on the face, to headache, and erratic pains in the face and teeth. The pressure of increasing pregnancy occasions protrusion of the umbilicus, and sometimes varicose tumors, or anasarcous swellings of the lower extremities. The breasts also enlarge, an areola, or brown circle, is observed around the nipples, and a secretion of lymph, composed of milk-and-water, takes place.

All of these changes do not occur in every case of pregnancy, but in most cases many of them take place.

The changes affecting the uterus are a suppression of the menses, which generally, though not invariably, do not return at their accustomed period.

An augmentation in the size of the womb. This is not perceptible until between the eighth and tenth weeks. At that time the fœtus, with the surrounding membranes and the waters contained in them, so enlarge it, that it may be felt lower down in the vagina than formerly; nor does it ascend until it becomes so large as to arise out of the pelvis, and this is accomplished at about the fourth month. In the intermediate space an examination per vaginam will discover the uterus to be heavier and more resisting; and by raising it on the finger, this indication will be particularly remarked between the third and fourth months. In general, in the fourth month, the fundus of the uterus may be felt, especially in a thin person, above the anterior walls of the pelvis. The enlargement continues, and becomes visible during the fifth month: it arises to half way between the symphysis pubis and the umbilicus; in the sixth month (seventh, according to some authors) it is as high as the umbilicus; at the seventh, half way between the umbilicus and scrobiculus cordis, and at the eighth it has reached the latter, its highest elevation. A short time before delivery it somewhat subsides. About the middle of the pregnancy, or between the seventeenth and twenty-second weeks, the female feels the motion of the child, and this is called quickening. The vagina is also subject to alteration, as its glands throw out more mucus, and apparently prepare the parts for the passage of the fœtus.

These, as now stated, are the signs of pregnancy usually enumerated. It would not, however, be doing justice to the subject, if it were supposed that all or most of them are the invariable attendants on pregnancy. Some may accompany diseases; others may be altogether wanting in a state of true pregnancy.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. 124.

Prelate, an ecclesiastic of the highest honor and dignity.

Prelector, a reader; a lecturer.

Premier, a principal minister of state; the prime minister.

Premier Serjeant, The Queen's, so constituted by letters-patent, has pre-audience over the bar after the Attorney and Solicitor-General and Queen's Advocate.

Prender de baron (to take a husband).

Prepense, forethought, preconceived, contrived beforehand. See MALICE.

Prerogative, a peculiar or exclusive privilege. See QUEEN.

Prerogative Court. The two archbishops have each of them a prerogative court. The appeal is to the Privy Council.—2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92. But see 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 4, which destroyed their jurisdiction in testamentary matters.

Prerogative Writs, processes issued upon extraordinary occasions on proper cause shown. They are the writs of procedendo, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, habeas corpus, certiorari.

Presbyter, a priest, elder, or honorable person.

Presbyterian, a member of the Church of Scotland.

Presbyterium, a presbytery; that part of the church where divine offices are performed, applied to the choir or chancel; because it was the place appropriated to the bishop, priest, and other clergy; while the laity were confined to the body of the church.—Mon. Ang. i. 243.

Prescription [fr. præscribo, Lat.], rules produced and authorized by long usage. It is known in the Roman law as usucapio.

Title by prescription arises from a long-continued and uninterrupted possession of property, and is thus defined by Sir Edward Coke (1 Inst. 113 b.)—præscriptio est titulus, ex usu et tempore substantiam capiens, ab auctoritate legis.

Every species of prescription, by which property is acquired or lost, is founded on the presumption, that he who has had a quiet and uninterrupted possession of anything for a long period of years, is supposed to have a just right, without which he would not have been suffered to continue in the enjoyment of it. For a long possession may be considered as a better title than can commonly be produced, as it supposes an acquiescence in all other claimants; and that acquiescence also supposes some reason for which the claim was forborne.—1 Cruise's Dig. tit. xxxi. 'Prescription,' c. i., s. 4, p. 421.

There are two kinds of prescription, viz.: (1) negative, which relates to realty or corporeal hereditaments, whereby an uninterrupted possession for a given time gives the occupier a valid and unassailable title, by depriving all claimants of every stale right and deferred litigation, now mainly governed by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27; and (2) positive, which relates to incorporeal hereditaments, and originated at the common law from immemorial or long usage only. Positive prescription is subdivided into (1) that which has been exercised by a person and his ancestors, or by a body corporate and their predecessors, and is a personal right; or (2) that which has been attached to the ownership of a certain estate, and is only exercisable by those seised of the fee-simple of such estate, technically denominated a prescription in a que estate.

Positive prescription has been greatly modified by the statutes 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 100; and 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 88.

Prescription and custom are frequently confounded in common parlance, arising perhaps from the fact that immemorial usage was essential to both of them; but, strictly, they materially differ from one another, in that, custom is properly a local, impersonal usage, such as Borough-English, or Postremo-geniture, which is annexed to a given estate, while prescription is simply personal, as that a certain man and his ancestors, or those whose estate he enjoys, have immemorially exercised a right of pasture-common in a certain parish. Again, prescription has its origin in a grant, evidenced by usage, and is allowed on account of its loss, either actual or supposed, and therefore only those things can be prescribed for which could be raised by a grant previously to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 2; but this principle does not necessarily hold in the case of a custom.

The common law laid down the following rules concerning positive prescription :—

(1) The only property claimable by positive prescription is an incorporeal hereditament.

(2) It must be founded on actual usage or enjoyment; for a mere claim will not establish the right.

(3) The use or enjoyment must have been continuous and peaceable; although an interruption of comparatively short duration will not destroy it.

(4) The usage must have been from time immemorial, or from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, which is held to be from the beginning of the reign of Richard I.

Richard's predecessor (Henry II.) died on the 6th of July 1189, and Richard was crowned on the 3rd (or, as some say, 11th) of September 1189. It is a disputed point whether Richard's reign commenced at his own coronation, or at his predecessor's death.

This rule has been altered by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71.

(5) The prescription must be certain and reasonable.

(6) It must be laid either in a man and those whose estate he enjoys in certain property, called, as we have just seen, prescribing in a que estate, or in a man and his ancestors, or in a body corporate and their predecessors.

Here, a distinction should be marked :—

If a person prescribe in a que estate (that is, in himself and those whose estate he holds), nothing is claimable by this prescription, but such things as are incident, appendant, or appurtenant to lands; for it would be absurd to claim anything as the consequence, or appendix of an estate, with which the thing claimed has no connection; but, if he prescribe in himself and his ancestors, he may prescribe for anything whatsoever that lies in grant; not only for things appurtenant, but also such as may be in gross.

(7) A prescription in a que estate must always be laid in him that is tenant in fee.

(8) It cannot be for a thing which cannot be raised by grant.

(9) That which arises by matter of record cannot be prescribed for, but must be claimed by grant entered on record; such as, for instance, the royal franchise of felons' goods, and the like. These, not being forfeited till the matter on which they arise is found by the inquisition of a jury, and so made a matter of record, the forfeiture itself cannot be claimed by an inferior title. But the franchises of treasure-trove, waifs, estrays, and the like, may be claimed by prescription; for they arise from private contingencies, and not from any matter of record.

(10) A person cannot prescribe to do a wrong, or anything that would be a nuisance to others; or against an Act of Parliament, for that is the highest proof and matter of record in law; or against another's prescription.

(11) Where a man prescribes for anything in himself and his ancestors, the prescription will descend only to the blood of that line of ancestors in whom he so prescribes; but if he prescribe for it in a que estate, it will be inheritable precisely in the same manner as that estate, since accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis. See 1 Step. Com. 693, and Gale on Easements, by Willes.

Prescription, Corporations by, those which have existed beyond the memory of man, and therefore are looked upon in law to be well created, such as the city of London.

Presentation, the showing or delivering of a thing to be presented (1 C. L. Rep. 166). It is also equivalent to corporal seisin of land, and is the offering a person to the ordinary to be instituted to a benefice. It must be in writing (29 Car. II. c. 3), and is in the nature of letters-missive to the ordinary.

The Sovereign, as protector ecclesiæ, is the patron paramount of all benefices which do not belong to other patrons, and usually presents by letters-patent (26 Hen. VIII. c. 1; 1 El. c. 1). The Crown possesses the right of revoking its presentation at any time before induction. A revocation may be the consequence either of a formal act, or of the demise of the Crown, or the death of the presentee before induction. The Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, for the time being, has the right to present to all benefices appertaining to the Crown, of or below the value of twenty pounds, in the books of first fruits, according to the valuation in the time of Henry VIII. There is no difference in the form of a presentation by the Crown or Chancellor, except that, for the most part, the one is mandantes, the other rogantes.

With regard to other patrons, it is to be noted that the right of presentation is sometimes confounded with the right of nomination; but presentation is the offering a person to the bishop, while nomination is the offering such a person to the patron. These two rights may co-exist in different persons; thus, where an advowson is vested in trustees, they have the right of presentation, while the right of nomination is in the cestui que trust. So, in the case of a mortgage of an advowson, the mortgagee has the right of presentation, while the mortgagor has the right of nomination. Yet the trustees or the mortgagee must judge of the qualification of the nominee. The right of nomination is not to be prejudiced by the corrupt conduct of the presentor, and e converso. Where one has the nomination, and another the presentation, if such right of presentation accrue to the Crown, this shall not prejudice the inheritance of him that has the nomination, but he may still nominate to the Chancellor, who, in the name of the Sovereign, must present to the Ordinary. Should the Crown present without any such nomination, the nominator may bring his suit against the incumbent only, because the Sovereign cannot be termed an usurper.—Mirehouse on Advow. p. 136.

All persons seised in fee, in tail, or for life, or possessed of a term for years of a manor to which an advowson is appendant, or of an advowson in gross, may present; and this right descends by course of inheritance from heir to heir, or passes to a devisee or purchaser, unless the benefice become vacant in the lifetime of the patron, when the void turn devolves upon the personal representatives (Mirehouse v. Rennell, 7 Bli. 241), being, indeed, a personal right or interest disannexed from the estate in the advowson, and vested in the patron simply as an individual. And where the incumbent is also patron, if he die seised of the advowson, without having devised it, his heir is entitled to present, and not his executor, the reason being that, in this case, the descent to the heir, and the fall of the avoidance to the executor happening at the same time, the elder right prevails. If a bishop die, a church being vacant in his lifetime, the Crown exercises its prerogative to present.—Co. Litt. 388 b.

Where a person has a grant of the next presentation to a church, it is considered as a chattel-real, which, if not disposed of, will vest in his personal representatives.

When a married woman has an advowson, her husband and herself present together, and should he survive and become tenant by the courtesy, he has the right of presentation for his life. Should the benefice become void during his life, and he die before presentation, the right devolves upon his executor.—Mirehouse on Advows. p. 140.

Joint-tenants and tenants in common should present jointly; and if co-parceners cannot agree, the eldest sister is entitled to have the first turn, the second sister the second turn, et sic de cæteris, every one in turn according to seniority, and this part which the oldest thus takes by virtue of her priority of age is called the enitia pars.

By 7 Anne, c. 18, s. 2, if co-parceners, or joint-tenants, or tenants in common, be seised of an estate of inheritance in the advowson of any church or vicarage, or other ecclesiastical promotion, and a partition is or shall be made between them, to present by turns, that thereupon every one shall be taken and adjudged to be seised of his or her separate part of the advowson, to present in his or her turn, as if there be two, and they make such partition, each shall be said to be seised, the one of the one moiety to present in the first turn, the other of the other moiety to present in the second turn. In like manner, if there be three, four, or more, every one shall be said to be seised of his or her part, and to present in his or her turn.

An infant at any age may nominate or present.—Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 710; Arthington v. Coverley, 3 Abr. Cas. E. 518.

A corporation aggregate presents by the corporate name under their common seal.

Should the patron become a bankrupt, and the church be void before the sale of the advowson by his assignees, the bankrupt has the right of nomination.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 147; Charman v. Charman, 14 Ves. 580.

The same rule prevails when the patron seeks relief in the Insolvent Debtors' Court.—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 49.

A presentation may be revoked or varied before admission and institution, since it does not vest any right, and does not confer, before institution, any interest whatever.

The following persons cannot present: A lunatic (the Lord Chancellor then presents); an alien (the Crown has, in such a case, the right); an outlaw, during the outlawry; municipal corporations (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 139; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77, s. 26; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 81); and a papist (the right devolving upon the two Universities).—10 Geo. IV. c. 7, ss. 16, 17, 18.

Presentative advowson. See ADVOWSON.

Presentee, one presented to a benefice.

Presenter, one that presents.

Presentment, generally taken, a very comprehensive term, including not only presentments, properly so called, but also inquisitions of office, and indictments by a grand jury; properly speaking, the notice taken by a grand jury of any offence, from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the Crown; as the presentment of a nuisance, a libel, and the like, upon which the officer of the court must afterwards frame an indictment before the party presented can be put to answer it.—4 Step. Com. 438.

Presentments are also made in courts-leet and courts-baron, before the stewards.—1 Step. Com. 652.

Presentment of Bills of Exchange.

(1) For acceptance. A bill drawn, payable after date, need not be presented for acceptance, but if payable after sight, it is necessary to present or pay it away in some reasonable time. Foreign bills, however, payable after sight, may be kept back, according to the convenience of the holder, for any period, or circulated to an indefinite extent; they are regarded as unlimited letters of credit. It is usual to leave a bill for acceptance twenty-four hours with the drawee during business hours. If the bill is refused acceptance, notice should be sent to the drawer and endorsers; and in the case of a foreign bill, it should be protested, and notice of the non-acceptance and the protest sent by the same post, otherwise the drawer is exonerated.

(2) For payment. Where the acceptance is general, the holder need not present it for payment at any particular place or time, for such omission will not exonerate the acceptor, but if the words 'but not otherwise or elsewhere' are added, it is a special acceptance, and the non-presentation at the specified time and place exonerates all parties to the bill. Bills of exchange need not be presented to acceptors supra protest, for honour, or to the referees in case of need, till the day following the day on which they become due, but if such day be a dies non, then upon the day following (6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 58). Promissory notes must be presented for payment. The holder of a bank-note has the whole of the banking-hours of the day after he receives it, to present or forward it for payment; if he retain it after that period, he cannot return it to the previous holder. The holder of a check is allowed one clear day to present or forward it for payment; after that time he holds it at his own risk.

Presentment in Copyholds. The 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 89, enacts, that every surrender and deed of surrender to be accepted by the lord, and every will and codicil, a copy whereof shall be delivered to the lord, to the steward, or his deputy, either at a court to be holden without the presence of homages (under s. 86), or out of court, and every gift and administration by the lord or the steward, or his deputy (under ss. 87, 88), shall be forthwith entered on the rolls of the manor; and that every such entry shall for all purposes be deemed and taken to be an entry made in pursuance of a presentment at a court by the homage assembled thereat. A presentment shall not now be essential to the validity of any administration (s. 90).

When a surrender was taken out of court, the presentment, by the general custom of manors, was to be made at the succeeding general court, or, if there were a special custom for it, at the second or third court day, or within a year, or alternatively at the next court, or at the next court after a year.—1 Scriv. Cop. 222.

The surrender, and every other document relating to the title, on being presented in court, should have been endorsed thus:—'Presented and enrolled at a court held for the manor of ——, the —— day of ——,' and then undersigned by at least two of the homage. But presentments are now, as we have seen, abolished.

Presents, the thing then actually made or spoken of.

Present use, one which has an immediate existence, and is at once operated upon by the statute of uses.

President, one placed in authority over others; one at the head of others; a governor; a chairman.

President of the Council, a great officer of state; a member of the Cabinet. He attends on the sovereign, proposes business at the council-table, and reports to the sovereign the transactions there.—1 Bl. Com. 230.

Press, the. As to the laws relating to it, see 39 Geo. III. c. 79, amended by 51 Geo. III. c. 65, and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 12. As to newspapers and pamphlets, see 60 Geo. III. & 1 Geo. IV. c. 91; 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 73, and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 76. There is no censorship over the press, but the author, the printer, and the publisher of a libel are liable to an action for damages at the suit of the party injured, or to an indictment, or in certain cases to a criminal information. See LIBEL.

Pressing seamen. See IMPRESSING MEN.

Prest, a duty in money that was to be paid by the sheriff on his account, in the Exchequer, or for money left or remaining in his hands.

Prestation-money, a sum of money paid by archdeacons yearly to their bishop; also purveyance.

Prest-money, a payment which binds those who receive it.

Prestimony, or Præstimonia, a fund or revenue appropriated by the founder for the subsistence of a priest, without being erected into any title or benefice, chapel, prebend, or priory. It is not subject to the ordinary; but of it the patron, and those who have a right from him, are the collators.—Canon Law.

Presumption, a supposition, opinion, or belief previously formed.—Wood's Inst. 599.

Presumptions are said to be either (1) juris et de jure, or (2) juris, or (3) hominis vel judicis. (1) The presumption juris et de jure is that where law or custom establishes the truth of any point, on a presumption that cannot be overcome by contrary evidence; thus a minor or infant, with guardians, is deprived of the power of acting without their consent, on a presumption of incapacity, which cannot be rebutted. (2) The præsumptio juris is a presumption established in law till the contrary be proved, as the property of goods is presumed to be in the possessor; every presumption of this kind must necessarily yield to contrary proof. (3) The præsumptio hominis vel judicis is the conviction arising from the circumstances of any particular case. See Best on Presumptions.

Presumption of life or death. Where a person is once shown to have been living, the law will in general presume that he is still alive, unless after a lapse of time considerably exceeding the ordinary duration of human life, but if there be evidence of his continuous unexplained absence from home, and of the non-receipt of intelligence concerning him for a period of seven years, the presumption of life ceases. But although a person who has not been heard of for seven years under such circumstances, is presumed to be dead, the law raises no presumption as to the time of his death. And, therefore, if anyone has to establish the precise time during those seven years at which such person died, he must do so by evidence.—Doe v. Nepean, 5 B. & Ad. 86; Nepean v. Doe, 2 M. & W. 894; Taylor on Evidence, s. 157.

Presumption of survivorship. The devolution of property frequently depends upon the survivorship of one of two or more persons who perish by the same calamity, such as shipwreck, battle, fire, collision of trains, &c., when there is no direct evidence as to the survivorship. In such cases the law of some countries has recourse to artificial presumptions, based upon the probabilities of survivorship resulting from age and sex; but the law of England recognizes no such presumption, but requires proof of survivorship from the person who relies upon it, and, in the absence of evidence, it considers that both or all of the persons so dying perished at the same time, and that neither transmitted his rights to the other or others. In such cases, though medical science cannot solve the difficulty, it may sometimes assist in forming a conclusion. See Fearne's Posthumous Works, 37, 72; Wing v. Angrave, 8 H. L. C. 183; Taylor on Evidence, 178; Best on Presumptions; and Beck's Med. Jurisp., where the laws and regulations of the continental nations are stated.

Presumptive evidence. See CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.—3 Stark. Evid. 927.

Presumptive heir, one who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would be his heir; but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born.

Presumptive title. A barely presumptive title, which is of the very lowest order, arises out of the mere occupation or simple possession of property (jus possessionis, Lat.), without any apparent right, or any pretence of right, to hold and continue such possession. This may happen where one man disseises another; or where, after the death of the ancestor, and before the entry of the heir, a stranger abates and holds out the heir. The law assumes that the actual occupant of land has the fee-simple in it, unless there be evidence rebutting such presumption, or his possession be properly explained and shown to be consonant with the right of the true proprietor of the reversionary fee. Such a presumption, in the absence of any satisfactory proof to the contrary, will sustain an action for a trespass by a wrongdoer, and will indeed be strengthened, by lapse of time, into a title complete and indefeasible.

This assumption is based on the well-known feudal maxim, that seisin must be the basis or stand-point in the deduction of every title, except in the case of descent.

Pret à usage [Fr.], loan for use; commodatum.

Pretensed right, where one is in possession of land, and another, who is out of possession, claims and sues for it; here the pretensed right or title is said to be in him who so claims and sues for the same.—Mod. Cas. 302.

Pretensed Title Statute, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, s. 2. It enacts that no one shall sell or purchase any pretended right or title to land, unless the vendor hath received the profits thereof for one whole year before such grant, or hath been in actual possession of the land, or of the reversion or remainder, on pain that both purchaser and vendor shall each forfeit the value of such land to the king and the prosecutor.

Preter legal, not agreeable to law.

Preterition, the entire omission of a child's name in the father's will, which rendered it null: exheredation being allowed, but not preterition.—Civ. Law.

Pretium affectionis, an imaginary value put on a thing by the fancy of the owner in his affection for it.—Bell.

Pretium sepulchri, mortuary, which see.

Pretium succedit in loco rei.—2 Buls. 321.—(The price succeeds in the place of the thing.)

Prevarication, a collusion between an informer and a defendant, in order to a feigned prosecution; also, any secret abuse committed in a public office or private commission.

Prevention [fr. prævenio, Lat.], the right which a superior person or officer has to lay hold of, claim, or transact, an affair prior to an inferior one, to whom otherwise it more immediately belongs, as when the judges prevent subaltern ones.—Canon Law Term.

Preventive Service, the body of armed police-officers engaged in watching the coasts for the purpose of preventing smuggling and other illegal acts. It is sometimes termed the Coast Blockade Force.

Price, equivalent paid for anything.

Price Current, a list or enumeration of various articles of merchandise, with their prices, the duties (if any) payable thereon, when imported or exported, with the drawbacks occasionally allowed upon their exportation, &c.

Lists of this description are published periodically, generally once or twice a week, in most great commercial cities and towns.

Pride-gavel, a rent or tribute.

Priest, a minister of a church (13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4, s. 14). A person under 24 years of age cannot be ordained a priest.—13 Eliz. c. 12, and 44 Geo. III. c. 43.

Primæ, or Primariæ Preces, the right of the sovereign to name to the first prebend which becomes vacant in the church, after his accession.

Primâ facie evidence, that which not being inconsistent with the falsity of the hypothesis, nevertheless raises such a degree of probability in its favor that it must prevail if it be credited by the jury, unless it be rebutted, or the contrary proved; conclusive evidence, on the other hand, is that which excludes, or at least tends to exclude, the possibility of the truth of any other hypothesis than the one attempted to be established.—1 Stark. Evid. 544.

Prima tonsura (the first crop).

Primage, a certain allowance paid by the shipper or consignee of goods to the master of a vessel for loading them.

The amount varies according to the custom of the place.

Primaria Ecclesia, the mother-church.

Primary conveyances, original conveyances; they are—

(1) Feoffments. (2) Grants. (3) Gifts.
(4) Leases. (5) Exchanges. (6) Partitions.

Primary evidence, the best evidence as distinguished from secondary evidence. See Taylor on Evid. 357.

Primate, a chief ecclesiastic; part of the style and title of an archbishop, thus the Archbishop of Canterbury is styled Primate of all England; the Archbishop of York is Primate of England; the Archbishop of Armagh is Primate of all Ireland; and the Archbishop of Dublin is Primate of Ireland.

Primer election, first choice.

Primer fine. On suing out the writ or præcipe, called a writ of covenant, there was due to the Crown, by ancient prerogative, a primer fine, or a noble for every five marks of land sued for; that was, one-tenth of the annual value.

Primer seisin, a feudal burthen, only incident to the king's tenants in capite, and not to those who held of inferior or mesne lords. It was a right which the king had, when any of his tenants in capite died seised of a knight's fee, to receive of the heir (provided he were of full age) one whole year's profits of the lands, if they were in immediate possession; and half a year's profits, if they were in reversion, expectant on an estate for life. It was incident to socage-tenants in capite, as well as those who held by knight-service. It is, however, abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Primer Serjeant, the Queen's first serjeant at law.

Primicerius, the first of any degree of men.

Primitiæ, the first fruits which were presented to the gods by the ancients; also, the profits of a living during the first year after avoidance, which formerly were taken by the Crown.

Primo beneficio, the first benefice in the sovereign's gift.

Primo excutienda est verbi vis, ne sermonis vitio obstruetur oratio, sive lex sine argumentis.—Co Litt. 68.—(The force of a word is to be first examined, lest by the fault of the diction the sentence is destroyed or the law be without arguments.)

Primogeniture, seniority, eldership, state of being first-born.

The right of primogeniture was not acknowledged by the Romans; sons and daughters all shared equally the property of their parents. In France, until the reign of Capet, even the kingdom was subject to division among the sons. In England, the custom of gavelkind and Borough-English are almost the only exceptions to this Norman rule of heritage.

Primum decretum, a provisional decree.

Prince [fr. princeps, Lat.], a sovereign, a chief ruler of either sex. 'Queen Elizabeth, a prince admirable above her sex for her princely virtues.'—Camden.

Princeps et respublica ex justâ causâ possunt rem meam auferre.—12 Co. 13.—(The prince and the republic, in a just cause, can take away my property.)

Princeps mavult domesticos milites quam stipendiarios bellicis apponere casibus.—Co. Litt. 69.—(A prince, in warlike chances, had rather employ domestic than foreign troops.)

Prince Consort, the late husband of the Queen. The husband of a queen regnant is her subject. The Act of Naturalisation of Prince Albert, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 2, required that he should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. It was provided by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 52, that if there should be issue of her Majesty, who at her demise should become king or queen of this realm, his royal highness should, until such issue should attain the age of eighteen, be the guardian of such issue, and should be entitled in his or her name, and under the style of Regent of the United Kingdom, to exercise the royal power. The Act, however, restrained him from giving the royal assent to any bill for varying the course of succession to the Crown as established by 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, or for altering the Act of Uniformity, 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4, relative to the services and ceremonies of the Church of England. And it further provided, that if after becoming guardian and regent he should profess, or marry a person who professed, the popish religion, or should cease to reside in the United Kingdom, all the authorities so vested in him should determine. See QUEEN REGNANT.

Prince of Wales, the eldest son of the sovereign. He is the heir-apparent to the Crown; he is created Earl of Chester, and is Duke of Cornwall by inheritance (during the life of the sovereign), without any new creation.—2 Step. Com. 459. As to his rights to submarine mines and minerals in Cornwall, see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 109; see also 13 & 14 Vict. c. 78; and as to the provision for the establishment of His Royal Highness and of the Princess of Wales, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 1.

Prince of Wales' Island, Singapore and Malacca. As to their Courts of Judicature, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 93.

Princes of the Royal Blood, the younger sons and daughters of the sovereign, and other branches of the royal family who are not in the immediate line of succession.—4 Step. Com. 61. As to the provision for the Princess Alice on her marriage with the Prince of Hesse, see 24 Vict. c. 15.

Princess of Wales, the wife or widow of the Prince of Wales.

Princess Royal, the eldest daughter of the sovereign. An annuity of 8,000*l.* was settled upon her by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 2, upon her marriage with Prince Frederick William of Prussia.

Princess Sophia of Hanover, the youngest daughter of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, who was the daughter of James I. On her and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, our Crown was settled, by 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2.

Principal, a head, a chief; also, a capital sum of money placed out at interest; also, an heir-loom, mortuary, or corse-present.

Principal and Accessary. (1) Principals in offences are of two degrees: (a) of the first degree, i. e. the actual perpetrators of the crime; (b) of the second degree, i. e. those who are present, aiding and abetting the fact to be done.

(2) Accessaries are not the chief actors in the offence, nor present at its performance, but are in some way concerned therein, either before or after the fact is committed. See ACCESSARY.

Principal and Agent, he who being competent and sui juris to do any act for his own benefit on his own account, employs another person to do it, is called the principal, constituent, or employer, and he who is thus employed is called the agent, attorney, proxy, or delegate of the principal, constituent, or employer. The relation thus created between the parties is termed an agency. The power thus delegated is called in law an authority. And the act, when performed, is often designated as an act of agency or procuration.—Story on Agency, 2. See AGENT.

Principal challenge, a species of challenge to the array made on account of partiality or some default in the sheriff or his under-officer who arrayed the panel. See CHALLENGE.

Principal and Surety. See GUARANTY.

Principalis debet semper excuti antequam perveniatur ad fidei jussores.—2 Inst. 19.—(The principal should always be exhausted before coming upon the sureties.)

Principia data sequuntur concomitantia.—(Certain things accompany and follow given principles.)

Principia probant, non probantur.—3 Co. 40.—(Principles prove, they are not proved.)

Principiis obsta.—(Oppose beginnings.)

Principiorum non est ratio.—2 Buls. 239.—(For principles there is no reason.)

Principis beneficium debet esse mansurum.—Jenk. Cent. 138.—(The benefit of a prince ought to be lasting.)

Principis patrimonium semper favorabile fuit in omni republicâ.—2 Inst. 272.—(The patrimony of a prince was always favourable in every commonwealth.)

Principium est potissima pars cujusque rei.—10 Co. 49.—(The principle of anything is its most powerful part.)

Prior, chief of a convent, next in dignity to an abbot.

Prior tempore potior jure.—(He who is first in time is preferred in law.)

Priority, an antiquity of tenure in comparison with another less ancient; also, that which is before another in order of time.

Prisage, or Butlerage, a custom whereby the prince challenges out of every bark laden with wine, two tuns of wine at his own price. Abolished by 51 Geo. III. c. 15; also, that share, usually a tenth part, which belongs to the sovereign or admiral out of such merchandises as are taken at sea, by way of lawful prize.

Priso, a prisoner taken in war.

Prison, a place of confinement for the safe custody of persons; a gaol.

The erection, maintenance, and regulation of gaols are provided for by several Acts of Parliament, of which see 4 Geo. IV. c. 64; 5 Geo. IV. cc. 12, 85; 6 Geo. IV. c. 40; 7 Geo. IV. c. 18; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. cc. 38, 76, s. 114, &c.; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 105; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. cc. 55, 78; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 56; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 25; 5 & 6 Vict. cc. 53, 98; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 50; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 39; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 82; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 91; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 43; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 115; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 79; c. 66 (Ireland), and c. 109 (Scotland).

The Acts as to Convict Prisons abroad are consolidated by 22 Vict. c. 25.

Prisonam frangentibus, Statute de, 1 Edw. II.—2 Reeves, c. xii., p. 290.

Prisoner, one who is deprived of his liberty. A prisoner on matter of record is he who, being present in court, is by the court committed to prison; a prisoner on arrest is one apprehended by a sheriff or other lawful officer.

Prius vitiis laboravimus, nunc legibus.—4 Inst. 76.—(We labored first with vices, now with laws.)

Private Acts of Parliament, Acts operating upon particular persons and private concerns of which the courts are not bound to take notice if they are not formally pleaded, so called to distinguish them from public or general acts which apply to the whole community, and of which the courts must take judicial notice. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

A private Act of Parliament is a mode of transferring an estate frequently resorted to in order to disentangle an estate from a mass of confusion, to unfetter its owner, or to supply careless omissions which the judicature cannot cope with. An estate-act, rarely, if ever, meddles with the title; thus, inclosure acts, while they change the land, do not change the title, for the title which an owner has to his lands or common rights, at the time of allotment or exchange, is communicated to the land he receives under the allotments or exchanges, while, under a mere private act of exchange between individuals, each holds the land under the title which attached to these lands prior to the exchange. Such an one may, therefore, be evicted, though the title to the lands he gave in exchange may be perfectly good. The characteristic of inclosure-bills, acts for partition, or exchange, is understood to be to make the lands which are received upon allotment, partition, or exchange subject to the same estates and uses as the lands in respect of which the allotment, exchange, partition, or exchange was made.

The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, will diminish the frequency of estate-acts.

Private Bill Office, an office of Parliament where the business of obtaining private Acts of Parliament is conducted.

Privateers. See LETTERS OF MARQUE.

Privation, a taking away or withdrawing; an abbreviation, by aphæresis, of the word deprivation.

Privatio præsupponit habitum.—2 Rol. Rep. 419.—(A deprivation presupposes a possession.)

Privatum commodum publico cedit.—Jenk. Cent. 223.—(Private good yields to public.)

Privatum incommodum publico bono pensatur. Jenk. Cent. 85.—(Private loss is compensated by public good.)

Privement ensient, pregnancy in its earlier stages.

Privies, those who are partakers or have an interest in any action or thing, or any relation to another. They are of six kinds:—

(1) Privies of blood, such as the heir to his ancestor.

(2) Privies in representation, as executors or administrators to their deceased testator or intestate.

(3) Privies in estate, between grantor and grantee, lessor and lessee, assignor and assignee, &c.

(4) Privies, in respect of contract, are personal privities, and extend only to the persons of the lessor and lessee.

(5) Privies, in respect of estate and contract, as where the lessee assigns his interest, but the contract between lessor and lessee continues, the lessor not having accepted of the assignee.

(6) Privies in law, as the lord by escheat, a tenant by the courtesy, or in dower, the incumbent of a benefice, a husband suing or defending in right of his wife, &c.

Privilege, an exemption from some duty, burthen, or attendance, to which certain persons are entitled, from a supposition of law, that the stations they fill, or the offices they are engaged in, are such as require all their care; and that, therefore, without this indulgence, it would be impracticable to execute such offices so advantageously as the public good requires.

It is either personal, i. e. granted to a person either against or beyond the course of the common law in other cases, as privilege of Parliament, or real, i. e. granted to a place, as to the universities, that none of either may be called to Westminster Hall, or prosecuted in other courts, on any contract made within their own precincts.

The privileges of Parliament are of three kinds: (1) The privileges which appertain to members individually. (2) Those which belong to either House in its collective capacity. (3) Those of both Houses jointly. From well-known precedents it appears that the Lords and Commons, acting concurrently, can assume the supreme power whenever the throne is vacant, or the sovereign incapable of exercising the royal functions, as happened at the Revolution in 1688; in 1788, when the sovereign authority was offered to the Prince of Wales, though George III. recovered so speedily that a regency became unnecessary; in 1812, when a restricted regency was appointed; and, subsequently, when the restrictions were removed. The separate privileges of either House are extensive, but they are at the same time uncertain and indefinite. Amongst those privileges are, the power of committing persons to prison; the power of publishing matters which, if not issuing from such high authority, might become the subject of proceedings in a court of law; the power of directing the Attorney-General to prosecute persons accused of offences against the law or affecting the privilege of Parliament; and finally, a power vested in each House respectively of doing anything not directly contravening an Act of Parliament which may be necessary for the vindication or protection of itself in the exercise of its own constitutional functions. In the daily proceedings of Parliament, questions of privilege take precedence of all other business. The privileges of individual members of Parliament are, freedom of speech and person, including freedom from arrest and seizures under process from the courts of law or equity; this, however, does not extend to indictable offences, to actual contempts of the courts of justice, or to proceedings in bankruptcy. Members of Parliament are exempt from serving the office of sheriff, from obeying subpœnas, and serving on juries. Every member can introduce one person to the strangers' gallery. 'Privilege of Parliament' continues to Peers at all times, and to Commoners for a 'convenient' time after prorogation and dissolution. Peers are entitled to be present at the coronation of the sovereign, but places were never provided for the Commons at that ceremonial until the reign of William IV. Peers cannot be outlawed in any civil action, nor can any attachment lie against their persons; they are exempt from attending courts-leet or the posse comitatus; when arraigned for any criminal offence it must be before their peers, who return a verdict, not upon oath, but upon honor; they have the privilege of sitting covered in courts of justice; they may vote in Parliament by proxy.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Privilege, Writ of, a process to enforce or maintain a privilege.

Privileged communication, a communication which a witness cannot be compelled to divulge, such as that which takes place between husband and wife, between a client and his legal adviser, and which cannot be disclosed without the client's consent; secrets of state, &c. See Taylor on Evidence, 749–784. Also a communication which cannot be made the ground of an action for defamation, such as that which is made bonâ fide by a master respecting the character of a servant to a person intending to employ him. See LIBEL.

Privileged copyholds, customary copyholds, which see.

Privileged debts, debts which an executor may pay in preference to all others, such as sick-bed and funeral expenses, the expenses of mourning, servants' wages, &c.

Privileged villenage, villein socage, which see.

Privilegia, or Laws, ex post facto, laws which are enacted after an act is committed, declaring it for the first time to have been a crime, and inflicting a punishment upon the person who has committed it.

Of such laws the great Roman orator thus speaks:—Vetant leges sacratæ, vetant duodecim tabulæ, leges privatis hominibus irrogari; id enim est privilegium. Nemo unquam tulit, nihil est crudelius, nihil perniciosius, nihil quod minus hæc civitas ferre possit.—Cicero Pro Domo 17.

Privilegia quæ re verâ sunt in præjudicium reipublicæ, magis tamen habent speciosa frontispicia, et boni publici prætextum, quam bonæ et legales concessiones: sed prætextu liciti non debet admitti illicitum.—11 Co. 88.—(Privileges which are truly in prejudice of public good, have, however, a more specious front and pretext of public good, than good and legal grants; but under pretext of legality, that which is illegal ought not to be admitted.)

Privilegium clericale, the benefit of clergy, which is abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28.

Privilegium, property propter, a qualified property in animals feræ naturæ, i.e. a privilege of hunting, taking and killing them, in exclusion of others.—2 Bl. Com. 394.

Privilegium est beneficium personale, et extinguitur cum personâ.—3 Buls. 8.—(A privilege is a personal benefit, and dies with the person.)

Privilegium est quasi privata lex.—2 Buls. 189. (Privilege is, as it were, a private law.)

Privilegium non valet contra rempublican. Bac. Max. 25.—(A privilege avails not against public good.)

Privity, participation in interest or knowledge. See PRIVIES.

Privy [fr. privé, Fr.], having a participation in interest or knowledge.

Privy Council, a great council of state held by the sovereign with her councillors, to concert matters for the public service, and for the honor and safety of the realm.

The sovereign nominates privy councillors, and no patent or grant is necessary. The number of the council is indefinite, and is dependent upon the royal will. It is summoned on a warning of forty-four hours, and never held without the presence of a secretary of state; the junior delivers his opinion first, and the sovereign, if present, last; it is dissolved six months after the demise of the Crown, unless sooner determined by the successor. As to deputy-clerk of the council, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 1.

Privy Council, Judicial Committee of the. See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Privy Councillors, the sovereign's advisers.

They are made by the royal nomination, without either patent or grant; and on taking the necessary oaths, they become immediately privy councillors during the life of the sovereign who chooses them, but subject to removal at the royal discretion.

Their duties are: (1) To advise the sovereign according to the best of their cunning and discretion. (2) To advise for the sovereign's honor and good of the public; without partiality through affection, love, meed, doubt, or dread. (3) To keep the sovereign's counsel secret. (4) To avoid corruption. (5) To help and strengthen the execution of what shall be resolved. (6) To withstand all persons who would attempt the contrary. (7) To observe, keep, and do all that a true and good councillor ought to do to his sovereign.—2 Step. Com. 477.

Privy Purse, the income set apart for the sovereign's personal use. See CIVIL LIST.

Privy Seal and Privy Signet. The Privy Seal (privatum sigillum) is a seal of the sovereign under which charters, pardons, &c., signed by the sovereign, pass before they come to the great seal, and also used for some documents of less consequence which do not pass the great seal at all, such as discharges of recognizances, debts, &c. The Privy Signet is one of the sovereign's seals, used in sealing his private letters and all such grants as pass his hand by bill signed, which seal is always in the custody of the king's secretaries. There were formerly four clerks of the signet office, but by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 82, s. 3, the offices of clerks of the signet and of the privy seal are abolished. The practice as to the passing of letters under these seals was altered and simplified by the same statute. See 1 Step. Com. 626. See GREAT SEAL AND LORD PRIVY SEAL. As to forgery of the Privy Seal and Privy Signet, see FORGERY.

Privy tithes, small tithes.

Privy verdict, so called when the judge has left or adjourned the court, and the jury being agreed, in order to be delivered from their confinement, obtain leave to give their verdict privily to the judge out of court; but if the judge have adjourned the court to his own lodgings, and there receive the verdict, it is a public and not a private verdict. Privy verdicts are now wholly disused.—3 Bl. Com. 377.

Prize Commission. See ADMIRALTY COURT.

Prize Court. This is an international tribunal, existing only by virtue of a special commission under the great seal, during war or until the litigations incident to war have been brought to a conclusion. It is frequently confounded with the Court of Admiralty, in consequence, perhaps, of the same judge usually presiding in both courts; but this is a mistake, for the whole system of litigation and jurisprudence in the prize court, though exceedingly important, is peculiar to itself, and is governed by rules not applying to the instance court of the Admiralty, which is a mere civil tribunal.

In this court are directly decided, not only questions relating to captures, prize, and booty (being prize on shore), but also questions upon the law of nations; though sometimes the latter, and even the construction of treaties, are collaterally argued, and determined in other courts.

Pro [for, or in respect of], in the grant of an annuity pro consilio, showing the cause of a grant amounts to a condition; but in a feoffment or lease for life, &c. it is the consideration, and does not amount to a condition; for the state of the land by the feoffment is executed, and the grant of the annuity is executory.—Plowd. 412.

Proamita, a great paternal aunt, the sister of one's grandfather.

Proamita magna, a great great aunt.

Proavia, a great grandmother.

Proavunculus, a great great uncle.

Proavus, a great grandfather.

Probandi necessitas incumbit illi qui agit.—(The necessity of proving lies upon him who brings the charge.)

Probate, official proof of a will. This is obtained by the executor in the Probate Court, and is either in common form, or per testes, in solemn form of law. When the will is so proved, the original must be deposited in the registry of the court, and a copy thereof on parchment is made out under its seal, and delivered to the executors, together with a certificate of its having been proved, all which together is usually styled the probate.—55 Geo. Com. 205. As to probate duty, see 2 Step. III. c. 184, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 36, s. 1.

Probate, Court of, a tribunal recently established by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, to which the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in testamentary matters has been transferred. As to a site for the court and offices, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 16.

Probation, proof, evidence, testimony.

Probationer, one who is upon trial.

Probationes debent esse evidentes, scil. perspicuæ et faciles intelligi.—Co. Litt. 283.—(Proofs ought to be evident, to wit, perspicuous and easily understood.)

Probator, an examiner; an accuser or approver, or one who undertakes to prove a crime charged upon another.

Probatory term, a time for taking testimony.

Probatum est (it is tried or proved).

Probi et legales homines [Lat.] (good and lawful men).

Procedendo, a writ which issues out of the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, when judges of any subordinate court delay the parties, for that they will not give judgment either on the one side or on the other, when they ought so to do. In such a case, a writ of procedendo ad judicium shall be awarded, commanding the inferior court in the Queen's name to proceed to give judgment, but without specifying any particular judgment; for that, if erroneous, may be set aside by proceedings in error, or by writ of false judgment; and upon further neglect or refusal, the judges of the inferior court may be punished for their contempt by writ of attachment, returnable in the courts at Westminster. It also lies where an action has been removed from an inferior to a superior court by habeas corpus, certiorari, or any like writ, and it appears to the superior court that it was removed on insufficient grounds. A suit once so remanded shall never afterwards be removed before judgment in any court whatever.—21 Jac. I. c. 23.

Procedendo on Aid Prayer. If one pray in aid of the Crown in a real action, and aid be granted, it shall be awarded that he sue to the sovereign in Chancery, and the justices in the Common Pleas shall stay until this writ of procedendo de loquelâ come to them. So also on a personal action.—N. N. B. 342.

Proceeds, the sum, amount, or value of goods, &c. sold, or converted into money.

Proceres, chief magistrates.

Procès verbal [Fr.], an authentic minute of an official act, or statement of facts.

Process, it is largely taken for all the proceedings in any action or prosecution, real or personal, civil or criminal, from the beginning to the end; strictly, the summons by which one is cited into a court, because it is the beginning or principal part thereof, by which the rest is directed.—Brit. 138.

At common law the superior courts at Westminster, in personal actions, differed greatly, before the Uniformity of Process Act, in their modes of process, and even the same court admitted a considerable variety of methods, according to the circumstances of the case.

The varieties as to process in personal actions may be summed up thus:—In each of the courts the proceeding against attornies and officers—in the Queen's Bench and Exchequer, that against prisoners also—was by bill without process; and in other cases their processes or modes of commencing the suits were as follows:—

In the Queen's Bench.

By original:—
Original writ adapted to the action.

By bill:—
(1) Attachment of privilege . . { (1) With ac etiam, or bailable. (2) Not bailable.
(2) Bill of Middlesex { (1) Bailable. (2) Not bailable.
(3) Latitat . . { (1) Bailable. (2) Not bailable.
(4) Bill and summons.

In the Common Pleas.

By original:—
(1) Original writ adapted to the action.
(2) Original writ quare clausum fregit.
(3) Common capias { (1) Bailable. (2) Not bailable.

By bill:—
(1) Attachment of privilege.
(2) Bill and summons.

In the Exchequer of Pleas.

(1) Venire ad respondendum.
(2) Subpœna ad respondendum.
(3) Quo minus capias.
(4) Venire of privilege.
(5) Capias of privilege.
(6) Bill and summons.

1*st Com. Law Rep.* 74.

The process now for the commencement of all personal actions is the same in all the courts, and is called a writ of summons. The three real actions are commenced by original. The mixed action of ejectment by writ of ejectment.

The ordinary process, in Chancery suits, is service of a copy of the bill or claim, with an endorsed citation, which requires the defendant to appear on a certain day. In the case of privilege of peerage, a letter-missive, requesting the defendant to appear, is first obtained and served, and on his default, service of a copy of the bill in the ordinary way.

The mode of commencing an ecclesiastical suit, and bringing the parties before the court, is, by process, called a citation or summons, containing the name of the judge, the plaintiff and defendant, the cause of complaint, and the time and place of appearance. This citation, in ordinary cases, is obtained as a matter of course, from the registry of the court, and under its seal; but in special cases the facts are alleged in what is called an act of court, and upon those facts the judge or his surrogate decrees the party to be cited; to which, in certain cases, is added an intimation; and if the party do not appear, or appearing, do not show cause to the contrary, the prayer of the plaintiff set forth in the decree will be granted.

Some suits in the Court of Probate, and all suits in the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, are commenced by citation.

In criminal causes, if the offender be not in custody before indictment, the process for treason, felony, or misdemeanor, is capias to bring him before the court. But in misdemeanors it is also the practice, upon an indictment found during the sessions or assizes, to issue a bench-warrant, signed by a judge or two justices of the peace, to apprehend the offender.

Processum continuando, a writ for the continuance of process after the death of the chief justice or other justices in the commission of oyer and terminer.—Reg. Orig. 128.

Processus derivatur à procedendo, ab originali ad finem.—(Process is derived from procedendo, proceeding from the beginning to the end.)

Processus legis est gravis vexatio; executio legis coronat opus.—Co. Litt. 289.—(The process of law is a heavy vexation; the execution of the law crowns the labor.)

Prochein amy [proximus amicus, Lat.], the next friend or next of kin to a child in his nonage, who in that respect is allowed to deal for the infant in the management of his affairs; as to be his guardian if he hold land in socage, and in the redress of any wrong done to him. See NEXT FRIEND.

Prochein avoidance, a power to present a minister to a church when it shall next become void.

Prochronism [fr. πρόχρονος, Gk., anterior], an error in chronology; a dating a thing before it happened.

Proclamation, publication by authority; a notice public. As to royal proclamations, see 1 Edw. VI. c. 12. Proclamation is used particularly in the beginning or calling of a court, and at the discharge or adjourning thereof, for the attendance of persons and despatch of business.

The writ of proclamation in outlawry is abolished.

Proclamation of rebellion, a writ whereby a man not appearing on his subpœna, or an attachment in Chancery, is deputed and declared a rebel if he render not himself by the day assigned. It is abolished. See Consol. Ord. 1860, xxx., r. 5.

Proclamation of recusants, a proceeding whereby such persons were formerly convicted on their non-appearance at the assizes.—29 Eliz. c. 6; 3 Jac. I. c. 4.

Proclamations, Fine with. To render a fine more universally public and less liable to be levied by fraud or covin, it was directed by 4 Hen. VII. c. 24 (in confirmation of a previous statute), that a fine after engrossing should be openly and solemnly read and proclaimed in court (during which all pleas should cease) sixteen times, viz. four times in the term in which it was made, and four times in each of the three succeeding terms, which was reduced to once in each term by 31 Eliz. c. 2, and these proclamations were endorsed on the record. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Proclamator, an officer of the Court of Common Pleas.

Pro confesso, where a bill is filed in Chancery, to which the defendant does not answer, the matter contained in the bill shall be taken as if it were confessed by defendant. See CONFESSO, BILL TAKEN PRO.

Proconsules, justices in eyre.—Cowel.

Proctor [fr. procurator, Lat.], a manager of another person's affairs; also, a species of constable in our universities.

Proctors in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty courts discharge duties similar to those of solicitors and attornies in other courts. In order to entitle a person to be admitted a proctor to practise in the Court of Arches, it is required that he shall have served a clerkship of seven years, under articles, with one of the thirty-four senior proctors, who must be of five years' standing, and who, by the rules of the court, is prohibited from taking a second clerk until the first shall have served five years, except in the event of the death of a proctor to whom a clerk may have been articled before the completion of his clerkship. In this case any other of the thirty-four senior proctors may take such clerk for the remainder of the term, although he himself may at the same time have a clerk of less than five years' standing. Before a clerk is permitted to be articled, he is required to produce a certificate of his having made reasonable progress in classical education.

When the term of seven years is completed, the party is admitted a notary by a faculty from the Archbishop of Canterbury; a petition is then presented to his grace, accompanied by a certificate, signed by three advocates and three proctors, that the party applying to be admitted has served as articled clerk to a proctor of the court for the full term of seven years. If this certificate be approved, the archbishop issues his fiat, and a commission is directed to the Dean of the Arches, by whom the party is admitted, under the title of a supernumerary, with similar ceremonies to those observed on the admission of an advocate. They appear in court in black stuff gowns. From the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts having been mainly abolished, the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 43, 105, & 106, and c. 85, s. 69, award them compensation, and admit them to practise, not only in the Probate and Divorce Courts, but also in the Courts of Equity and Common Law. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, s. 9, and c. 108, s. 13.

Proctors of the clergy, they who are chosen and appointed to appear for cathedral or other collegiate churches; as also for the common clergy of every diocese, to sit in the convocation-house in the time of Parliament.

Procuration, an agency, the administration of the business of another; also money which parish-priests pay yearly to the bishop or archdeacon, ratione visitationis; these are also called proxies, and it is said that there are three sorts —ratione visitationis, consuetudinis, et pacti.—Hardr. 180.

Bills of exchange may be drawn, accepted, or endorsed by procuration, i.e. by an agent who has an authority for such a purpose.

Procuration fee, a sum of money or commission taken by scriveners on effecting loans of money.

A solicitor for a mortgagee may now take any amount of procuration money on a loan by way of mortgage, the 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 16, s. 2, limiting it to 5*s.* in the pound, being abolished by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90.

Procuratio est exhibitio sumptuum necessariorum facta prælatis, qui diœceses peragrando, ecclesias subjectas visitant.—Dav. 1.—(Procuration is the providing necessaries for the bishops, who, in travelling through their dioceses, visit the churches subject to them.)

Procurationem adversus nulla est præscriptio. Dav. 6.—(There is no prescription against procuration.)

Procurator, one who has a charge committed to him by any person; an agent.

Procurator Fiscal, the public prosecutor in Scotland, who institutes the preliminary inquiry into crime within his district, and acts generally under the instructions of the Lord Advocate.

Procuratores ecclesiæ parochialis, churchwardens.—Paroch. Antiq. 562.

Procuratorium, the instrument by which any person or community constituted or delegated their proctor to represent them in any court or cause.

Procuratory of resignation, a proceeding in the law of Scotland, by which a vassal authorises the fee to be returned to his superior, either to remain the property of the superior, in which case it is said to be a resignation ad remanentiam, or for the purpose of the superior's giving out the fee to a new vassal or to the former vassal and a new series of heirs, which is termed a resignation in favor. It is analogous to the surrender of copyholds in England.

Prodes homines, the barons of the realm.

Prodition, treason, treachery.

Proditor, a traitor. Obsolete.

Proditoriè (treasonably).

Production, the creation of objects which constitute wealth. The requisites of production are labor, capital, and the materials and motive forces afforded by nature. Of these, labor, and the raw material of the globe, are primary and indispensable. Natural motive powers may be called in to the assistance of labor, and are a help, but not an essential, of production. The remaining requisite, capital, is itself the product of labor; its instrumentality in production is therefore, in reality, that of labor in an indirect shape.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 124.

Pro eo quo (for this that).

Pro falso clamore suo, a nominal amercement of a plaintiff for his false claim, which used to be inserted in a judgment for the defendant. Obsolete.

Profaneness, irreverence of what is sacred.

Profer [fr. proférer, Fr.], to produce; an offer or endeavor to proceed in an action; also, the time appointed for the accounts of officers in the Exchequer, which was twice a year.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99, s. 2.

Profert in curiâ (he produces in court), where either party alleged any deed, he was generally obliged, by a rule of pleading, to make profert of such deed; that is, to produce it in court simultaneously with the pleading in which it was alleged. This, in the days of oral pleading, was of course an actual production in court. Since then, it consisted of a formal allegation that he showed the deed in court, it being, in fact, retained in his own custody.—Step. Plead. 72. See OYER. Abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 55.

Profession, calling, vocation, known employment; divinity, physic, and law are called the learned professions.

Profit and Loss, the gain or loss arising from goods bought or sold, the former of which, in book-keeping, is placed on the creditor's side, the latter on the debtor's side. Net profit is the gain made by selling goods at a price beyond what they cost the seller, and beyond all costs and charges.

Profits, the advantages which land yields in the shape of rent, issues, or other emoluments; also gains, pecuniary advantage, from whatever source derived.

Profits mesne. See MESNE PROFITS.

Prohibetur ne quis faciat in suo quod nocere possit alieno: et sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas.—9 Co. 59.—(It is prohibited for any to do that on his own property which may injure another's; and so use your own, that you do not hurt another's.)

Prohibition, a writ to forbid any court to proceed in any cause there depending, on the suggestion that the cognizance thereof belongs not to such court. It is a remedy provided by the common law against the encroachment of jurisdiction.

This writ issues not only out of the Queen's Bench, but also out of the Courts of Chancery, Exchequer, and Common Pleas, to any inferior court of common law, or to the courts of the counties palatine, to the county courts or courts baron, or to the courts christian or ecclesiastical, the university courts, or the Court of Admiralty, when they concern themselves with any matter not within their jurisdiction, or where they transgress the bounds prescribed to them by the laws of England. If either the judge or a party proceed after such prohibition, an attachment may be had against them for contempt, at the discretion of the court that awarded it; and an action for damages will lie against them, by the party injured. It is doubtful whether a prohibition will lie to the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. See Forster v. Forster and Berridge.—8 Law Times, 661.

The proceedings to obtain this writ are the following:—

The party aggrieved in the court below, applies to the superior court, setting forth the nature and cause of his complaint, in being drawn ad aliud examen, by a jurisdiction or manner of process disallowed by the laws of the kingdom. This used formerly to be done by filing, as of record, what was called a suggestion, containing a formal statement of the facts; but now by 1 Wm. IV. c. 21, it is provided, that it shall not be necessary to file any suggestion, but that an application for this writ may be made by affidavits only, that is, in the way of an ordinary motion, by a rule to show cause; upon which, if the matter alleged appear to the court to be sufficient, the writ immediately issues, commanding the judge not to hold, and the party not to prosecute the plea. But sometimes the point may be too nice and doubtful to be decided merely upon a motion, and then for the more solemn determination of the question, the party applying for the writ is directed by the court to declare in prohibition, that is, to deliver a declaration against the other, setting forth in a concise manner so much of the proceeding in the court below as may be necessary to show the ground of the application, praying that a writ may issue; and this used formerly to be connected with an allegation, that the party sued on behalf of the Crown, as well as of himself, and of a supposition or fiction (which was not traversable), that the defendant had proceeded in the suit below, notwithstanding a writ of prohibition. But by the statute just quoted, the use of these forms is now expressly abolished; and it is provided, that to this declaration the party defendant may demur, or plead such matters by way of traverse or otherwise as may be proper to show that the writ ought not to issue, and conclude by praying that such writ may not issue; and judgment shall be given that the writ do or do not issue, as justice may require; and the party in whose favor judgment shall be given, whether on nonsuit, verdict, demurrer, or otherwise, shall be entitled to the costs attending the application and subsequent proceedings, and have judgment to recover the same; and in case a verdict shall be given for the party plaintiff in such declaration, it shall be lawful for the jury to assess damages, for which judgment shall also be given; but such assessment shall not be necessary to entitle the plaintiff to costs. Promatertera, a great maternal aunt; the sister of one's grandmother.

Promatertera magna, a great great aunt.

Promise, a voluntary engagement for the performance or non-performance of some particular thing, which may be made either by deed, or without deed, when it is said to be by parol; promise is usually applied when the engagement is by parol only, for a promise by deed is technically called a covenant. See CONTRACT.

Promissee, one to whom a promise has been made.

Promissor, one who makes a promise.

Promissory note, a written engagement by one person to pay another therein named, absolutely and unconditionally, a certain sum of money at a time specified therein. It is generally negotiable by being made payable to order or to the bearer, for it is rarely made payable only to a particular person named therein. The person who makes the note is called the maker, and the person to whom it is payable is called the payee; when it is negotiated by the indorsement of the payee, he is called the indorser, and the person to whom the note is transferred is the indorsee.—*Story on Prom. Protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectio protectionem.—Co. Litt. 65.—(Protection begets subjection, subjection protection.)

Protection, defence, shelter from evil, especially from being arrested; also, an immunity granted by the Crown to a certain person to be free from suits at law for a certain time, and for some reasonable cause; it is a branch of the royal prerogative. It is now very rarely, if ever, resorted to.

Protection Acts, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96.

Protectionibus, de, the statute 33 Edw. I. stat. 1, allowing a challenge to be entered against a protection, &c.

Protector of the Settlement, the person appointed by the Fines and Recoveries' Act, in substitution of the old tenant to the præcipe, whose concurrence in barring estates-tail in remainder is required in order to preserve, under certain modifications, the control of the tenant for life over the remainder man.

The protector is thus defined:—'If, at the time when there shall be a tenant-in-tail of lands under a settlement, there shall be subsisting in the same lands, or any of them under the same settlement, any estate for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, or any greater estate (not being an estate for years), prior to the estate-tail, then the owner of the prior estate, or the first of such prior estates (if more than one) then subsisting under the same settlement, or who would have been so if no absolute disposition thereof had been made (the first of such prior estates, if more than one, being, for all the purposes of this Act, deemed the prior estate), shall be the protector of the settlement, so far as regards the lands in which such prior estate shall be subsisting, and shall for all the purposes of this Act be deemed the owner of such prior estate, although the same may have been charged or incumbered either by the owner thereof or by the settlor, or otherwise howsoever; and although the whole of the rents and profits be exhausted or required for the payment of the charges and incumbrances of such prior estate, and although such prior estate may have been absolutely disposed of by the owner thereof, or by or in consequence of the bankruptcy or insolvency of such owner, or by any other act or default of such owner.' It is to be observed, that his prior estate must continue to subsist, for if it be merged, surrendered, or determined by forfeiture, it is presumed that he would cease to be the protector. The section then goes on to enact, 'that an estate by the courtesy, in respect to the estate-tail, or of any prior estate created by the same settlement, shall be deemed a prior estate under the same settlement within the meaning of this clause; and that an estate by way of resulting use or trust to or for the settlor, shall be deemed an estate under the same settlement within the meaning of this clause' (s. 22).

'Where two or more persons shall be owners of a prior estate under a settlement, the sole owner of which would, in respect thereof, have been the protector, each of such persons in respect of such undivided share as he could dispose of, shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed the owner of a prior estate, and shall be the sole protector to the extent of such undivided share' (s. 23). Where the estate conferring the protectorship is limited to a married woman, the husband and wife are protectors as one owner, unless the estate be settled to her separate use, when she is sole protector (s. 24).

'Where an estate shall be limited by a settlement by way of confirmation, or where the settlement shall merely have the effect of restoring an estate, in either of those cases, such estate, for the purposes of this Act, so far as regards the protector, shall be deemed a subsisting estate under such settlement' (s. 25); excepting a lease at a rent, in which case the lessee is not to be a protector (s. 26).

No woman, in respect of her dower, and no bare trustee, heir, executor, administrator, or assign, in respect to any estate taken by him as such, shall be the protector, except he be a bare trustee under a settlement made before the passing of this Act, August 28th, 1833 (ss. 27 & 31). A trustee, therefore, having the first immediate estate of freehold, will be the protector of a settlement made before August 28th, 1833. Where the owner of the prior estate is excluded by the 26th and 27th sections, then the person, if any, who, if such estate did not exist, would have been the protector, shall be such protector (s. 28).

Where, on or before December 31st, 1833, an estate under a settlement shall have been disposed of either absolutely or otherwise, and either for valuable consideration or not, the person who, in respect of such estate, would have been the person to make a tenant to the præcipe for suffering a common recovery of the lands entailed by such settlement, is, during the continuance of the estate, to be the protector (s. 29). Also, if any person having, on or before December 31st, 1833, disposed of a remainder or reversion in fee, would not under the general provisions of the Act, be the protector, then the person who would have been the person to make the tenant to the præcipe is, during the continuance of the estate which would have conferred the right to make the tenant, declared to be the protector (s. 30).

It will be necessary then, where it is intended to bar an entail created on or before December 31st, 1833, to ascertain in whom the immediate freehold of the lands is vested, in the same way as it was required in order to determine who was the proper person for making a tenant to the præcipe in a recovery. The estate, under the 29th section, must be created by the same instrument which creates the estate-tail; for instance, if land be conveyed to A. for life, and afterwards a settlement of the reversion be made to B. in tail, and A. alienates his life estate to C. on or before December 31st, 1833, C. would not be the protector under this Act, though he would have been the person to make the tenant to the præcipe under the old law; and this is one case in which the old tenant to the præcipe is not analogous to the protector of a settlement. If, however, the estate for life to A., and the estate-tail to B. were created by the same settlement, then C. would have been the protector. An instance of the operation of the 30th section may be where A., a tenant for ninety-nine years determinable on his death, with remainder to B. for life, with remainder to C. in-tail, with remainder or reversion to the said A. in fee, should have aliened his remainder or reversion on or before December 31st, 1833; in such case B. and his assigns would, during his (B.'s) life estate, be the protector; otherwise A. might have consented, as the protector in respect of his chattel interest, to the barring of his own remainder or reversion. Under the old law B. would have been the person to make the tenant to the præcipe, he having the first estate of freehold.

The 32nd section enables a settlor not only to appoint any persons in esse, not exceeding three (exclusive of aliens), whether taking an interest under the settlement or not, to the office of protector, but also by means of a power of nominating to vacancies inserted in the settlement, duly enrolled, as afterwards shown, to continue the protectorship in any persons in esse, not exceeding three, for the whole or any part of the period for which the office would have endured by force of the limitation. The person who, in respect of the prior estate, would ordinarily be the sole protector, may be appointed one of the special protectors, and if so appointed, will, unless there be a direction to the contrary, continue protector, after the death or resignation (by deed inrolled) of the rest until further appointment. It must be observed that this power is one of substitution only, not authorizing the creation of a protectorship, where none would otherwise exist.

The Act substitutes the Lord Chancellor (or now the Lords Justices of Appeal) in the place of a protector who shall be a lunatic; and the Court of Chancery in the place of a protector who shall be convicted of treason or felony; or of a protector, not being the owner of a prior estate, who shall be an infant, or where it shall be uncertain whether he be living or dead. The Court of Chancery is also substituted during the continuance of the prior estate where the settlor declares that the person who, as owner of a prior estate under such settlement, would be entitled to be protector, shall not be such protector, and does not appoint any protector in his stead. And also, in every other case where there shall be under a settlement, a prior estate sufficient to qualify a protector, and there shall happen to be no protector, the Court of Chancery, during the continuance of the prior estate, is to be the protector (s. 33).

The powers of the protector are thus defined:—If, when any person, actual tenant-in-tail of lands under a settlement, but not entitled to the remainder or reversion in fee immediately expectant on the determination of his estate-tail, desires to dispose of the lands entailed, there be a protector, then his consent shall be requisite to enable such tenant to dispose of the entailed lands to the full extent, but the tenant may, without such consent, dispose of the entailed land, which shall be good against all persons who claim from the tenant (s. 34). This, then, is equivalent to a fine with proclamations, while to render the assurance of equal efficacy with a recovery, the consent of the protector, if any, must be obtained. Another difference between the old tenant to the præcipe and the new protector of the settlement is, that the former was a conveying, the latter a mere consenting party, unless his estate is intended to be passed, when, of course, he must be also a conveying party.

Where an estate-tail shall have been converted into a base fee, in such case, so long as there shall be a protector of the settlement by which the estate-tail was created, his consent shall be requisite to enable the person who would have been tenant of the estate-tail if the same had not been barred, to exercise as to the lands in respect of which there shall be such protection, the power of disposition hereinbefore contained (s. 35).

The discretion of the protector in giving his consent is declared absolute in every case; his office is not fiduciary, nor is his conduct impeachable, or examinable in equity; the rule in relation to transactions between the donee of a power, and any object of the power in whose favor the same may be exercised, not being applicable to protectors; he may, therefore, make what bargain he pleases with the tenant-in-tail, but an agreement with the remainder-man or reversioner, or any other person to withhold his consent, would be void (ss. 36, 37).

If a voidable estate be created by a tenant-in-tail in favor of a purchaser for valuable consideration, and the tenant-in-tail afterwards make a disposition of the lands, under this Act, by any assurance other than a lease not requiring enrolment, such disposition, whatever its object or extent, shall (if made with the consent of the protector, if any) confirm such voidable estate against all persons except a purchaser, without notice of such voidable estate, and the persons claiming under him. But should the protector, if any, not consent, and the voidable estate cannot be confirmed to the full extent without such consent, then the same shall be confirmed, so far as the tenant-in-tail could confirm such estate, under this Act, without such consent (s. 38). Whenever a person entitled to a base-fee shall become entitled to the immediate reversion or remainder, the base-fee shall not merge, but shall be ipso facto enlarged into as great an estate as the tenant-in-tail, with protector's consent, if any, might have created if the remainder or reversion had been vested in another person (s. 39).

This last section gets rid of a prejudice to title, for when the base-fee merged in the remainder or reversion, the charges and estates made and created by the persons through whom the remainder or reversion was derived, were let in, and this rendered it necessary to make out the tenant-in-tail's title to the reversion or remainder, which was frequently attended with great difficulty and expense, all which is now obviated by preserving base-fees from merger and enlarging them.

Let us mark the main differences between the old and the new systems, as to their effect upon the tenant-in-tail. The power of a tenant-in-tail is precisely the same under the new law, with the protector's consent, as it was under the old law, with the concurrence of the tenant to the præcipe: viz. the acquirement of a new fee-simple, discharged from the estate-tail, and all posterior limitations.

The fine with proclamations of a tenant-in-tail in possession, remainder, or reversion, to another in fee, barred the issue-in-tail absolutely, and acquired a fee-simple, defeasible only by the remainder-man or the reversioner, who had a mere right of action (that was only descendible), which, being released to the tenant-in-tail, he acquired the absolute fee-simple, the right being extinguished; if, however, the tenant-in-tail was in remainder, the fine then acquired a base fee, determinable on the failure of the issue-in-tail, but the remainder or reversion subsisted as an estate expectant on the determination of the base-fee; but if the remainder or reversion became vested in the tenant-in-tail, the base-fee merged in it, and produced an absolute fee-simple; and this was the result when the tenant-in-tail, whether in possession or not, had the remainder or reversion in fee vested in himself. But, under the new law, where a tenant-in-tail, whether in possession or not, with remainder or reversion in fee over, makes an assurance, without the protector's consent, if any, it bars the issue-in-tail, and acquires a base fee determinable on failure of such issue, but, instead of divesting the remainder or reversion, and turning it to a right of action, it subsists as an estate expectant on the determination of the base-fee, and both alienable and devisable. And if the remainder or reversion become vested in the tenant-in-tail, the base-fee does not merge in it, as under the old law, but it is enlarged into an absolute fee-simple, and this will be the result where the remainder or reversion in fee is vested in the tenant-in-tail, whether in possession or not. See TAIL.

Protest, a solemn declaration of opinion, generally of dissent. Also, a notification written by a notary upon a foreign bill of exchange of non-acceptance or non-payment, notice of which must be sent the same day to the drawer and indorsers, with a copy of the bill, if they are abroad, but merely a notice is sufficient, if they are in England. All protests made in England must be on a stamp, otherwise they cannot be given in evidence.—55 Geo. III. c. 184; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 98.

In the case of foreign bills of exchange, when the drawee cannot be found, or refuses to accept, it is usual for some friend of the drawer or endorser, after the bill has been protested for non-acceptance, to accept the bill for the honor of his friends, parties to the bill; but he should be cautious and make every inquiry, since, in case of forgery or other vital defect in the bill, he cannot come upon any of the parties to it.—10 B. and C. 4. No such rule is applicable to promissory notes.

The following is the form of protest for non-payment: —

'On this day, the first of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, at the request of A. B., bearer of the original bill of exchange, whereof a true copy is on the other side written, I., Y. Z., of London, notary public, by royal authority duly admitted and sworn, did exhibit the said bill.'

[Here the presentment is stated, and to whom made, and the reason, if assigned, for non-payment.]

'Wherefore I, the said notary, at the request aforesaid, have protested, and by these presents do solemnly protest as well against the drawer, acceptor, and indorsers of the said bill of exchange, as against all others whom it may concern, for exchange, re-exchange, and all costs, charges, damages, and interest suffered and to be suffered, for want of payment of the said original bill. Thus done and protested in London aforesaid, in the presence of E. F.'

[The expenses of noting and protest are then subscribed.]

Provincial constitutions, the decrees of provincial synods held under divers archbishops of Canterbury, from Stephen Langton, in the reign of Henry III., to Henry Chichele, in the reign of Henry V., and adopted also by the province of York in the reign of Henry VI.—Lynd. Provinciale.

Provincial courts, the several archiepiscopal courts in the two ecclesiastical provinces of England.

Provinciale, a work on ecclesiastical law, by William Lyndwode, official principal to Archbishop Chicheley in the reign of Edward IV. The learned canonist has here digested, under heads, the substance of almost every constitution made in synods of the province of Canterbury, from the time of Stephen Langton down to Archbishop Chicheley. The method he has taken is that of the decretals of Pope Gregory IX., so justly esteemed the most systematic and valuable part of the canon law. To this digest he has added a very copious and minute comment, replete with every illustration that could be furnished from an intimate acquaintance with the writings of foreign canonists, and a long experience in our own ecclesiastical courts. The comprehensiveness of this, as well as the merit of its execution, has contributed to place Lyndwode much above his predecessor, John de Athona, who had led the way in this walk of study, by his gloss on the legatine constitutions of Otto and Ottoboni; with this distinction in favour of Lyndwode, these two writers have obtained great authority with posterity; they are regarded, both in the spiritual and temporal courts, as containing undeniable evidence of the practice and law of their respective periods; and as they were instrumental in fixing both in after-times, their works are considered as the depositories of the common law of the church and of the ecclesiastical courts.—4 Reeves, c. xxv., p. 117.

Proving a will in Chancery. Where lands are devised by will away from the heir, the devisee, in order to perpetuate the testimony of the witnesses to such will, exhibits a bill in Chancery against the heir, and sets forth the will verbatim therein, suggesting that the heir is induced to dispute its validity; and then, the defendant having answered, they proceed to issue as in other cases, and examine the witnesses to the will; after which the cause is at an end, without proceeding to any decree, no relief being prayed by the bill; but the heir is entitled to his costs, even though he contests the will.—3 Bl. Com. 450.

Provisional assignees, those who were formerly appointed under fiats in bankruptcy in the country to take charge of bankrupts' estates, &c., until the creditors' assignees were appointed. They are now superseded by the official assignees.

Provisional committee, a committee appointed for a temporary occasion.

Provisiones, those Acts of Parliament which were passed to curb the arbitrary power of the Crown.

Proviso, stipulation, caution, a condition inserted in any deed, on the performance whereof the validity of the deed depends.

The terms proviso and condition are synonymous, and signify some quality annexed to a real estate by virtue of which it may be defeated, enlarged, or created upon an uncertain event. Such qualities annexed to personal contracts and agreements are generally called conditions. A proviso or condition differs from a covenant in this, that the former is in the words of, and binding upon, both parties, whereas the latter is in the words of the grantor only. It is a rule in provisoes, that where a proviso is that the lessee shall perform or not perform a thing, and no penalty is annexed to it, that is a condition, otherwise it would be void; but if a penalty be annexed, it is a covenant.—Wood's Land. and Ten. 103, 268.

Proviso est providere præsentia et futura non præterita.—2 Co. 72.—(A proviso is to provide for the present or future, not the past.)

Proviso, Trial by. In all cases where the plaintiff, after issue joined, does not proceed to trial, where, by the course and practice of the court, he ought to have done so, the defendant may, if he wish, have the action tried by proviso; that is, he may give the plaintiff notice of trial, make up the Nisi Prius record, carry it down and enter it and proceed to the trial as in ordinary cases as if he were proceeding as plaintiff. This, however, can be done only in cases where the plaintiff has been guilty of some laches or default after issue joined, except in replevin, prohibition, quare impedit, and error in fact: in which cases both parties being plaintiffs, the defendant may make up the Nisi Prius record, and thereupon proceed to trial, although no laches or default be imputable to the plaintiff. The court have also allowed a defendant to carry down the record of an issue directed by the Court of Chancery to trial by proviso, upon its being suggested to them that the plaintiff wished to delay the cause. By rule 42 H. T. 1853, 'no trial by proviso shall be allowed in the same term in which the default of the plaintiff has been made, and no rule for a trial by proviso shall be necessary.' By C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 116, nothing herein contained shall affect the right of a defendant to take down a cause for trial after default by the plaintiff to proceed to trial, according to the course and practice of the court; and if records are entered for trial both by the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant's record shall be treated as standing next in order after the plaintiff's record in the list of causes, and the trial of the cause shall take place accordingly. A defendant seldom tries by proviso, as the better course is to take proceedings under C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 101.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1479.

Provisor, a purveyor; one who sued to the court of Rome for a provision.

Provisors, Statutes against, 25 Edw. III. st. 6; 27 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 3; 38 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 4, and st. 2, cc. 1, 2, 3, 4.—2 Reeves, p. 386.

Provost, the principal magistrate of a royal borough in Scotland; a governing officer of an university or college.

Provost-Marshal, an officer of the royal navy, who had the charge of prisoners taken at sea, and sometimes also on land.—13 Car. II. c. 9.

Proxies, annual payments made by the parochial clergy to the bishop, &c., on visitation.

Proxineta, a kind of broker or agent.

All contracts and agreements respecting marriage (commonly called marriage-brokage-contracts), by which a party engages to give another a compensation, if he will negotiate an advantageous marriage for him, are void, as being injurious to or subversive of the public interest. 'But the civil law does not seem to have held contracts of this sort in such severe rebuke; for it allowed proxinetæ, or match-makers, to receive a reward for their services to a limited extent. And the period is comparatively modern in which a different doctrine was engrafted into the common law, and received the high sanction of the House of Lords. All marriage-brokage-contracts are utterly void as against public policy, so much so, that they are deemed incapable of confirmation, and even money paid under them may be recovered back in a court of equity.—1 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 214.

Proxy, a person appointed in the stead of another to represent him. A peer can vote by proxy, but not a member of the House of Commons, who, however, can 'pair-off' with another member. See PAIRING OFF.

The stamp-duty on a proxy to vote at a meeting of a joint-stock company is reduced to 6*d.* by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81.

Prudenter agit qui præcepto legis obtemperat. 5 Co. 49.—(He acts prudently, who obeys the command of the law.)

Pryk, a kind of service of tenure. Blount says it signifies an old-fashioned spur with one point only, which the tenant, holding land by this tenure, was to find for the king.

Pseudograph, false writing.

Pubertas. See AGE.

Puberty [fr. pubertas, Lat.], the age of 14 in men, and 12 in women; when they are held fit for and capable of contracting marriage. See AGE.

Publicans, persons authorized by license to retail beer, spirits, or wines. Under the term publicans, are comprised innkeepers, hotel-keepers, alehouse-keepers, keepers of wine vaults, &c. An inn differs from an alehouse in this—that the former is a place intended for the lodging, as well as the entertainment of guests, whereas the latter is intended for their entertainment only. If, however, ale or beer be commonly sold in an inn, as is almost invariably the case, it also is an alehouse, and if travellers be furnished with beds, lodged, and entertained in an alehouse, it also is an inn. It is not material to the character of an innkeeper that he should have any sign over his door; it is sufficient that he makes it his business to entertain passengers and travellers, providing them with lodgings and other accommodations.

No house or place of public resort is allowed to be opened for the sale of fermented or distilled liquors, unless it be to supply refreshment to a lodger in such house, or a bonâ fide traveller, before half-past twelve in the afternoon, or the termination of morning Divine service, or between the hours of three and five in the afternoon, or after eleven in the afternoon, on Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or any Fast or Thanksgiving day, or before four in the morning of the day following. See 11 & 12 Vict. 49; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118.

As to the duties and the responsibility of innkeepers, see INNKEEPERS.

Licensing of Publicans.—The provisions with respect to the licensing of public houses are embodied in the 9 Geo. IV. c. 61. See also 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 64; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 85; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. As to licenses for refreshment houses, see 23 Vict. c. 27.

Publication, divulgation; proclamation. Publication of evidence in Chancery is no longer practised, as all parties attend the examination of witnesses.

Publication of a will is no longer necessary by 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 13.

Public Accounts, the accounts of the expenditure of the nation. They are audited by commissioners, appointed under 2 Wm. IV. c. 26. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 99; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c 104; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 15; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 96.

Public Act of Parliament. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

Public Appointments, Sale of, the sale or transfer of these is generally contrary to the policy of the law, and prohibited in most cases by the express enactment of the legislature (5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16; 49 Geo. III. c. 126; 6 Geo. IV. cc. 82 & 83). See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 42, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 88, making void (except when under the augmentation and church building Acts), any sale or assignment by any spiritual person of any parsonage belonging to him in virtue of his office.

Publicatio, confiscation.—Civ. Law.

Public Baths, see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 61; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 30.

Public Carriages and Conveyances. See STAGE CARRIAGES, RAILWAYS, and CONVEYANCES BY WATER.

Public Chapels are chapels founded at some period later than the church itself; they were designed for the accommodation of such of the parishioners as in course of time had begun to fix their residence at a distance from its site; and chapels so circumstanced were described as chapels of ease, because built in aid of the original church.—3 Step. Com. 111.

Public Companies, large associations for every conceivable kind of speculation, which are controlled by innumerable Acts of Parliament. Consult Wordsworth, Hodge, or Grant, on the subject.

Public Funds. See FUNDS.

Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, which is amended and continued by 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 69, 95; 18 & 19 Vict. c 115; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 85; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 38; 21 & 22 Vict. cc. 97 & 98; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 64. The 22 & 23 Vict. c. 3, amends and makes perpetual the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 97.

Public Houses, places of public resort, mostly for purposes of drinking.

The statutes relating to them are of two kinds; the first having in view the subject of revenue, for which see 6 Geo. IV. c. 81; the other of police, that is, the proper regulation of these places, and the prevention of abuses to which they are naturally liable; the principal one now in force is the 9 Geo. IV. c. 61. And see the Beer Acts, 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 64; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 85; and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. And see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 79; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 25 (Scotland). See INNKEEPERS and PUBLICANS.

Public Nuisance. See NUISANCE.

Public Officer, a person appointed by joint-stock bank companies, &c., to sue and be sued on behalf of the company. As to their frauds, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 81 to 84.

Public Offices Extension, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 74.

Public Prosecutor, the Queen, in whose name criminals are prosecuted, because all offences are said to be against the Queen's peace, her Crown and dignity.

Public Statues. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 33, which placed public statues in the metropolitan police district under the control of the Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings.

Public Stores. See STORES.

Public Verdict. See PRIVY VERDICT.

Public Ways, the highways.

Publicist, a writer on the laws of nations.

Puddling, a process of considerable importance in canal engineering. A mixture is made of well-tempered clay and sand, reduced to a semi-fluid state, and rendered impervious to water by manual labor, as by working and chopping it about with spades. It is usually applied in three or more strata, to a depth or thickness of about three feet; and care is taken at each operation so to work the new layer of puddling stuff as to unite it with the stratum immediately beneath. Over the top course a layer of common soil is usually laid. It is only by the careful employment of puddling that the filtration of the water of canals into the neighboring lower lands through which they pass, can be effectually prevented.—1 Smiles' Lives of the Engineers 353, n. 2.

Pudzeld, to be free from the payment of money for taking wood in a forest.—Co. Litt. 233 a. See WOODGILD.

Pueri sunt de sanguine parentum, sed pater et mater non sunt de sanguine puerorum.—3 Co. 40.—(Children are of the blood of their parents, but the father and mother are not of the blood of the children.)

Pueritia, the age from seven to fourteen.

Puffer, one who attends a sale by auction for the purpose of raising the price and exciting the eagerness of the bidders.

A bidder may be privately appointed by the owner, in order to prevent the estate or property from being sold at an undervalue; but where a person is employed, not for a defensive precaution with a view to prevent a sale at an undervalue, but to screw up the price, this will be deemed a fraud. A vendor can only appoint one bidder. If the particulars or advertisements state that the property is to be sold without reserve, the sale would be void against a purchaser, if any person were employed as a puffer, and actually bid at the sale.—St. Leon. V. and P. 8.

Puis darrein continuance (since the last continuance) Plea. If any matter of defence arise after the defendant has pleaded, and before the jury have actually delivered their verdict, the defendant may, within eight days after such matter of defence arose, unless a further time be allowed by the court or a judge, avail himself of it by a plea, styled a plea puis darrein continuance before the abolition of the entry of continuances, but now more properly denominated a plea to the further maintenance of the action. It cannot be pleaded after a demurrer or verdict. The plea must be accompanied with an affidavit of its truth, and also of the matters thereof having arisen within eight days next before the pleading of such plea, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order. It may be pleaded during the long vacation. If this plea be put in at the assizes, or at Nisi Prius, the judge has no discretion to refuse it, and no further proceedings can be had on it there; but it must be certified on the back of the record at Nisi Prius, and returned to the court above; after the record is thus returned, the plaintiff may reply or demur to the plea, and then proceed as in ordinary cases. If the plaintiff demur, the court may order it to be set down for argument for the first paper-day in term, so that the plaintiff can have judgment as soon as he would have had it if the plea had not been pleaded. The defendant can only plead one of these pleas.

A plea of this kind is always pleaded by way of substitution for the former plea, which is waived. The plaintiff may always, after this plea, discontinue, without payment of costs.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 907.

A plea containing a defence arising after the commencement of the action may be pleaded together with pleas of defences arising before the commencement of the action, provided that the plaintiff may confess such plea, and thereupon shall be entitled to the costs of the cause up to the time of the pleading of such first mentioned plea.—R. 22, H. T. 1853.

When a plea is pleaded with an allegation that the matter of defence arose after the last pleading, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to confess such plea, and shall be entitled to the costs of the cause up to the time of pleading such plea; provided that this and the preceding rule shall not apply to the case of such plea pleaded by one or more only of several defendants.—R. 23, Ib.

Puisine [fr. puisné, Fr.], junior, inferior, lower in rank.

The several judges and barons of the common law courts at Westminster are called puisné.

Pulchre placitare, a fair hearing. See BEAU-PLEADER.

Pulsator [fr. pulso, Lat., to accuse], the plaintiff or actor.

Punchayet, an arbitration.—Indian.

Pund-brech, pound-breach.

Pundit, an interpreter of the Hindoo law, a learned Brahmin.—Indian.

Punishment, the penalty for transgressing the law.

Pupil, a ward; one under the care of a guardian.

Pupilarity, non-age.

Pur autre vie, Tenant, the least estate of freehold which the law acknowledges, for an estate for the life of another is not so great as an estate for one's own life. See 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 6; and SPECIAL OCCUPANCY.

Purchase [fr. perquisitio, or conquæstus, Lat., according to the feudists], in its popular sense, an acquisition of land, obtained by way of bargain and sale, for money or some other valuable consideration; in its legal acceptation, an acquisition of land in any lawful manner, other than by descent, or the mere act of law, and including escheat, occupancy, prescription, forfeiture, and alienation.

Purchase, Words of, those by which, taken absolutely, without reference to or connection with any other words, an estate first attaches, or is considered as commencing in point of title, in the person described by them; such as the words 'son,' 'daughter.'

Purchaser, a buyer, a vendee; also the root of descent, from whom, as the terminus à quo, it is in every case to be traced.

To the intent, then, that the pedigree may never be carried farther back than the circumstances of the case and the nature of the title shall require, the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, enacts that the person last entitled to the land (which expression shall extend to the last person who had a right thereto, whether he did or did not obtain the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits thereof (s. 1)) shall, for the purposes of this Act, be considered to have been the purchaser thereof, unless it shall be proved that he inherited the same, in which case the person from whom he inherited the same shall be considered to have been the purchaser, unless it shall be proved that he inherited the same; and, in like manner, the last person from whom the land shall be proved to have been inherited shall in every case be considered to have been the purchaser, unless it shall be proved that he inherited the same (s. 2).

Where on the bonâ fide purchase, after the passing of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 [13th Aug. 1859], of a leasehold interest under a lease containing a covenant on the part of the lessee to insure against loss or damage by fire, the purchaser is furnished with the written receipt of the person entitled to receive the rent, or his agent, for the last payment of the rent accrued due before the completion of the purchase, and there is subsisting at the time of the completion of the purchase an insurance in conformity with the covenant, the purchaser or any person claiming under him shall not be subject to any liability, by way of forfeiture, or damages or otherwise, in respect of any breach of the covenant committed at any time before the completion of the purchase, of which the purchaser had not notice before the completion of the purchase; but this provision is not to take away any remedy which the lessor or his legal representatives may have against the lessee or his legal representatives for breach of covenant (s. 8).

The bonâ fide payment to and the receipt of any person to whom any purchase or mortgage-money shall be payable upon any express or implied trust shall effectually discharge the person paying the same from seeing to the application or being answerable for the misapplication thereof, unless the contrary shall be expressly declared by the instrument creating the trust or security (s. 23).

Purchaser of a note or bill, the person who buys a promissory note or bill of exchange from the holder without his endorsement. In such case, if the note or bill should turn out to be bad, the purchaser has no claim against the vendor, unless the latter knew at the time of the sale that it was of no value. See Bayley on Bills, 370.

Pure villenage, a base tenure, where a man holds, upon terms of doing whatsoever is commanded of him, nor knows in the evening what is to be done in the morning, and is always bound to an uncertain service.

Purgation, the clearing a person's self of a crime of which he was publicly suspected and accused before a judge. It was either canonical, which was prescribed by the canon law, the form whereof, used in the spiritual court, was that the person suspected took his oath that he was clear of the facts objected against him, and brought his honest neighbors with him to make oath that they believed he swore truly; or vulgar, which was by fire or water-ordeal, or by combat. It is entirely abolished.

Purificatio Beatæ Mariæ Virginis, the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which falls on the second day of February in every year.

Puritans. See DISSENTERS.

Purlieu [fr. pourallée, Fr.], land formerly added to an ancient forest by unlawful encroachment, and disafforested by the Charta de Forestâ. 4 Inst. 303.

Purlieu-men, those who have ground within the purlieu, and being able to dispend 40s. a-year freehold, are licensed to hunt in their own purlieus.—Manw. For. Laws, 151.

Purloining, theft.

Purparty, share, part in a division.

Purprestura, vel porprestura, dicitur, quando aliquid super dominum regem injustè occupatur, ut in dominicis regiis, vel in viis publicis obstructis, vel in aquis publicis transversis à recto cursu, vel quando aliquis in civitate super regiam plateam aliquid ædificando occupaverit. Et generaliter, quotiens aliquid sit ad nocumentum regii tenementi, vel regiæ viæ, vel civitatis, placitum inde ad coronam domini regis pertinet.—Glanv. l. 9, c. xi.—(A purpresture is so called, when anything is occupied against the sovereign unjustly: as in the royal domains, or when anything is placed as an obstruction on the high roads, or in the public rivers, against the right course, or when any person in a town has erected a building on the royal highway. And generally, as often as there is anything to the injury of the royal domain, or royal road or state, the plea thence belongs to the Crown.)

Purpresture. See POURPRESTURE.

Purprise [fr. purprisum, law Lat.], a close or enclosure; as also the whole compass of a manor.

Purpure, or Porprin, the color commonly called purple, expressed in engravings by lines in bend sinister. In the arms of princes it was formerly called Mercury, and in those of peers Amethyst.—Heraldic term.

Pursuance, prosecution; process.

Pursue, to prosecute.

Pursuivant. See POURSUIVANT.

Purus idiota (a congenital idiot).

Purveyance. See POURVEYANCE.

Purview, proviso, providing clause; also, that part of a statute which begins with, 'Be it enacted,' &c. The word is frequently used to express the general scope and object of a statute.

Putage, Putagium, prostitution of a woman.

Putagium hæreditatem non adimit.—1 Reeves' Hist. c. iii., p. 117.—(Incontinence does not take away an inheritance.)

Putative, supposed, reputed.

Putts and refusals, time-bargains, or contracts for the sale of supposed stock on a future day. They were forbidden by the 7 Geo. II. c. 3, s. 1 (the Stock Jobbing Act), repealed by 23 Vict. c. 28.

Puture, a custom claimed by keepers in forests, and sometimes by bailiffs of hundreds, to take man's meat, horse's meat, and dog's meat, of the tenants and inhabitants within the perambulation of the forest, hundred, &c. The land subject to this custom is called terra putura.

Others who call it pulture, explain it as a demand in general; and derive it from the monks, who, before they were admitted, pulsabant, that is, knocked at the gates for several days together.

Pyke, Paik, a foot-passenger; a person employed as a night-watch in a village, and as a runner or messenger on the business of the revenue.—Indian.

Q.

Quadragesima, the time of Lent, because consisting of forty days.

Quadragesimals, offerings formerly made, on mid-lent Sunday, to the mother-church.

Quadragesms, the third part of the year-books of Edward VII.—3 Reeves, c. xvi., p. 148.

Quadrans, the fourth of a whole.—Civ. Law.

Quadrant, an angular measure of 90 degrees.

Quadrantata terræ, a quarter of an acre, now called a rood.

Quadriennium utile, the term of four years allowed to a minor after his majority, in which he might by suit or action endeavour to annul any deed to his prejudice granted during his minority.—Scotch phrase.

Quadripartite, having four parties; divided into four parts.

Quadruplatores, informers among the Romans, who, if their information were followed by conviction, had the fourth part of the confiscated goods for their trouble.

Quadruplicatio [Lat.], a surrebutter.—Civ. Law.

Quæ ad unum finem loquuta sunt, non debent ad alium detorqueri.—4 Co. 14.—(Those words which are spoken to one end, ought not to be perverted to another.)

Quæ cohærent personæ à personâ separari nequeunt.—Jenk. Cent. 28.—(Things which belong to the person ought not to be separated from the person.)

Quæ communi legi derogant strictè interpretantur.—Jenk Cent. 221.—(Things derogating from the common law are to be strictly interpreted.)

Quæ contra rationem juris introducta sunt, non debent trahi in consequentiam.—12 Co. 75. (Things introduced contrary to the reason of law, ought not to be drawn into a precedent.)

Quæcunque intra rationem legis inveniuntur, intra legem ipsam esse judicantur.—2 Inst. 689. (What things soever appear within the reason of a law, are to be considered within the law itself.)

Quæ dubitationis causâ tollendæ inseruntur communem legem non lædunt.—Co. Litt. 205.—(Things which are inserted for the purpose of removing doubt, hurt not the common law.)

Quæ est eadem (which is the same). In trespass and other actions, when the plea necessarily stated the trespass to have been committed at some other time or place than that laid in the declaration, it was usual, before the conclusion of the plea, to allege that the supposed trespasses mentioned in the plea were the same as those whereof the plaintiff had complained. This allegation was usually termed quæ est eadem. It was equivalent to a traverse of the time and place named in the declaration.—1 Chit. Pleading, 581.

Quæ incontinenti vel certò fiunt in esse videntur.—Co. Litt. 236.—(Things which are done directly and certainly, appear already in existence.)

Quæ in curiâ regis acta sunt ritè agi præsumuntur.—3 Buls. 43.—(Things done in the king's court are presumed to be rightly done.)

Quæ in partes dividi nequeunt solida, à singulis præstantur.—6 Co. 1.—(Solids, which cannot be divided into parts, are exhibited by singulars.)

Quæ inter alios acta sunt nemini nocere debent, sed prodesse possunt.—Ibid.—(Transactions between strangers ought to hurt no man, but may benefit.)

Quæ legi communi derogant strictè interpretantur.—Jenk. Cent. 29.—(Those things which are derogatory to the common law, are to be strictly interpreted.)

Quæ legi communi derogant non sunt trahenda in exemplum.—(Things derogatory to the common law are not to be drawn into a precedent.)

Quæ mala sunt inchoata in principio vix bono peragantur exitu.—4 Co. 2.—(Things bad in the commencement seldom achieve a good end.)

Quæ movent ad mortem sunt deodanda.—3 Inst. 57.—(Things which move to death are deodands.) Deodands are abolished by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93.

Quæ non valeant singula, juncta juvant.—3 Buls. 132.—(Things which do not avail separate, when joined avail.)

Quæ pertinet ad coronam et dignitatem regis et ad regnum in causis et placitis rerum temporalium, in foro seculari.—Co. Litt. 96.—(Which relates to the Crown and dignity of the king and to the realm, in causes and pleas of a temporal nature in the secular forum.)

Quæ plura, a writ which lay where an inquisition had been taken by an escheator of lands, &c., of which a man died seised, and all the land was supposed not to be found by the office or inquisition; it was to inquire of what more lands or tenements the party died seised.—Reg. Orig. 293. Rendered useless by 12 Car. II. c. xxiv.

Quæ præter consuetudinem et morem majorum fiunt, neque placent, neque recta videntur.—4 Co. 78.—(Things which are done contrary to the custom and usage of our ancestors neither please nor appear right.)

Quæ rerum naturâ prohibentur, nullâ lege confirmata sunt.—Finch. 74.—(Things which are prohibited by the nature of things are confirmed by no law.)

Quæ sunt minoris culpæ sunt majoris infamiæ. Co. Litt. 6.—(Things which are of the smaller guilt are of the greater infamy.)

Quælibet concessio domini regis capi debet strictè contra dominum regem, quando potest intelligi duabus viis.—3 Leon. 243.—(Every grant of the lord king ought to be taken strictly against the lord king, when it can be understood in two ways.)

Quælibet concessio fortissimè contra donatorem interpretanda est.—Co. Litt. 183.—(Every grant is to be most strongly taken against the grantor.)

Quælibet hæreditas naturaliter quidem ad hæredes hæreditabiliter descendit, nunquam quidem naturaliter ascendit: descendit itaque jus quasi ponderosum, quod cadens deorsum rectâ lineâ vel transversali, et nunquam reascendit eâ viâ quâ descendit post mortem antecessorum; à latere tamen ascendit alicui propter defectum hæredum inferius provenientium.—Co. Litt. 11. (Every inheritance naturally descends to the heirs in the manner of an inheritance; it never naturally ascends. The right therefore descends, as being heavy, and falling downward in a right or transverse line, and it never ascends in the way it descends, after the death of ancestors, yet laterally, it may ascend to a certain one in defect of heirs coming beneath.) But see CANONS OF INHERITANCE.

Quælibet jurisdictio cancellos suos habet.—Jenk. Cent. 137.—(Every jurisdiction has its own bounds.)

Quælibet narratio super brevi locari debet in comitatu in quo breve emanavit.—(Every count upon the writ ought to be laid in the county in which the writ arose.)

Quælibet pardonatio debet capi secundum intentionem regis, et non ad deceptionem regis.—3 Buls. 14.—(Every pardon ought to be taken according to the intention of the king, and not to the deception of the king.)

Quælibet pœna corporalis, quamvis minima, major est quâlibet pœnâ pecuniariâ.—3 Inst. 220.—(Every corporal punishment, although the very least, is greater than any pecuniary punishment.)

Quæras de dubiis, legem bene discêre si vis.—(Inquire into doubtful points, if you wish to understand the law well.)

Quære de dubiis, quia per rationes pervenitur ad legitimam rationem.—Litt. s. 377.—(Inquire into doubtful points, because by reasoning we arrive at right reason.)

Quærens non invenit plegium (the plaintiff has not found pledge), a return made by a sheriff upon certain writs directed to him with this clause: Si A. fecerit B. securum de clamore suo prosequendo, &c.—F. N. B. 38.

Quærere dat sapere quæ sunt legitima verè.—Litt. s. 443.—(To inquire into is the way to know what things are truly lawful.)

Quæritur ut crescunt tot magna volumina legis. In promptu causa est, crescit in orbe dolus.—3 Co. 82.—(It is questioned how so many books of law increase. The reason is plain; crime increases in the world.)

Quæsta, an indulgence or remission of penance, sold by the pope.

Quæstio, a commission to inquire into a criminal matter.—Civ. Law.

Quæstionarii, those who carried quæsta about from door to door.

Quæstor, or Questor, a Roman magistrate.

Quæstus, that estate which a man has by acquisition or purchase, in contradistinction to hæreditas, which is what he has by descent.

Quaker, the name of a member of a religious society, more correctly denominated Friend. The nature of their creed was for a long time misrepresented and unknown; but since they have laid it fully before the public, they have enjoyed from the various parties of the Christian church a high degree of consideration and respect. They were once called seekers, and the term quakers arose out of the frequent exhortations to 'tremble at the name of the Lord,' given by this sect to their followers. Indeed, a story is related, that Fox having given this command to a justice of peace, was by him derided and called a quaker. It seems likely, however, since the term was in very general use, that it took its origin from the earnest and trembling voice and action of all the preachers of the sect. But there is another conjecture on the subject, which has obtained the support of Malone. This would refer quaker to quacker, and rests on the following lines written by Sir G. Wharton, in 1660:—

'Let's tear our ribbons, burn our richer laces,
Wear russet, and contrive bewitched faces;
With thee and thou let us go quack awhile.'

As to their solemn affirmations, see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 49; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 5, 15, 77; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85; and 22 Vict. c. 10. As to their marriages, see 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 85; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 58; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119; and 23 Vict. c. 18.

Quale jus, a judicial writ, which lay where a man of religion had judgment to recover land, before execution was made of the judgment; it went forth to the escheator between judgment and execution, to inquire what right the religious person had to recover, or whether the judgment were obtained by the collusion of the parties, to the intent that the lord might not be defrauded.—Reg. Jud. 8.

Qualification, that which makes any person fit to do a certain act; also, abatement, diminution.

An annual Act is passed indemnifying persons who have omitted to qualify themselves for certain offices and employments, and to extend the time limited for those purposes. See 26 & 27 Vict. c. 107.

Qualification Act to kill game, 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 25, abolished by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32. See GAME.

Qualified, a term applied to a person enabled to hold two benefices.

Qualified fee. See BASE FEE.

Qualified indorsement, an indorsement sans recours, i. e. without recourse to the indorser for payment.

Qualified oath, a circumstantial oath.

Qualified property, an ownership of a special and limited kind. It may arise either from the peculiar circumstances of the subject matter, which render it incapable of being under the absolute dominion of any proprietor, as in the case of animals feræ naturæ, or from the peculiar circumstances of the owner, the thing itself being capable of absolute ownership, as in the case of a bailment.

Qualitas quæ inesse debet, facilè præsumitur. Jur. Civ.—(A quality which ought to form a part is easily presumed.)

Quality of estate, the period when, and the manner in which, the right of enjoying an estate is exercised. It is of two kinds: (1) The period when the right of enjoying an estate is conferred upon the owner, whether at present or in future; and (2) the manner in which the owner's right of enjoyment of his estate is to be exercised, whether solely, jointly, in common, or in coparcenary.

Quamdiu se bene gesserit (as long as he shall behave himself well), a clause frequent in letters-patent or grants of certain offices, to secure them so long as the persons to whom they are granted shall not be guilty of abusing them.

Quam longum debet esse rationabile tempus, non definitur in lege, sed pendet ex discretione justiciariorum.—Co. Litt. 56.—(How long reasonable time ought to be, is not defined by law, but depends upon the discretion of the judges.)

Quam rationabilis debet esse finis, non definitur, sed omnibus circumstantiis inspectis pendet ex justiciariorum discretione.—11 Co. 44.—(What a reasonable termination ought to be is not defined, but it is left to the discretion of the judges, all the circumstances being considered.)

Quamvis aliquid per se non sit malum, tamen si sit mali exempli, non est faciendum.—2 Inst. 564.—(Although a thing in itself may not be bad, yet, if it hold out a bad example, it is not to be done.)

Quamvis lex generaliter loquitur, restringenda tamen est, ut cessante ratione et ipsa cessat; cum enim ratio sit anima vigorque ipsius legis, non videtur legislator id sensisse quod ratione careat, etiamsi verborum generalitas primâ facie aliter suadeat.—4 Inst. 330.—(Although the law speaks generally, it is to be restrained so that it may not apply when the reason on which it is grounded fails; for as the reason of a law is its very soul and gist, it cannot be meant by the legislature to be contrary to that reason, although at first sight the generality of its wording would induce us to think so.)

Quando accederint (when they may happen). See PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT.

Quando aliquid mandatur, mandatur et omne per quod pervenitur ad illud.—5 Rep. 116.—(When anything is commanded, everything by which it can be accomplished is also commanded.)

Quando aliquid prohibetur ex directo, prohibetur et per obliquum.—Co. Litt. 223.—(When anything is prohibited directly it is prohibited also indirectly.)

Quando aliquid prohibetur, prohibetur omne per quod devenitur ad illud.—2 Inst. 48.—(When anything is prohibited, everything which tends towards it is prohibited.)

Quando charta continet generalem clausulam, posteaque descendit ad verba specialia quæ clausulæ generali sunt consentanea, interpretanda est charta secundum verba specialia.—8 Co. 154.—(When a charter contains a general clause, and afterwards descends to special words, which are consentaneous to the general clause, the charter is to be interpreted according to the special words.)

Quando de unâ et eâdem re, duo onerabiles existunt, unus, pro insufficientiâ alterius, de integro onerabitur.—2 Inst. 277.—(When there are two persons liable for one and the same thing, one for the other's default will be charged for the whole.)

Quando dispositio referri potest ad duas res, ita quod secundum relationem unam vitiatur et secundum alteram utilis sit, tum facienda est relatio ad illam ut valeat dispositio.—6 Co. 76. (When a disposition may refer to two things, so that by the former it would be vitiated, and by the latter it would be preserved, then the relation is to be made to the latter so that the disposition may be valid.)

Quando diversi desiderantur actus ad aliquem statum perficiendum, plus respicit lex actum originalem.—10 Co. 49.—(When to the perfection of an estate divers acts are requisite, the law has more regard to the original act.)

Quando duo jura concurrunt in unâ personâ, æquum est ac si essent in diversis.—4 Co. 118.—(When two rights concur in one person, it is the same as if they were in separate persons.)

Quando jus domini regis et subditi concurrunt, jus regis præferri debet.—9 Co. 129.—(When the right of king and of subject concur, the king's right is to be preferred.)

Quando lex aliquid alicui concedit, concedere videtur id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest.—5 Co. 47.—(When the law gives a man anything, it gives him that without which it cannot exist.)

Quando lex aliquid alicui concedit, omnia incidentia tacitè conceduntur.— 2 Inst. 326.—(When the law gives anything to anyone, all incidents are tacitly given.)

Quando lex est specialis, ratio autem generalis, generaliter lex est intelligenda.—2 Inst. 83.—(When the law is special, but its reason general, the law is to be understood generally.)

Quando mulier nobilis nupserit ignobili, desinit esse nobilem nisi nobilitas nativa fuit.—4 Co. 118.—(When a noble woman marries a man not noble, she ceases to be noble, unless her nobility was born with her.)

Quando plus fit quam fieri debet, videtur etiam illud fieri quod faciendum est.—8 Co. 85. (When a man performs more than ought to be performed, he is considered to have also performed that which ought to have been performed.)

Quando verba statuti sunt specialia, ratio autem generalis, generaliter statutum est intelligendum.—10 Co. 101.—(When the words of a statute are special, but the reason general, the statute is to be understood generally.)

Quantity of estate, its time of continuance, or degree of interest as in fee, during life, or for years.

Quantum damnificatus, Issue. This is directed by Chancery to be tried at law to fix the amount of damage for compensation. But see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27.

Quantum meruit (so much as he has deserved) an action on the case, express or implied, grounded on a promise to pay the plaintiff for doing a thing as much as he deserved or merited. Abolished in effect by the rules H. T. 1 Wm. IV.

Quantum tenens domino ex homagio, tantum dominus tenenti ex dominio debet præter solam reverentiam; mutua debet esse dominii et homagii fidelitatis connexio.—Co. Litt. 64.—(As much as the tenant by his homage owes to his lord, so much is the lord, by his lordship, indebted to the tenant, except reverence alone; the tie of dominion and of homage ought to be mutual.)

Quantum valebat (so much as it was worth), where goods, &c. were delivered at no certain price, or for as much as they were worth in general, then quantum valebat lay, and the plaintiff was to aver them to be worth so much, as where the law obliged one to furnish another with goods or provisions, as an innkeeper to his guests, &c. Abolished by the rules H. T. 1 Wm. IV.

Quarantine, or Quarentaine, the widow's. It is provided by Magna Charta, that the widow shall not be distrained to marry afresh, if she choose to live without a husband, but shall not however marry against the consent of the lord; and further, that nothing shall be taken for assignment of the widow's dower, but that she shall remain in her husband's capital mansion-house for forty days after his death, during which time her dower shall be assigned. These forty days are called the widow's quarantine. Marriage during these forty days forfeits the quarantine. This right was enforced by writ of Quarantinâ habendâ.

It likewise signifies a quantity of land containing forty perches.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 16.

Also a regulation by which all communication with persons, ships, or goods, arriving from places infected with the plague, or other contagious disease, or supposed to be peculiarly liable to such infection, is interdicted for a certain definite period. The term is derived from the Italian quaranta, forty; it being generally supposed, that if no infectious disease break out within forty days or six weeks no danger need be apprehended from the free admission of the persons or things under quarantine. During this period, too, all the things which are supposed capable of retaining the infection are subjected to a process of purification.

The notion that the plague was imported from the East into Europe seems to have prevailed in all ages. But it would appear that the Venetians were the first who endeavoured to guard against its introduction from abroad, by obliging ships and persons coming from suspected places to perform quarantine. The regulations upon this subject were, it is most probable, issued for the first time in 1484.—Beckman, Hist. of Invent. vol. ii. art 'Quarantine.' They have since been gradually adopted in every other country. Their introduction into England was comparatively late. Various preventive regulations had been previously enacted, but quarantine was not systematically enforced till after the alarm occasioned by the dreadful plague at Marseilles in 1720. The regulations then adopted were made conformably to the suggestions of the celebrated Dr. Mead, in his famous 'Discourse concerning Pestilential Contagion.'

The existing quarantine regulations are embodied in the 6 Geo. IV. c. 78, and the different orders in council issued under its authority. These orders specify what vessels are liable to perform quarantine; the places at which it is to be performed; and the various formalities and regulations to be complied with. The publication in the Gazette of any order in council with respect to quarantine is deemed sufficient notice to all concerned, and no excuse of ignorance is admitted for any infringement of the regulations. To obviate, as far as possible, any foundation for such plea, it is ordered that vessels clearing out for any port or place with respect to which there shall be at the time any order in council subjecting vessels from it to quarantine, are to be furnished with an abstract of the quarantine regulations.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Quare clausum fregit (wherefore he broke the close), a plea in trespass which operates as a denial that defendant committed the alleged trespass in the place mentioned; but if it be intended to deny the plaintiff's possession, or right of possession, it must be traversed specially, as well as all matters in discharge, justification, or excuse.

Quare ejecit infra terminum (wherefore he ejected within the term), a writ which lay by the ancient law where the wrong-doer or ejector was not himself in possession of the lands, but another who claimed under him.

Quare impedit, a real possessory action, which can be brought only in the Court of Common Pleas, and lies to recover a presentation, when the patron's right is disturbed, or to try a disputed title to an advowson. If the right of nomination be in one person, and that of presentation in another, this action lies by the nominator for disturbing his right, either against the presentor before presentation, or against the incumbent after. If two patrons present to one and the same church by several titles, the church is become litigious, because the bishop knows not which has the true and rightful title; in that case, if the bishop admits the clerk of the one, he puts the other out of possession, and consequently to his action; and the bishop becomes a disturber if he, who is put out of possession, prove to have a better title. If opposition be intended, it is usual for each party to enter a caveat with the bishop, to prevent the institution of the other's clerk; but to this caveat the temporal courts pay no regard, viewing a caveat as a mere nullity. Mirehouse on Advows. 265.

A plaintiff must show an actual seisin to maintain this writ, and prove, when the title is disputed, a presentment by himself, his ancestor or some person under whom he claims, and the institution and induction of the presentee.

When the title is not involved, as under the general issue, ne disturba pas, the plaintiff either takes judgment, or proceeds for damages consequent upon the disturbance, the proofs being, the presentation, the bishop's refusal, and the presentation or institution of the other clerk.

If the delay of presentation arise from the bishop alone, as upon a pretence of incapacity, or the like, then he only is named in the writ; but if there be another presentation set up, then the pretended patron and his clerk are also joined in the action; or it may be brought against the patron and clerk leaving out the bishop; or against the patron only.

But it is most advisable to bring it against all three; for (1) if the bishop be left out, and the suit be not determined till the six months are past, the bishop is entitled to present by lapse, as he is not a party to the suit; but if he be named, and there has been a disturbance before the action, no lapse can possibly accrue till the right is determined. Should, however, the church be full, and there is not any danger of lapse, the bishop need not be joined. (2) If the patron be left out, and the writ be brought only against the bishop and the clerk, the suit is of no effect, and the writ shall abate, for the right of the patron is the principal question in the cause. (3) If the clerk be left out, and have received institution before the action brought (as is sometimes the case), the patron, by this suit, may recover his right of patronage, but not the present turn; for he cannot have judgment to remove the clerk, unless he be made a defendant and party to the suit, to hear what he can allege against it.

Previous to the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), the action was commenced by an original writ issuing out of Chancery.

If there were two plaintiffs, as in the case of joint-tenancy, &c. the death of one of them would not abate the action, for a lapse might occur before the survivor could bring another action.—2 Saund. 72 k, and see 117 a. The summons upon this writ was served on the defendants, either personally or by posting it on the church-door of the benefice to which the action relates. A proclamation was unnecessary. If the defendant did not appear, or cast an essoin, i. e. show an excuse for not appearing at the return of the original writ, or if, after casting an essoin, he did not appear at the adjournment day, a writ of attachment issued commanding the sheriff to put such defendant, by gages and safe pledges, to answer for his default; if no appearance was entered in due time to this, then a writ of grand distress was sued out, commanding the sheriff to distrain the defendant by all his lands and chattels in the bailiwick, in order to compel the appearance; if then the defendant would not appear at the return of this writ, the plaintiff had judgment by default.—52 Hen. III. c. 12, Stat. of Marlbridge. Upon making out his title, execution was had.

When the defendant appeared, the plaintiff declared.

By section 26 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, it is enacted that no quare impedit shall be brought after the commencement of the Act in any court whatsoever, but that an action may be commenced by writ of summons issuing out of the Court of Common Pleas in the same manner and form as the writ of summons in an ordinary action, and upon such writ shall be endorsed a notice that the plaintiff intends to declare in quare impedit. By s. 27, the service of the writ, the appearance of the defendant proceedings in default of appearance, pleadings, judgment, execution, and all other proceedings and costs upon such writ, shall be subject to the same rules of practice, as nearly as may be, as the proceedings in an ordinary action commenced by writ of summons, and the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Acts 1852 and 1854 shall apply to the writ and pleadings, and the proceedings thereupon.

The bishop and the clerk usually disclaim all title, except that of the bishop, as ordinary, to admit and institute, and that of the clerk, as presentee of the patron, who is thus left to defend his own right. The ordinary, however, if he have collated by lapse, may defend his right so to collate, and also his clerk may defend his right to be instituted (25 Edw. III. st. 3, c. 7). They may likewise plead dilatory pleas, or they may plead the general issue in bar—ne disturba pas—but should a disturbance be proved on their parts, the plaintiff will be entitled to damages. If the plaintiff's presentee be unfit, for want of learning, or otherwise, the bishop may plead the incapacity in bar.

The patron-defendant may plead dilatory pleas; or plenarty, i. e. that the church has been full for six calendar months before the issuing of the original writ, by virtue of his own presentation; or the general issue ne disturba pas; or he may traverse the plaintiff's title.

The defendant should set forth his own title, since in this action both parties are in effect complainants, and either may establish his right to present upon proving his title thereto.

The defendant, being thus deemed an actor, may himself carry down the record to trial without a proviso, although it is usual in practice to insert the proviso.—2 Saund. 336 a.

The trial is generally by jury. If the plaintiff fail in proving his title, the defendant may prove his, if he have pleaded it. If the plaintiff succeed, then the jury are to inquire whether the benefice be full or not; if full, upon whose presentation; its yearly value; and whether six calendar months have passed since the avoidance, in order that they may assess the damages. By West. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 5, if more than six calendar months have elapsed by reason of disturbance, so that the bishop has collated by lapse, and the true patron has thereby lost his presentation, damages are to be adjudged against the disturber to the amount of the value of the benefice for two years; if this time have not elapsed, then damages are to be assessed to the value of a moiety of the benefice for one year. Should the defendant succeed he is not entitled to damages.

The judgment is that the successful party recover his presentation, and a writ issues to the bishop commanding him to admit his presentee.

As to costs, see 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 39, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 27; and see Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 305, 1486.

Quare incumbravit, a writ which lay against a bishop, who, within six months after the vacation of a benefice, conferred it on his clerk, whilst two others were contending at law for the right of presentation, calling upon him to show cause why he had incumbered the church.—Reg. Orig. 32. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Quare intrusit, a writ that formerly lay where the lord proffered a suitable marriage to his ward, who rejected it, and entered into the land, and married another, the value of his marriage not being satisfied to the lord. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Quare non admisit, a writ to recover damages against a bishop who does not admit a plaintiff's clerk. It is however rarely or never necessary; for it is said that a bishop refusing to execute the writ ad admittendum clericum, or making an insufficient return to it, may be fined.—Wats. Cler. Law. 302.

Quare non permittit, an ancient writ, which lay for one who had a right to present to a church for a turn against the proprietary.—Fleta, l. 5, c. vi.
